WELL PLAYED, CORRECTLY STAGED PICTURIZATION OF CLASSIC.

Dustin Farnum in

DAVID GARRICK

Pallas-Paramount.

DIRECTOR	Frank Lloyd
AS A WHOLE	Delightful
STORY	Well-known classic
DIRECTION	Excellent
PHOTOGRAPHY	Very fine
LIGHTINGS	Effective
CAMERA WORK	Excellent
STAR	Seemed ideal in part
SUPPORT	Very well chosen
EXTERIORS	Atmosphere retained
INTERIORS	Very fine
DETAIL	Remarkably fine
LENGTH	Five parts

HERE we have a picturization of the well-known classic of by-gone days in London. In attempting to portray before the camera a story of this period, the director is marking out for himself a tremendous amount of work in the way of preparing proper detail as to costumes, settings and properties.

The Pallas company must be complimented on the production they have given us and Director Lloyd is surely to be praised for the manner in which the atmosphere of this period has been maintained. The best compliment of all is that the story moves along so humanly you forget the fact that it is a costume production and live the action with the characters.

Since this story is a simple tale of a human incident, the whole is, of course, not a tremendous offering, but it certainly is a little gem, in that it is an almost perfect presentation of a classic.

The photography throughout is remarkably clear, the lightings are good and we have intelligent use of close-ups. The atmosphere is not obtrusive, but still, is in perfect keeping throughout, and the detail has been given very careful attention, even down to the cutlery used at the table in the famous dinner scene.

"David Garrick" has been done before in a less pretentious way in the films, but this offering truly marks the advance which has been made in the production of films in the time which has elapsed between the previous offering and this one.

Mr. Farnum as Garrick seems exactly equipped for the role, because he has always been rather the matinee-idol type and in this, as the gentleman-actor, of the period of powdered wigs and duels, he fits in perfectly.

Winifred Kingston as the merchant's daughter gives us one of the best portrayals she has ever put over in any film offering.

Herbert Standing as the father is excellent. In the remainder of the cast we found some splendid types and every part was nicely handled.

In the titles we found the use of border designs made from old wood cuts, which helped decidedly in maintaining the proper atmosphere. These titles are following, in a way, the thought of Tom Ince, who has been giving us title cards for some time which suggested by the painting thereon the theme of the action at that period in the story.

Taken as a whole, I consider this offering to be one of the really splendid films of recent months, for the reason that it is a finished production, in every way, of a classic which can be shown to any audience with an assurance of genuine appreciation.

It is most decidedly very much "worth-while."

Others in the cast were Frank Bonn, Lydia Yeamans Titus, Olive White and Mary Mersch.

TRIANGLE PLAYS

William Collier in The No-Good Guy

For the week of May 7th the TRIANGLE-Ince Picture will be William Collier in "The No-Good Guy." This play, a five reel comedy-drama, is the first of its kind in which this famous Broadway star has ever appeared, and the result is a full hour and a half of comedy so clever that your patrons will find themselves slapping each other on the shoulder in mutual admiration of the amusing situations.

"That's the funniest picture I ever saw," is the way they will describe this latest TRIANGLE PLAY.

For years Collier has been famous on Broadway for his droll manner, his clean comedy, and his faculty for drawing a laugh from an entire house without cracking a smile himself. All of this ability is intensified and magnified on the screen. Everyone who has ever seen Collier knows how comical he really can be and need not be told that he will produce more laughter than has been heard in your theatre for many a day.

Then the Fine-Arts Picture, Douglas Fairbanks in "The Good-Bad Man" and two roaring Keystone Comedies will complete the week's bill.

President Ochs Makes Statement

Lee A. Ochs, president of the New York State Exhibitors' League, issued a statement that speaks "straight from the shoulder." Mr. Ochs said in part:

On the eve of the greatest motion picture exposition since the birth of the industry, the Exhibitors' League welcomes every element in the industry to Grand Central Palace and invites attendance every day and every evening from May 1 to May 6.

The Exhibitors' League desires to go on record as the advocate if not the inventor of peace in the industry and to call attention to the efforts of those misguided or improperly influenced persons who have sought to belittle the exhibitors' successful campaign for peace and co-operation.

This campaign was begun after a Board of Trade committee had been forced to repudiate its clear and definite understanding with the Exhibitors' League for a jointly managed, jointly shared exposition and it was carried to a successful issue because it was based on a principle vital to the perpetuation of the exhibitors' organization.

This is now set forth for the benefit of those who called on the exhibitors at large to feel "sick and ashamed" at their brothers in New York fighting for their rights and who subsequently referred to "agitators, peanut politics, rule or ruin, half-baked speeches on exhibitor oppression and the like," in connection with the clean and successful campaign of, for and by the exhibitors.

It is desired that a lasting peace be established between the exhibitor and the other elements of the industry, but the exhibitors want this peace to be founded on a fair public as well as private understanding of the cause and its settlement.

The exhibitors sought first to secure just recognition and, second, to perpetuate their annual institution, the exposition. In both these issues they have been fully satisfied and there remains only one more thing to bring about the co-operation on a permanent basis.

There must be contrived a working plan of co-operative organization which will be capable of fair play within the industry, full representation of all elements of the industry and with the ability to successfully combat the legislative and other evils which confront the motion picture business.

As now constituted the Motion Picture Board of Trade has been a rank failure in the fight against censorship. If we win this struggle, it will be in spite of the Board of Trade and we believe that it is to the best interests of the industry to say so frankly.

Those who have their own ends to serve or prestige to lose will insist that we are misguided and that we should make our speeches in the secrecy of the committee rooms so that the industry may not suffer. But we want no closet conferences. We have seen the folly of them and are satisfied that the industry is big enough and broad enough and fine enough to stand the full daylight on all that it does.

On the eve of this great exposition we want to go on record for efficient, well organized war against the enemies without and for peace within the industry on a basis that will really serve the industry effectually.

As we enter upon our Exposition at Grand Central Palace and continue on co-operatively through the show at Madison Square Garden we call on all exhibitors in this city, in this state and through all the cities and states of the entire country to arouse themselves to the needs of the industry and to prepare for full, complete and united co-operation in effecting an organization that will be fully representative, adequate to our needs, strong enough to fight out battles, big enough not to stoop to petty efforts to "put the exhibitor in his place," and officered by men who can secure to us our rights as business men in the great industry by which we live.

The situation calls for immediate and effective action and we feel safe in vouching for the great body of exhibitors in the West, South, North and East, those who make up the country-wide backbone of this fifth industry, in all that makes for the well being of the industry.

The Exhibitors' League of America as represented by its New York Branch desires to thank its friends for the hearty co-operation which has made its Third Annual Motion Picture Exposition at Grand Central Palace such an unqualified success.

The place and date of the 1917 Exposition will be announced during show week and the Exhibitors invite the hearty support of the entire industry.

Lee A. Ochs, President,
218 West 42d Street. M. P. L. of A., Branch 11.

Manufacturers' Exhibits

The manufacturing companies vied with each other in their endeavors to show the most artistic and interesting exhibits.

Red Feather and Blue Bird.

The Red Feather and Blue Bird displays, situated at the entrance of the hall, at Grand Central Palace, were the first to take the visitor's eye and they were reluctant about letting it go. The Red Feather booth was a dazzle of soft red with handsomely carved chairs and tables set off by unique lighting effects. Its principal display is the handsome cup donated by Universal for the consistent winner of the newly proposed twenty-four-hour race. In the Blue Bird booth the many advantages for harmonious decoration offered by the brand name have been utilized with success in an effort to interest the passerby.

Metro

The Metro Picture Corporation's exhibit at Grand Central Palace was very artistic. In the decorative scheme were included fifteen paintings on oval panels, of stars of the Metro, Rolfe, Popular Players, Quality, Columbia companies. Between these panels rambler roses were trained over high trellises.

Paramount

The Paramount Pictures Corporation contracted for the largest space to be used by anyone at the Board of Trade exposition. This space it fitted up with luxurious furnishings, and divided into three parts. One is a reception room in which literature of the different companies releasing through Paramount, was distributed; another section is a comfortable lounging room and the third as a writing room for the convenience of visiting exhibitors.

Mutual

The Mutual Film Corporation has extensive exhibits at both expositions and every department of the company was represented in a series of prettily decorated booths. Stars of the Mutual company were on hand to greet the guests.

Fox

William Fox presented practically the same exhibits at both shows. The booths were decorated with the Fox colors, blue and white, and the interior contained oil paintings of the various Fox stars. One night was set aside for each Fox star to be present in person and receive their admirers.

Thanhouser

At the Thanhouser booth in the Grand Central Palace a voting contest was conducted along original lines. Florence La Badie is having a special Pullman coupe made for her and a prize of $100 was offered for the best suggestions for decorating it—both as to the color scheme and the draperies and upholstering.

Pathe

The Pathe Company used two booths at the Exhibitors' show. A feature of its exhibit was a wax group of Pearl White as Marjorie in "The Iron Claw," Sheldon Lewis as the iron claw and a figure in the laughing mask in the background. The figures wore the same costumes worn by the players in the production.

Vitagraph

The Vitagraph Company was represented at both expositions. The booths were beautifully decorated and surprise novelties added to the attraction of the displays. The souvenirs were given out by the Vitagraph stars. One of the unique features of this stand was the stringed orchestra which took up the burden of filling the air with melodies when the large band at the end of the hall declared intermission.

Morosco and Pallas

The Oliver Morosco Company and Pallas Pictures were represented at the William L. Sherry booth. Large oil paintings of the Morosco-Pallas stars formed a large part of the decorations, and the stars themselves were present in person.

International

The International Film Service was also represented at both expositions, and many novel and interesting stunts were planned for the entertainment of the guests at these booths. All visitors who were opposed to censorship were asked to sign a ballot and deposit it in a huge box with a capacity of 1,000,000 ballots. On Wednesday night the votes cast were estimated at 30,000. The box will be sent to Governor Whitman to show the strength of the opposition to censorship as it exists at present.

Paragon had a group of costumed girls engaged in this same work, while the Mutual and other booths gave out forms asking for an opinion on censorship.

William A. Brady, president of the World Film Corporation, appointed a committee of six newspaper men to pick out from the crowd on Wednesday night the six prettiest girls. These girls will be given a week's contract, and if they make good will be employed indefinitely.

One of the exhibits which attracted large crowds was the stage where the $100 prize scenario was produced by amateur actors without any screen experience.

New Sea Picture

"The Oath of Hate," a sea story with the sea as one of the leading characters, and not merely a background for the action, is the forthcoming three-reel Knickerbocker Star feature, on the General program, featuring Henry King. Mr. King not only enacts the principal role, but is also responsible for the masterly direction of the picture, which is one of the most unusual offerings yet released under the Knickerbocker brand.

Michelena in California Feature

Advance "stills" from California where the California Motion Picture Corporation are engaged in finishing up "The Woman Who Dared," with Beatriz Michelena, are calculated to make the residents of the more or less "Frozen North"—meaning Chicago, New York, and "sich-like" places—even more dissatisfied with their lot than they have been. Many of the photographs which have been turned out to provide an advance glimpse of the new production show Miss Michelena and her fellow players idling around in the summeriest of summer costumes—the kind of clothes which New York and Chicago are beginning to despair of ever wearing again.

The California company have already established quite a reputation with their "stills." The photographs which they have shown in conjunction with their previous releases, particularly "The Unwritten Law," have been particularly fine. General Manager Alexander E. Beyfuss regards the still photograph as the backbone of all advertising and as a consequence fully as much care is exercised in turning out the stills as in turning out the finished motion picture print.

"The Woman Who Dared," with Miss Michelena, is announced as a story dealing with diplomatic intrigues in the courts of Europe. As such it should prove particularly interesting at this time. The feature will be ready some time in May and, like "The Unwritten Law," which preceded it, is to be handled on the states rights basis.

Changes in Kleine Company

A. C. Melvin, for some time road man for the George Kleine Company, goes to Kansas City as manager.

W. O. Edmunds, formerly handling George Kleine's Kansas City office, has been promoted to coast supervisor and will spend his time between the three Kleine offices at Seattle, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

J. C. Ragland, one of the most successful travelers out of the Kleine Pittsburg office, goes to New Orleans, where he will have charge, succeeding Howard Gale.

Among the several new offices soon to be opened that at Omaha will be handled by R. P. Peebles of the clerical forces of George Kleine's New York headquarters, who left for his new home.

A new Kleine office will be opened in Detroit next week with Frank Rutledge of the Kleine Chicago office in charge. Mr. Rutledge is one of the best known film salesmen in the middle west. He has traveled through the state of Michigan for the Kleine interests for a long time, and is well known to exhibitors everywhere throughout that state.

The opening of the new offices at Omaha and Detroit will be made under the direct supervision of General Branch Manager Merle E. Smith, who will also visit the Dallas, Texas, and possibly other offices before his return to the New York headquarters.

Rolin Phunphilms News

The Rolin Phunphilms players have been working on a production in San Diego and Tia Juana, Mexico, but at the same time they have been enjoying the foreign atmosphere and freedom of the little Mexican town. Many of the scenes of the play were taken in the gambling houses which make up most of the business district of Tia Juana, and after the work was finished the players tried the games of chance—some to their sorrow. One night when the work kept them late in the little border town they decided to partake of a real Spanish dinner. Everyone sat around a table with oilcloth and tinware and were served by a Spanish maiden with chico peppers, chili con carne, tamales, enchilides and numerous other hot dishes. They all claimed they enjoyed the menu but it was noted that a great quantity of water was consumed in trying to cool their tongues and throats.

Beebe Daniels, who plays the leads in Phunphilms, was given a chance to play a different sort of lead for life. While they were making pictures in Tia Juana a wealthy merchant of that city became fascinated by the star and trailed her for three days, watching and admiring her work. He offered her his wealth and cacs hermosa but eighteen year old Miss Daniels could not see marriage just yet even with a wealthy Mexican.

In San Diego the players took advantage of the opportunity to see the sights of the 1916 Exposition and also the army and navy headquarters.

Premo Feature Completed

"The Woman of It," starring Carlyle Blackwell and Ethel Clayton, is shortly to be released. Harley Knoles' artistic achievement in point dramatic and production efforts, is shortly to be offered a field in "The Woman of It."

Forgetting for a moment the exceptional cast offered by Premo in this newest release, those who have been privileged to see the script and the rough film, declare that the feature is an artistic triumph. It is a story of the modern Mona Vanna.

Distributers May Refuse to Sell

The Federal Trade Commission has upheld the right of motion picture distributing concerns to refuse to sell to more than one theater in a city. The question was raised in the application of a theater manager against a distributing house, which he charged had sold exclusive rights to a film to his competitor in the city.

Big Triple Merger Completed

PARAMOUNT'S CONNECTION STILL A MYSTERY

AS ANNOUNCED last week in Motography, the merger between the Triangle, Lasky and Famous Players companies has been consummated. This combination is a very vital realignment of highly important factors in the motion picture world.

The complete arrangement comprises an affiliation of the Triangle Film Corporation, the New York Motion Picture Corporation, the Keystone Film Company, the Majestic Motion Picture Company and the Reliance Motion Picture Corporation, the Famous Players Film Company and the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company.

The men at the head of the various organizations listed above are H. E. Aitken, president Triangle Film Corporation, Messrs. Kessell and Baumann, executives of the New York Motion Picture Corporation and the Keystone Film Company, Adolf Zukor of the Famous Players Film Company, and Jesse L. Lasky and Samuel Goldfish of the Jesse L. Lasky Company.

The new arrangement is being backed by financial interests in New York, and will be capitalized in an amount stated to be twenty-five millions. No definite information has been given out as to who these backers are but it was stated that immediately upon the completion of the new combination the four principals left for New York. These were H. B. Smithers of the banking firm of F. S. Smithers & Company, Oscar Gubelman of the banking house of Knauth, Nachod and Kuhne, Adolf Zukor of the Famous Players Company and Samuel Goldfish of the Jesse L. Lasky Company.

In a telegraphic communication President Aitken of the Triangle company said:

"The object of this alignment is to insure to the exhibitor of Triangle Plays a better and more efficient service. This we believe will now be accomplished. Exhibitors of Triangle Plays will now be able to obtain the greatest group of film and stage stars that has ever been gathered together under one aegis, and these will not be confined in their screen appearances to any one studio, but will be seen under the guidance of the various directors as occasion and the improvement of the service may warrant. This is the first time any amusement enterprise has achieved the financial importance of the present alignment, placing it upon the same stable foundation as a railroad or any similar industrial enterprise. The plan to be followed will be that the individual component parts will to some extent sink their identity in the new parent organization, the Triangle Film Corporation, and as a part thereof their productions will only be seen as a part of the massed product of that company. It is anticipated that the effect will be far reaching. As there are roughly 22,000 motion picture theaters in the United States, and these are patronized daily by nearly six million persons, the field of the new organization, as will be seen, is no small one. Our consistent and constant aim will be to furnish the public with the highest possible class of motion pictures, and when I say this, I do not mean that the ethical classification will be neglected. The Triangle Film Corporation, for which I can speak perhaps more authoritatively, has never put forth a picture that could properly be subjected to censure, and I think I can make the same statement for the Famous Players and Lasky interests. The aim has been heretofore to give the best, and that aim will be maintained."

Mr. Lasky is quoted in the telegram as saying:

"One of the first steps undertaken will be the enlargement of studio facilities both East and West, in order that a higher quality and quantity of production may be attained. We shall endeavor to make bigger and better photoplays, and I believe that the reputation of all now in the new combination is a guarantee of that fact. No immediate changes in the individual companies are in prospect."

But there is one important point still unsettled, and that is the relation of Paramount to the new combine. There have been some conflicting statements made in this regard which have not as yet been definitely cleared up.

The official statement issued by the Triangle Film Corporation asserts that there are no interests of the new alignment in which the Paramount will share, nor is the latter concerned therein.

Mr. Goldfish, vice-president of the Lasky Company, says, "I have read the many stories in the newspapers and wish to say that the Lasky company has no intention of releasing its productions through any other concern than the Paramount Pictures Corporation. The merger in which the Lasky Company is concerned is one of production only, and the marketing of its films will not be affected in any way."

Mr. Hodkinson, president of the Paramount, is said to have flatly declared that his concern has iron-bound contracts with the Famous Players and Lasky companies for the next twenty-five years, and there is no way in which these agreements can be broken. He intimated that if necessary the Paramount would go to law and fight to the last court to protect its interests.

It is believed that this difference arose through a misunderstanding of the distinct line drawn between the producing company and marketing companies, and that while the combination will insure better pictures these will be released through the same channels as formerly.

First Knickerbocker Feature

The Knickerbocker Company will release its first five-reel feature on May 17. This is a powerful play entitled, "Spellbound," and stars Lois Meredith. The story presents many elaborate and unusual sets. The exteriors showing the ancestral home of Elsie Yorke, the English heiress played by Miss Meredith, were filmed by special permission of a wealthy Californian whose great country estate, modeled after a famous English homestead, has never before been thrown open to the motion picture industry. An exact reproduction of the great temple of Prithi-Devi at Benares, which Kipling used in his story of "The Incarnation of Krishna Mulvaney," is used in another scene. Some spectacular fire scenes are also introduced. This production is under the direction of H. M. and E. D. Horkheimer.

Charles Clary with Fox

Charles Clary, a well known leading man in the theater, has joined the William Fox organization and has reported for work in a picture now being made in California, Arizona and other sections of the southwest under the direction of Raoul A. Walsh. Clary is a particularly handsome man who has played heavy leads with some of our best known dramatic stars. He played in New York with Mary Mannering and in "The Road to Yesterday." He portrayed the leading male role on tour with Mrs. Leslie Carter.

Charles Clary—Fox.

This is by no means his first venture into pictures. He worked for four years with the Selig companies on the coast, played eight months with the Griffith companies and appeared in the first multiple reel picture ever made in the United States. He also played in the first of the serial stories, "The Adventures of Kathlyn" with Kathlyn Williams. He was also seen in "Tennessee's Pardner" and in "The Black List."

Here's a Regular Smash Up

An automobile collision that has in it all the risk and danger of unintentional accidents is shown in "The Secret of the Submarine" when a machine containing Olga Ivanoff, a Russian spy, played by Hylda Hollis, crashes into a car in which Gerald Morton, played by Lamar Johnstone, is riding.

The smaller car is struck at almost right angles, being swung around so sharply that the two rear wheels are knocked from the axle. Both cars were completely wrecked as can readily be imagined by the scene shown in the film.

A peculiar phase of the smash up was the seeming effort by one of the cars to get away. It jammed through the wreckage and would have done serious damage to bystanders had not Carl Morrison, in charge of the "punchers" at the American studio, "roped" the car. Carl has roped many a horse but he says this is first experience in roping a "gas-bronc."

But She Brings 'Em In

Beatriz Michelena, who is starring in "The Woman Who Dared," the seven-part feature now being produced by the California Motion Picture Corporation, is the genuine type of out-of-door girl, and an adept at many kinds of athletics. Beside being an expert in riding, swimming, rowing and some score of similar things, Miss Michelena drives a motor with consummate skill. She is quite efficient in solving automobile problems for herself, can change a tire in record time, and the intricacies of carburetor, gears, valves, transmissions and plugs are all very simple to her.

When out in her car, as may be gathered from the above mental picture, Miss Michelena is a stickler for real comfort in the way of motoring togs. With her efficiency counts for much more than style. Her most constant companion when she scorches the Marin country roads is her champion Russian Wolf Hound, Nicholas II, who always occupies the tonneau seat with becoming dignity.

Bertha Kalich in Second Fox Film

Mme. Kalich, the celebrated tragedienne and heroine of William Fox feature films, returned this week from a motor tour of the New Jersey resorts and in a few days will be busily at work on her second Fox feature. This time she will be under the direction of James Vincent, who made the Theda Bara "Gold and the Woman" picture.

Mme. Kalich is particularly delighted with the success of her first picture "Slander," which attracted widespread attention from dramatic critics throughout America and caused her to be snowed under with written congratulations from every part of the country.

The Mary Miles Minter Question

The Mutual Film Corporation reports that Mary Miles Minter has been added to the American Film Company family under a five years' contract to appear in productions of not less than five reels, and will leave for the Santa Barbara studios about the middle of May.

The Metro Company, with whom Miss Minter has been appearing, has made no definite statement except that the young star's contract with it does not expire for a year and four months. This apparent discrepancy in the matter of contracts has not, as yet, been explained.

Owing to the popularity which the Kalem pictures, in which she has recently begun to appear, have given Rose Melville, the original "Sis Hopkins," it is possible that she may return to the stage. Since the films have brought her back into the lime light several producers want her.

"Now, young man, you tell me the truth." A very human spot in "Unlucky Luke," American-Mutual.

Northwestern Exposition Big Success

VISITORS MANY AND WELL PLEASED

THE month of May, 1916, is making much film history and will long be remembered by everyone in any way connected with the moving picture industry. Three expositions exploiting the moving picture in all its branches are being held this month, two in New York and one in Minneapolis, Minn.

While the convention and exposition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the Northwest is not as far-reaching as the expositions in the east it is highly important to everyone in the northwest, and just as much time and thought has been put on the displays of the film manufacturers and supply companies and on the features of entertainment. The Association feels great pride in the fact that its two months of labor resulted in the biggest motion picture exposition the association has ever held.

The exposition was held in the National Guard Armory, Minneapolis, Minn., May 2, 3, 4 and 5. Splendid exhibits lined three sides of the big floor space and additional booths were placed around the center of the floor with a large open space left free for dancing. On either side of othe main entrance there were two motion picture theaters with shows going on all the time the exposition was in progress. Among the big manufacturing and distributing companies having displays at the show were the National Film Company, Independent Film Corporation, Zenith Feature Film Company, Fox Film Corporation, Mutual Film Corporation, Metro Pictures Service, Triangle Film Corporation, Laemmle Film Service, Bluebird Photoplays, Inc., Favorite Feature Films, Famous Players-Paramount General Film Service, V-L-S-E, Pathe Exchange, Inc., Feature Film Company.

Practically every film concern and supply dealer doing business in the northwestern territory was represented and every phase of the industry was demonstrated. The different companies exhibiting are given herewith:

Bartola Musical Instrument Co., Theater Equipment Co., American Seating Co., Seaburg Piano Co., Fotoplayer, W. J. Dyer & Bro., National Film Co. New Film Corporation, Independent Film Corporation, Zenith Feature Film Co., Inc., Fox Film Corporation, Mutual Film Corporation, M. R. Dick Features, Twin City Film Renovating Co., Metro Pictures Service, Triangle Film Corporation, Laemmle Film Service, Bluebird Photoplays, Inc., Favorite Feature Films, Famous Players-Paramount, Friedman Film Corporation, Supreme Features, General Film Service, V. The exposition opened with an address of welcome by Mayor Nye of Minneapolis, and many entertainment features were planned. Following the regular program at the armory the opening night a cabaret entertainment was held at the West Hotel. The vaudeville program for this cabaret entertainment was donated by Jack Elliott and Harry Sherman, owners of "The Birth of a Nation" for seven states. Eight big acts were given.

Wednesday night a midnight entertainment was given at the New Palace Theater, which was donated by Rubens & Finkelstein, the owners. Acts from all the theaters and a number of local stunts were given and the regular Palace orchestra furnished the music.

Thursday night a banquet was held at the West Hotel, at which Thomas Furniss of Duluth, Minn., was toastmaster.

Friday night wound up the week of convention and entertainment with a grand ball held at the National Guard Armory. Many of the Selig and Essanay players came to Minneapolis to be present at this ball and give the visitors a chance to make their acquaintance in person.

Beside the evening entertainments the following committees were appointed to help make the visit pleasant for all the strangers in town:

Entertainment of Tribune Girls

Charles G. Branham, editor of Amusements, chairman; Lowell V. Calvert, manager of the New Garrick theater in Minneapolis; D. C. McClellan, manager of the New Garden theater, Minneapolis; C. L. Gilbert M. Tyler, special representative of the Essanay Co., was named for the reception committee.

The hundreds of exhibitors who attended the convention returned to their homes highly pleased at the pleasure and profit of the first Northwestern film exposition.

Lasky Belasco Production for May

The Lasky Company announces for May release another Lasky-Belasco feature in the adaptation of Belasco's drama, "Sweet Kitty Bellaire," with Mae Murray in the title role. This play, one of the greatest dramatic successes of Belasco, is a story of mingled romance and melodrama laid in the early eighteenth century in England.

Another Stage Planet on Screen

Howard Estabrook, the International Film Service star, possesses most exceptional photographic qualities. His natural modes of expression register instantly and compellingly and his strong personality is intuitively attracting. He has just such a forceful bearing as is required of his Dr. Alden in the new psychological drama "The Mysteries of Myra," which is arousing so much interest.

Howard Estabrook, International.

Mr. Estabrook's hobby is work. Motoring and golf have a certain charm for him but are hardly strenuous enough to suit his active nature.

Mr. Estabrook has enjoyed a meteoric career upon the legitimate stage as well as in motion pictures. In the latter field, his first picture was "Officer 666," which placed him in film's front ranks. His next most interesting work was done in "Four Feathers."

Born in Detroit in 1884, Mr. Estabrook entered the dramatic profession in an interesting manner. A stock company playing Detroit was in need of a juvenile. Mr. Estabrook applied for the job and got it. On the strength of his success in "Shenandoah," he was given a part with William Collier in "The Dictator." "On the Quiet" followed and then Mr. Estabrook made his metropolitan hits in "Brown of Harvard," "The Straight Road," and "The Boys of Company B," under the management of Daniel Frohman.

During a year's honeymoon in Europe he wrote his "Mrs. Avery," which was later produced on Broadway and which won for him a membership in the Society of American Composers and Dramatists.

Engagements with Holbrook Blinn in "The Boss" and with Wilton Lackaye came next. He was in the original cast of "Within the Law," and scored heavily as Laurie in "Little Women." He appeared next as leading man for Grace George in several of her plays, the leading part in "Things That Count" and finally as star in "Search Me." His screen work in "The Closing Net" was done at the same time he was playing with Miss Elsie Janis in "Miss Information."

Notwithstanding his pronounced stage success, he is finding his screen work capable of offering him a much wider field of expression.

Morosco Stars in Auto Accident

A thrilling automobile accident which was not called for in the scenario occurred during the production of "Pasquale," the next release of the Morosco Company on the Paramount program, featuring George Beban and Myrtle Stedman.

What the play really did call for was a scene showing a speeding auto turning a sharp curve on a mountain highway. A location was selected just outside of Los Angeles and the cameraman took his place. The car containing George Beban and Myrtle Stedman and John Franklin, the chauffer came on at high speed and on turning the curve broke the steering knuckle on the front inside wheel, taking the machine off its course with a side lurch directly in the path of the cameraman. Upon turning over, the car instantly shot into flame. The photographer remained at his post and secured pictures of the entire accident.

Had it not been for the steel-framed hood, the passengers would hardly have escaped more serious injuries than they did. Both Miss Stedman and Mr. Beban escaped with several bruises while the chauffeur who sat near the wheel that gave way, suffered from a broken wrist and was taken out of the wreck unconscious.

Thus a thrill of actual realism was added to the play which was not originally written into it and the scenario was revised to include the pictures of the accident secured by Camerman Scott.

"Musty's" Sufferings Over

The tenth and concluding reel of George Kleine's serial comedy "The Mishaps of Must Suffer," featuring Harry Watson, Jr., will be released next week. This episode bears the somewhat ambiguous but curosity-exciting title of "Coming Down." In this release Musty gets a job as an all around man in an amusement arcade and has a terrible time with the Wild Man and the zoo lion which he allows to get loose from their cages. To make the scenes realistic it was necessary to build an entire escalator propelled by a 5 h. p. electric motor, in the studio, at a great cost.

Shannon Fife's Triangle release, "The Habit of Happiness," written especially for Douglas Fairbanks, is an unqualified success, and in receiving congratulations Fife wishes to share them with Director Alan Dwan for many artistic touches to the play, and with "Doug" Fairbanks, who never worked harder to make a "go" of a play.

A real accident which was made reel. An enlargement of the film showing how the cameraman caught the purely accidental upset of the machine "acting" with George Beban in the rear seat and Myrtle Stedman in front. After it happened a gusset was made in the scenario of "Pasquale" to admit the accident into the play.

Modern Publishing Extends to Films

PUBLICITY THE FEATURE OF INTERNATIONAL PICTURES

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST claims that the motion picture business is merely the modern development of the publishing business, and the formation of the International Film Service was not founded on an ideal, nor with any thought of some wonderful mode of presentation or distribution, but simply was an outcome of this idea. In other words the establishment of a list of exchanges and of a production center is not deviating from established conditions but merely an extension, a development of the enterprises already owned by Mr. Hearst.

Mr. Hearst has been in the publishing business all his life, and for a great many years has been interested in the film industry. In comparing the two he says that the publishing business is informing, interesting, educating or entertaining the public and the motion picture business works along exactly the same lines.

The International Film Service is offering something new, however, in that it is selling publicity in conjunction with films. This is an entirely new departure which holds out great advertising advantages. Heretofore the exhibitor has had to depend for publicity upon his own outlay or a limited amount, often altogether too limited, on the part of the manufacturer. As Mr. Hearst controls the New York American, New York Evening Journal, Chicago Examiner, Chicago American, Boston American, San Francisco Examiner, Los Angeles Examiner and Atlanta Georgian as well as the International Film Service, it is almost impossible to compute the amount of money that could be put behind a feature in the nature of advertising. There is an unending chain of publicity which could be started through all these mediums.

Although the public press is a very powerful factor in the life of Americans today, there is an even greater and more powerful force and that is the motion picture, and yet the limits or possibilities of this industry have hardly been touched. With the co-operation of these two powerful forces as vested in the International it is easy to see that unlimited publicity will be guaranteed to any stars in the employ of this company because unlimited publicity will be given to productions released by it, and the organization has Mr. Hearst behind it. Mr. Hearst has high ideals in regard to the production of pictures and believes that with the facilities they possess they will be enabled to produce better pictures, greater pictures of finer quality and better purposes.

Plans are now under foot to secure some of the greatest stars in the motion picture profession as well as from the legitimate stage. It is planned not only to feature stars of this country but also some of the greatest actors and actresses of Europe.

The International has also announced its intention of entering the comedy field and is planning to idealize and picturize the works of such famous cartoonists as Tom Powers, George McManus, Tad, Hal Coffman, Opper, Herschfield, Herriman, Clif Sterrett, Tom MacNamara, Winsor McCay and others. This does not mean that it will use their animated cartoons exclusively but that scenarios will be woven around their well-known comedy characters and acted by the best comedy stars in the business.

"The Mysteries of Myra," the new psychological drama in which Howard Estabrook is starring as Dr. Alden, gives this International star an opportunity to show his compelling and strong personality. Mr. Estabrook is quite different from a great many people in that his pet hobby in life is work, and if he is not busy himself in the studio he will help the workman, or whatever other strenuous exercise he can discover. During the last month while working in Ithaca he organized a "Best Playlet" competition among the students of Cornell University. The winning sketch was produced and the proceeds added to the Actors' Fund.

Mr. Estabrook has achieved success both as a star on the legitimate stage and on the screen, but notwithstanding his pronounced stage success he is finding his screen work capable of offering a much wider field of expression.

Besides being an actor Mr. Estabrook is also a dramatist, having written "Mrs. Avery," which was produced on Broadway, and which won for him a membership in the Society of American Composers and Dramatists.

Sunbeam Motion Picture Corporation is the name of a new film company which has been formed at Cleveland, Ohio, with offices in the Chandler Building in New York, and the Leader-News Building, Cleveland. Wilbur Dunham is president of this new organization, with Mitzi Hajos, the notable light opera star, and Vaughan Glaser as vice-presidents and directors. Miss Hajos and Mr. Glaser will head their own studio groups. Other directors are Harry W. Davis, Wilmington, Del.; John D. Raridan, former Cleveland manager of the Fox Film Corporation; and George Leon More, studio director in New York.

Chicago has a new film organization, named the Film Club, which is composed of celluloid booking agents and exchange managers. Meetings are being held weekly in the quarters of the Reel Fellows' Club.

Mirror Entertains Hunters' Club

The motion picture studio of the Mirror Films, Inc., was the scene of a real barbecue recently which wasn't staged for the camera, although the camera got in some good work before the party broke up.

The event was the annual meeting of the Hunters' Fraternity Club as guests of A. A. Anderson, a member of the board of directors of the film company. This club is composed of half a hundred or more of the big game hunters of New York City, and of sportsmen who are banded together because they love the open and the sports of field and stream. The organization is in constant activity looking toward the preservation of wild life and the forests.

The Hunters' Fraternity Club of New York at its barbecue held at the studio of the Mirror Films, Inc., at Glendale, Long Island. Mayor Mitchell of New York City was the guest of honor.

The barbecued calf was hung over a fire in a grove back of the studio and some pictures were taken of the group around the fire and also in the scenery which had been set up to represent the interior of a big hunting camp in which the repast was served. After dinner motion pictures in which Nat Goodwin has appeared for the Mirror were shown as well as scenes from the Canadian woods and comedy films. Several vaudeville acts were put on during dinner.

Among those present were Mayor Mitchel, Judge Benton of Syracuse, Harry Rowe Shelly, Charles Williams, ex-comptroller; Irving Bacheller, Henry Cooper, Clifford B. Harmon, president of the Mirror Films; William C. Toomey, the general manager; Andres de Segurola and Rich S. Hollsman of the board of directors; A. A. Anderson, J. B. Anderson, Archer Brown, Lowell Brown, James Barnes, Marston Bogert, Robert Boettger, Dr. F. M. Dearborn, J. S. Ehrich, Dr. A. Elting, J. C. Eames, Ezra H. Fitch, M. B. Foster, R. M. Gushee, J. W. Criggs, George King, J. L. Kuser, F. M. Spiegel, Arthur Williams, Clark Williams, Eldon Bisbee, William Crawford, Harry Rowe Shelley and Dr. King.

Rialto Film Corporation Formed

A new film company has been formed to be known as the Rialto Film Corporation with I. Goldberg as president, S. T. Goldberg as treasurer and Jesse J. Goldberg as general manager.

The corporation has been formed at a nominal capitalization, the reason being given that the stock of the company is not to be exploited but is to be financed by the original backers of the institution. The financial bankers of the organization are several capitalists of Detroit, the majority of the stockholders of the company, however, being I. and S. T. Goldberg, the heads of the Lillies Cigar Company of Detroit and Chicago.

It is the plan of the company to erect one of its studios and laboratories in or near Detroit. The name of the production now in the course of preparation is withheld and the names of the cast have not been made public except that it is an all-star one headed by Frank Wills and Bliss Milford. Marshal Farnum is the head director of the Rialto Film Corporation and his company is working at the Victor Studios in New York.

The Rialto Film Corporation has already entered into a contract with the Popular Pictures Corporation, lately organized with a capital of $1,500,000, providing for the release of the first production of the Rialto concern to be followed by regular releases commencing from September 1 on the program of one a week to be inaugurated by the Popular Pictures Corporation from that date on. It is understood that franchises are to be awarded by the Popular concern to independent exchanges providing for the release of the features to be made by certain manufacturers for the Popular Pictures concern. The booking by exchanges is to be upon an open policy.

Star Hypnotized by Machinery

Without doubt the most unique experience ever recorded as happening during the production of a motion picture comes from the Wharton Studio, at Ithaca, N. Y.

In one of the scenes of the new spirit drama, "The Mysteries of Myra," the star, Jean Sothern, visits the laboratory of Dr. Alden, the psychic investigator. She seated herself before a huge hynotizing machine. The lights were dimmed in the laboratory, the switch was turned, and to the soothing purr of an electric motor the huge wheel with its myriad mirrors glancing, refracting and blending the lights, began to revolve at high speed. After a proper length of time, Dr. Alden (Howard Estabrook) was directed to bring Miss Sothern back to earth again. To the great amazement of all, Miss Sothern failed to carry out her part. Again and again Mr. Leo Wharton called his direction to her which she seemingly failed to hear. Finally, Estabrook shook her violently. She opened her eyes slowly and after a moment proceeded with the scene. She had actually been hypnotized.

Do you wonder that this bewildering, relentless, whirling-dervish machine hypnotized Jean Sothern, the International star playing in "The Mysteries of Myra?"

Annual Convention at Chicago

COMMITTEES AT WORK ON OFFICIAL EXHIBITORS' SHOW

THE Chicago convention, which will bring together all the exhibitors of the United States, is already "made." The fact that the dates for the big show seem so far ahead—July 10 to 18, inclusive—really has nothing to do with the fact that definite plans have already been formulated and are now being carried out by the Chicago committees.

The men back of this coming official National Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America have been working very quietly but nevertheless with effect. It only remains for the developments which will materialize with the passage of time to show the results of the weeks of preliminary planning.

With a brotherly consideration for the interests of the "other fellow," those who have the coming Chicago annual convention in charge have thus far refrained from pushing their exposition into the light of public notice for the reason that it naturally would tend to detract from the interest in the big film expositions now being held in New York City by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League and the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America. As soon as these shows have passed into the horizon of history and the track is clear the work of the machinery which is to boom the Chicago exposition will become more and more in evidence. When July rolls around the national show in the Windy City will loom up as one of the biggest and most important elements the motion picture industry has ever known.

The convention will be held in the Chicago Coliseum, the huge structure which will earlier also be the scene of the National 1916 Republican convention. Probably no building in the United States is better adapted for a country-wide show such as the Chicago Exhibitors' convention will be. Needless to say, the immense building will be elaborately decorated in gala attire for the occasion.

The committees which are to bear the chief responsibility of the convention have been crystalized and are already actively at work. They are as follows, all of the men being of Chicago, where they are unhampered in their work by distance from the center of activities:

General chairman, William T. Sweeney.

FINANCE AND PUBLICITY COMMITTEE

Louis Frank, chairman, Halsted Theater, 6202 S. Halsted street; John H. Frundt, Clermont Theater, 3226 North Clark street; August Lilligen, Drake Theater, 2905 Milwaukee avenue; M. A. Choynski, Newberry Theater, 856 N. Clark street; Fred Schaeffer, 1820 Mallers Building, 5 So. Wabash avenue.

PRESS, ENTERTAINMENT AND RECEPTION COMMITTEE

G. M. Laing, chairman, Burton Theater, 3828 Indiana avenue; Fred Hartmann, Aristo Theater, 2648 North Lincoln avenue; C. C. Whelan, Jefferson Theater, Fifty-fifth street and Lake Park avenue; Harry Hyman, Avon Theater, 3325 Fullerton avenue; Sidney Smith, Kedzie Annex Theater, 3214 West Madison street; Julius A. Alcock, Mutual Theater, Oak Park; Robert R. Levy, Revelry Theater, 342 East Forty-seventh street.

PRINTING AND BADGE COMMITTEE

H. Lieberthal, chairman, Colleen Theater, 718 West Forty-seventh street; M. S. Johnson, Ideal Theater, 518 South Cicero avenue; Sidney Smith, Kedzie Annex Theater, 3214 West Madison street.

The Northwestern Exhibitors' Convention, held in Minneapolis the first week in May, was attended by General Chairman William J. Sweeney, in company with National President F. J. Herrington. While there Mr. Sweeney completed a number of arrangements which have to do with the Chicago Convention and gathered up a supply of ideas regarding the salient points and most brilliant features of the very successful Twin City show. Mr. Sweeney, with L. H. Frank, chairman of the Chicago Finance and Publicity Committee, and Fred Hartman, of the press, entertainment and reception committee, were chosen for the purpose and visited the expositions held in New York by the Exhibitors' League and the Motion Picture Board of Trade. A fund of ideas were gathered there also and the Chicago show bids fair to combine the finest and most successful elements of all the film expositions held up to now.

The Chicago Convention committee meets regularly every Tuesday noon at the Masonic Temple. The Press and Entertainment and Reception committee holds daily conferences, with the exception of Thursday. With these men devoting their time and mental energies to the coming exposition there can be no doubt of the success of the results.

Among the features of the big Chicago show will be the free dance every evening for all those who attend, the making of pictures from the "shooting" to the showing, before the eyes of the spectators, and the appearances of a number of nationally prominent stars of the screen.

The Chicago Chamber of Commerce is working shoulder to shoulder with the Convention committees. A number of the central railroads have promised special rates. Applications for booth space are now being received and should be addressed to General Manager Louis H. Frank, at the headquarters, 1413 Masonic Temple, Chicago.

Asks Investigation of "Ramona"

Frank M. Ashley, a patent attorney of New York, has filed a complaint with the attorney general of the United States to the effect that Clune's picturization of "Ramona" is a menace to the public welfare in that it presents Uncle Sam in an unfavorable light in his treatment of the Mission Indians in California. W. H. Clune, the producer does not take this complaint seriously as he says the pictures follow the text of the book exactly and states his willingness to make any changes required.

Fred Gowen of Marion, Kansas, who recently perfected his talking motion pictures, has sold his rights in this device for the territory west of the Rockies to a San Francisco concern for the sum of $75,000 and an annual royalty. The eastern territory has been reserved.

A Versatile Vitagrapher

James W. Morrison is Vitagraph's versatile juvenile and character man. He has taken parts from youthful fourteen to superannuated seventy-five.

He was born in Mattoon, Illinois, in November, 1888. He is a mixture of English, Dutch and French, with a dash of Scotch to add punch to the combination.

James W. Morrison, Vitagraph.

He is a graduate of the Mattoon High School and the University of Chicago and received his theatrical training at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts of New York.

It is something out of the ordinary when a man can portray parts from a school boy of fourteen to a venerable old man of seventy-five, and carry off the honors.

In "The Battle Cry of Peace" as the youngest son he made a courageous and natural soldier. In "Out of the Beaten Snows" he was a hardy, determined, typical iron-fibered adventurer. In the "Submarine D-2" he went through all the processes of enlisting and training at Annapolis and then serving on a submarine.

In this picture he did what no one had ever done before when he was shot from a torpedo gun from beneath the water. It was a risky part that required courage and fortitude. Reserved and gentlemanly, you would expect him to choose safer and more conservative roles; but the blood of the hero flows through his veins and he is at the height of his joy in performing daring and dangerous feats.

Morrison's greatest success was probably attained in "He Never Knew," a play which is likely to be revived in response to popular request. Other famous pictures in which he added to his laurels are "The Seventh Son," "The Modern Prodigal," "The Christian," "Mother's Roses," "The Wheels of Justice," "In the Days of Famine" and "Mortmain."

Ogden Crane with Pallas

Ogden Crane, well known for almost a quarter of a century as a characterizer of "heavy" roles, is now busily engaged in his initial work for Pallas Pictures at Los Angeles.

Mr. Crane gained his early theatrical experience in stock in New York, Cincinnati, Denver and other metropolitan cities and later appeared under the management of such producers as Charles Frohman, in important roles with Robert Hilliard and others of equal fame. Among his greatest characterizations on the speaking stage were those in "The House Next Door" as Sir John Cotswald and in "The Round Up," as Buck McKee.

Supporting Mary Pickford in "Caprice" the well known Famous Players success, Mr. Crane appeared for the first time before the motion picture camera in 1910. His initial offering in this photoplay in the role of the father, received wide praise and his subsequent work in films of similar merit has been presented under the trade marks of the foremost producing companies in the business.

Mr. Crane's first characterization for Pallas Pictures will be presented in "Davy Crockett," an elaborate film version of the famous story in which Dustin Farnum portrays the title role.

Chicago Strand Gives Festival

A musical festival of novel distinction takes place in Chicago the week beginning April 30. Its unique feature lies in the fact that two noted artists appear at regular performances at a motion picture theater.

For its "anniversary week" the Strand Theater Company announces a musical programme headed by Madame Mariska Aldrich, the Hungarian dramatic soprano, and members of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company. Her assistant is to be Allene Hale, pianist and harpist, identified prominently with appearances of Mme. Schumann-Heink and David Bispham. These artists will have the support of the famous Strand Symphony Orchestra, with Warde Johnstone directing.

A year ago the Strand Theater Company opened in Orchestra Hall, and presented high grade photodramas with a symphony orchestra of twenty-five musicians of ability. Unexampled success has rewarded President E. C. Divine and his associates for their work in elevating the standard of film presentation, incidentally "popularizing" the best music with photoplay patrons. The company now operates a Strand theater in Indianapolis as well as their Chicago playhouse, and the same policy of musical excellence is maintained at both places. The unwonted appearance of a grand opera prima donna with motion pictures is in the nature of a "treat" for Strand playgoers and an acknowledgement of gratitude on the part of the company.

International Film Shown

At Loew's New York Roof, last week, the International Film Service gave a private showing of "The Mysteries of Myra," the first two episodes, that is, together with the remainder of the company's program, for the benefit of the trade in general.

Properly to produce a five-part thriller that requires some difficult out door scenes, Director Ralph W. Ince has been successful in finding right near the Bay Shore (Vitagraph) studios locations that are superb in the way of back-grounds. The name of this new thriller is not made public, but predictions say it will be another "Juggernaut."

The regular stock cast, headed by Miss Lucille Lee Stewart, and Huntly Gordon will play the principal roles. Miss Stewart has an ideal role and her versatility will give her the necessary chance to again demonstrate her fitness for dramatic expression.

By special concession of G. Pellissier, director general, J. P. McGowan of the Signal Film Corporation this week secured permission to make motion pictures of the round-up on the Pellissier ranch to be used in the Signal's production of the western feature, "Whispering Smith."

Better Start Getting Ready Now

JULY seems a long way off, with a hint of frost still in the air and folks throwing their wraps around them when they take the quarter mile walk from home to the nearest picture show.

But time passes swiftly. This has been said before by other deep thinkers, and we claim no new discovery in it. But we have to say it, because most people don't seem ever to realize the truth of it. You think of the big convention at Chicago, ten weeks from now, and you say "Oh, shucks! Why, we've got all kinds of time to think about that. It's only May."

But if you are like most mortals, your thirty or forty or fifty years of experience has not taught you how astonishingly short May and June are, especially if, as we hope, you are very busy.

Now the busy ones are just the people who should go to the League convention—and generally just the ones who "haven't got time." A busy exhibitor is generally a successful exhibitor, and that kind always wants to be more successful. When a man has to spend all his time running one house, it is kind of hard to see how he could find time to run a dozen houses.

Yet men are doing it every day. Those men, you can bet, will come to Chicago July 10; and if you are here to meet them you can see how it is done.

The exhibitors who are not busy, on the other hand, not only have time to go, but they had better go while they still have their houses, and find out what is the matter. It is possible, you know, to run a theater without being busy—at least for a while. You can rent a house, install an operator and a doorman and a cashier, and just loaf around. It's pretty soft while it lasts, but it doesn't last long enough. If you are that kind of exhibitor, don't let anything keep you away from the convention. It doesn't need your attendance, but you need it—decidedly.

On the other hand, if you are the busy, hustling, ambitious sort of exhibitor, as most of our readers are, the convention needs you as much as you need it. Get a bunch of fellows like that together and there is always something stirring. Not one of them is satisfied until he knows all the other fellows know. And so they all go home about a hundred per cent richer in wisdom than when they came. You have heard men of that kind grumble because they HAD TO go to a convention, but you never yet heard any of them say they were sorry they went.

And that is the point of convention-going; the successful men feel that they have to go. It isn't a case of vacationing or pleasure jaunting; it is just a necessary part of the business. They figure that a man who would avoid a convention because an excuse was handy would be pretty apt to avoid some other part of his business that was necessary for success.

Practically all the separate branches of the industry have pledged themselves to make the League convention at Chicago a big event. With the individual producers and accessory men and the Board of Trade and the League itself each giving all it has to insure the magnificence of the affair, there is no doubt at all about the desirability of being there.

And particularly the country exhibitor, the small town fellow who knows he is behind the times and thinks nobody is interested in him—particularly the exhibitor from the little places should he be in Chicago on July 10.

It will do him a lot of good to find out just how important he is to the industry, and how many of him there are, and how the manufacturers want to cater to his wants, and how his fellow exhibitors want to help him.

Altogether there is so much to think of about this convention that it is none too early to start thinking and planning for it right away.

The Philosophy of Chaplinism

DOWN in Cairo, Ill., the Illinois Congress of Mothers has decided to abolish the institution known as Charlie Chaplin. It is a stern and terrible task they have undertaken, but apparently they are in earnest about it.

Charlie is unquestionably a positive character, because people either like him very much or dislike him utterly. The Illinois Mothers (who doubtless embrace, under their registered title, a very small percentage of the Illinois mothers) have decided to dislike him. It is observable that associations, clubs and similar groups who gather with a presiding officer find it much easier to object to things, and so find their objections more easily moved, than do individuals who do all their own thinking. The action of the Mothers' Congress probably indicates that one of the mothers objected to Charlie, and voiced her sentiment so vigorously that the rest of the crowd were swept into helping her record the animosity.

The philosophy of—or rather we should say the philosophy about—Charlie Chaplin is peculiar and paradoxical. We have an excellent friend in a small Michigan town, a big, rough, jovial man, just the sort of human being to appreciate Chaplin's drama. But he doesn't. He says Charlie is silly.

We have another friend right here in Chicago, who is a highly cultured and scholastic gentleman of literary tastes, a lover of antiques and all that sort of esthetic stuff. He should dislike Chaplin. But he doesn't. He confesses that he enjoys him immensely, and sees his pictures every chance he can get.

So there you have the Chaplin philosophy. We refuse to analyze it.

But Chaplin's stuff isn't really silly—we'll go that far. If you look closely at it, you will see that he knows, either by study or instinct, the fundamental principles of humor.

Now humor at best is a psychological mystery, and elusive. The more you reconsider a funny thing the less humor there is in it. If you look at it long enough it gets serious.

Nevertheless, there is a scientific psychology to humor—or comedy, as we call it in the play.

There is a reason why this is funny and that is not, though they be nearly alike. And that reason Charles Chaplin has discovered and is cashing in. It is obvious that he not only knows what will make people laugh, but he knows why they laugh at it—which is more than most comedians can say.

We think the Illinois Mothers possibly lack a sense of humor. The charge is an old one against woman, anyway. It is also possible that they saw some of Charlie's earlier antics—for Chaplin, like everybody else, improves with experience. The excessively rough stuff intimated by the Illinois ladies is not necessary to his humor. In his more subtle parts he might run the danger of entirely missing their undeveloped bumps of fun; but at least they could not rage against him if they did not understand him.

We recommend that the Illinois Mothers see all sides of Chaplin's comedy before they decide definitely that he is a menace to the commonwealth. It will save them a lot of vain effort.

For we are sure a popular vote would keep Charlie in the chair—and we are just as positive that his future stuff is going to be better and funnier than ever.

Brenon's Great Production

HUGE FOX FEATURE MADE IN JAMAICA—NEW BARA PLAY

IT WAS just a year ago that Herbert Brenon, already well known for his work in the motion picture field, came to William Fox and unfolded a plan for a gigantic production which he claimed would be unlike any other story ever filmed, or he believed, that ever would be filmed.

When the idea was unfolded to him, Mr. Fox realized that it would be gigantic, both as a spectacle and also from the standpoint of the producing cost. But although he estimated it would take a million dollars to produce the film, he believed that the idea was well worth it, and told Mr. Brenon to go ahead, employ the stars he wanted, find the location which would best suit his scenes, and when all these details were decided upon to come back to Mr. Fox and he would send Mr. Brenon and his company wherever desired, advance what money was needed and send the payroll each week. This showed how impressed Mr. Fox was with the idea unfolded to him, and the finished production shows that the producer judged well when he decided that it would be worth spending a million dollars to produce.

Herbert Brenon, Fox Director.

Mr. Brenon selected Annette Kellerman for the stellar role, and engaged a capable cast to support her. He scoured the lake and coast front cities of America to hire the most beautiful and accomplished swimmers for the mermaid band. He sent out agents to secure 5,000 horses and started the work on 10,000 costumes.

Jamaica was chosen as a fitting location for the play and the Rose Gardens at Kingston were leased. Also permission was obtained of the British government to make use of the old Fort Augusta that had lain idle and in ruins for several hundred years.

At the end of two months Mr. Brenon was ready to begin operations and with a company of 20,000 persons left for Kingston. The work on this picture continued for ten months without any interruptions or delays, and sitting at the end of a cable in New York William Fox sent down to Jamaica more than $100,000 each month to defray expenses. The million dollars that he foresaw as the amount required to make Herbert Brenon's dream a reality has been spent.

The spectacle is completed. Herbert Brenon and his band of 20,000 have returned from Jamaica, and now the man who conceived this great picture is working sixteen hours a day to cut and assemble his gigantic work. While 220,000 feet of film were taken in and around Kingston only 12,000 feet will be shown when the film is displayed to the public. One of the scenes from this play is shown in the frontispiece of this issue.

A great genius has conceived another mighty picture, and a great actress, Annette Kellerman, has added another triumph to her already long list.

The William Fox release for May 8 is featuring Theda Bara in "The Eternal Sapho." Miss Bara is given a wonderful opportunity in this play to show her talent and has taken advantage of it.

"The Eternal Sapho" is a heart-stirring story of the rise of a young girl from the slums to the position of a model in a studio and later her entrance into fashionable society. During her ascent she wrecks the lives of those who were her early benefactors.

A strong dramatic and heart interest touch is brought into the play through the little child and her softening influence on the designing woman of the world.

Bertram Bracken directed the play, and this is the first picture which he has produced with the Fox Film Corporation.

Miss Bara is supported by Frank Norcross, Warner Oland, George Mac Quarrie, Walter Lewis, Hattie Delaro, James Cooley, John Drummond, Einar Linden, Mary Martin and Kittens Reichert, making an exceptional cast.

The Fox Film Corporation will be represented at both motion picture exhibitions—the one at the Grand Central Palace and the other at Madison Square Gardens. Mr. Fox has always maintained a consistent policy of standing by the exhibitor, to whom he believes should be credited much of the success of the industry, and his organization will do everything possible to add to the success of the exhibition which is conducted under the auspices of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League.

In explaining his stand toward exhibitors Mr. Fox claims that the exhibitor is the basis of the picture industry. There are times when the manufacturer can educate the exhibitor to certain kinds of pictures but as a rule the manufacturer is doing the things his exhibitors wish him to do, and anyone who seeks to induce him to ignore his partners in the industry commits a gross blunder. When the manufacturers of pictures do not cooperate with the exhibitor who shows them, then the big picture machine will not work.

Robbed Bank to Go on Stage

Hattie Burks, a Fox star, tells the story on herself that she was so anxious to go on the stage that she robbed a bank in order to get there. She was only, twelve years old at the time but she broke her savings bank, ran away to a nearby town and tried to join a company. Her mother, however, followed her and put an end to her early ambitions by sending her off to school. Before joining the screen actresses Miss Burks was in vaudeville as a dancer and singer. She is as beautiful a fashion model as dancer and is known as one of the smartest dressers in the profession. Her one fad is clothes and her portraits are in great demand for publication in exclusive fashion papers, and as she designs all her own costumes some remarkable creations are the result.

Miss Burks will appear shortly in a Fox drama, entitled, "Sins of Men."

BILLIE BURKE STORY THRILLS

"Gloria's Romance," New Picture Novel Featuring Noted Comedienne and Being Produced by George Kleine Company, Replete with Sensations

A hand to hand encounter with an Indian chief is the big thrill in the second chapter of the new George Kleine motion picture novel "Gloria's Romance," in which Billie Burke is the featured star. The Indian is a real Seminole Indian, a member of the tribe encamped near Palm Beach, Florida, where the early installments of the new novel were filmed, and his opponent is Henry Kolker, the handsome leading man who plays the role of Dr. Royce, the hero of "Gloria's Romance." The Indian was armed with a knife, while Mr. Kolker had only his bare fists with which to defend himself. That fight was no make believe affair, for Director Edwin, after explaining what was wanted, urged the participants to "put plenty of pep into this" for purposes of realism, and when the combat started it was the real thing in every sense of the word for the Indian's temper was aroused by the rough handling of Mr. Kolker and he resented it by trying his best to hammer his opponent.

Chapter one of "Gloria's Romance" ended with Billie Burke, as Gloria Stafford, lost in the Florida Everglades, and the second installment of the Hughes novel takes up the action at that point. Gloria finds her way to the home of a Florida "cracker," where she succeeds in buying a cup of tea with an expensive ring she wears, and secures a suit of boy's clothing to replace the tattered and bedraggled gown that she ruined while floundering through the Everglades. Dressed in this boy's suit, Gloria once more sets out to find her way back to her hotel, but is misdirected and after hours of tramping comes upon the camp of a band of Seminole Indians. She is captured and finds herself regarded as a possible "squaw" by the Indian chief of the tribe. Dr. Royce, and Freneau, the young broker, in their search for Gloria, arrive in the vicinity of the Seminole camp just as Gloria faints away, following a proposal by the Indian chief. The athletic young physician is attacked by the Indian for interfering and a brisk hand to hand battle between the white man and the Indian begins. While this struggle is in progress, Richard Freneau discovers Gloria, and noting that Royce is otherwise occupied, the young broker bears the pretty heiress away in his arms. While they are still traversing the Everglades, Gloria returns to consciousness, finds herself in Freneau's arms and believes that it was the broker who rescued her from the Indians. Accordingly when they encounter Pierpont Stafford and David, Gloria's brother, Freneau is hailed as a hero.

Dr. Royce, after beating the Indian in a fistic bout, returns to the spot where he had left Gloria and is amazed to find her gone. Following the trail left by Freneau through the Everglades, Royce arrives just in time to hear Gloria telling her father of Freneau's bravery in saving her life.. Astonished that the broker can be such a cad as to claim credit for a rescue effected by another, Royce humbly retires to the hotel, as the chapter reaches its end. It is evident that he plans on a later reckoning with Freneau and hopes this times to come out the winner. This second chapter of the Hughes novel is entitled "Caught by the Seminoles," and will be generally released on Monday. May 29.

Exhibitors "On the Slide"

The Novelty Slide Company of New York has an extensive exhibit at the Exhibitors' League exposition at Grand Central Palace, New York. The complete process of making colored slides is shown and exhibitors' pictures are caught on the glass and presented to the originals free of charge.

Lesser Secures Rights

A quick-fire deal has been consummated between Carl Laemmle and Sol L. Lesser, whereby the All Star Feature Distributors secure "Where Are My Children?" for California, Nevada and Arizona, at a price that is said to be the largest ever paid for a film production for western territory.

Joseph Kaufman, who for the last three years has been directing for the Lubin Company, has now joined the forces of the Famous Players Film Company. Mr. Kaufman's first production for the Famous Players will be an adaptation of E. Phillip Oppenheim's story, "The Great Gamble," in which Pauline Frederick is to be starred.

What Theater Men Are Doing

AN OPEN FORUM

Getting the Crowds

By Frank Kavanaugh,
A Kansas City Exhibitor.

MY MOTION picture house is in one of the suburbs of Kansas City. My patrons are the people who work for small wages in the nearby factories. Saturday and Sunday of each week paid well; but the intervening days were dull—in fact the patronage was just about enough to meet the overhead expenses. I found I had to do something to make these days a profit, or I would have to cut the performances to about three a week. If I did this, most of the overhead would go right on accumulating on the days I run "dark."

I found that the schools near by closed about 2:30 Friday afternoon. My theater is on a street used by children going to and from school. From the exchange I leased three good comedies for Friday afternoon alone. These I advertised at the schools. Any child could attend after school hours Friday for three pennies. I advertised that they should bring the exact change; that the ticket seller would have none. The result was that I filled the house twice every Friday afternoon at 3 cents. After a few trials I added an educational picture that would appeal to the children. I changed the program for the night show. Friday afternoon, alone, now nets me about $12—all in pennies.

In the middle of the week the working people were, I knew, short of change. I arranged with the five best groceries catering to these people to sell their customers tickets at any time on credit. These tickets are good only for Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday shows. When the bills are paid by the grocers' customers Saturday night the tickets are included. I collect my money from the grocers Monday, and for their trouble give them a free advertising slide.

I find this plan fills the show every night and with the Friday afternoon "school kids' matinee" I am coming out with a good little balance in the bank at the end of each week. It has become so that I can count as net all that I take in Saturday and Sunday. And the grocers say trade with them is picking up, as people who formerly traded "up town" now trade nearer home, as, when they went to see a show, all they have to do is to go to their grocer and get tickets. So far the loss of the grocers and myself has been less than one-tenth of one per cent.

Operator, Janitor and Manager

By George O. Barlow,
Manager, Unique Theater, Steamboat Rock, Iowa.

My first venture into the picture business was made as a sort of experiment because I had a vacant store building. As I am a carpenter I overhauled the building myself, turned it into a theater and proceeded to business.

I am general factotum around the theater, being operator, janitor and manager. I pay all the bills promptly, inspect all films before they go into the machine, unless they arrive so late that this is impossible.

After each show all films have the proper band on each reel, the posters are neatly folded and tied in a bundle and all are packed in the shipping case with the right address and fired out on the first train.

It is not all sunshine and roses in the picture game; bad weather and other causes bump in now and then, but in the long run I manage to keep my head out of water.

There are just one hundred and one little things that must be just right to make one successful picture show. But I somehow like it after all.

Advertise—The Secret to Success

By C. W. Taylor,
Manager, O. K. Theater, Louisville, Kentucky.

I feel you could gain more information from an older and more experienced man, but I might say that as manager I run my theater on a business basis, as I do my other business.

This town is too small to support the kind of show I would like to run, yet I find it very essential to run good pictures and not tire your patrons with cheap service. If I have had a bad night, instead of getting a cheaper show to try to get it back, I try to get a better one, even at more cost—and have found from experience that it pays in the end.

No matter how good your picture may be, one must advertise. And I believe in the word "advertise" lies the secret to success.

Advertised His Organ

By S. L. Baxter,
Proprietor, Isis Theater, Denver, Colorado.

I have just installed a Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones unit orchestra organ in my theater and it is proving very attractive. As soon as this was in good working order I sent out a small folder to my regular patrons and a number of other people whom I believed would be interested in the innovation. This folder announced the installation of the new organ, gave enough description to arouse their interest, introduced them to the organists and gave the assurance that the organ would be used at all performances. This little advertising scheme entailed a very small expense and it brought the people to the theater.

I had aroused their interest, the organ was an innovation, and consequently my attendance was increased. My house has a seating capacity of 2,200 and I run nine shows a day with six reels per show.

Overcoming Strong Competition

By H. B. Freeman,

Proprietor, Edenland Theater, Franklin, Tennessee.

Before I entered the show business I spent nine years of my life working for the Adams & Southern Express Company, where I received some very fine business training. This town has been a poor show town due to the fact that it is only eighteen miles from Nashville, Tenn., and there is an interurban carline between the two places with cars running every hour of the day.

My house is small but I study the people to see what they want. I read the trade journals and keep posted as to what is being produced. Then I watch the shows at Nashville to see what draws best there and I get it as soon as possible.

I don't fail to advertise. I use slides in the show, twenty-four sheets on my own individual billboards, and give my personal attention to putting out the Heralds.

Here's a New Theater Project

By J. O. Bergantz,

Manager, Grand Theater, Huntingdon, Pennsylvania.

Our house has a seating capacity and since we began showing pictures in 1911 we haven't been closed for one night except Sundays. We do at times show regular road attractions.

Our theater was built by the Patriotic Order Sons of America, and the upper floor is used as their club rooms. The same scheme might be worked out in any town where there is a strong and influential order of some kind and someone to push them and manage the theater in the building right.

At the time we started pictures there were three other picture houses, small ones, in town, but they soon passed out. Our only competition now is the Opera House. Our comparatively easy sailing has been due to the fact that as a member of the board of directors of the order owning and sponsoring the building I insist on the very best pictures and no matter how much we need the money we always pay our film rental in advance.

For a number of years we ran the Universal program at five cents. We gradually injected features, until now we use the latter every night with the exception of Tuesday, when we run the Universal serial. With the feature we "serve" each night three reels of Universal program twelve or thirteen days old. We could, of course, run a cheaper service with our features but we have built our business on full and good measure and intend to stick to it. We are now showing on Monday, Equitable features; Tuesday, the Universal serial; Wednesday, World feature; Thursday, Metro feature; Friday, Red Feather feature and "The Red Circle," and Saturday, Blue Bird.

Our policy is simply to run the house the very best we can without injuring anyone else.

What a Woman Can Do

No statistics are available in regard to the number of women theater managers in the United States. But if they were sure of the gratifying success which has been achieved by Mrs. R. R. Moore of the Ideal Theater, Akron, Ohio, it is probable that there would be an exodus of business women theaterward.

In 1913 Mrs. Moore borrowed enough money to build a theater on a lot owned by her mother. The former personally superintended the construction and equipment of the house. Everything was in first class order for the opening and hundreds were turned away on the night the fine little house made its first bow to the public.

And the Ideal has been doing a good business ever since, the pictures, music and service being exactly as good, Mrs. Moore declares, as though a man were in charge. "We run only clean pictures, always have a clean house, and every patron gets a 'Thank you' at the box office and a 'Good Night' upon leaving," Mrs. Moore continues. "We seat only 249 but give our patrons the benefit of the bigger things in photoplays."

"The Battle Cry of Peace" was one of the features shown recently, with a six-piece orchestra accompaniment and red cross nurses as ushers. The Ideal now uses Paramount service five days a week. A weekly program has been issued for 15 months and space is carried in the three daily papers. One good feature about the programs is that the casts of characters are given.

Carl M. Le Vinese, who has had a number of years of directing experience, with producing companies on the Pacific Coast, has been placed in the directorship of one of the "Flying A" companies at the American Mutual studios in Santa Barbara. Director Le Viness will produce three-reel "Flying A" pictures. He has already begun work on his first subject, a drama in which the principal roles will be taken by Vivian Rich, Alfred Vosburgh and George Periolat. The title of this picture will be "Four Months."

Powell Resigns From Equitable

Frank Powell, producer of "The Chain Invisible" for the Equitable Film Corp., and now directing Gail Kane in "The Other Sister," for the same company, announces his resignation to take effect upon the completion of this picture. Mr. Powell has several excellent propositions at hand and will announce his new connection in the very near future.

Vitagraph Exhibits at Both Shows

NEW FEATURES ANNOUNCED

THE Vitagraph Company has signified its intention of being represented at both of the big trade shows and has taken large space at both the Grand Central Palace and Madison Square Garden. Its preparations for the two exhibitions has been elaborate, nothing being left undone to present this producer in its true proportion to the great film industry.

This company is preparing surprise novelties to be distributed as souvenirs by the Vitagraph stars themselves. All of the players are taking the keenest

Morey, Antonio Moreno, Charles Richman, Leah Baird, Billie Billings, Belle Bruce, Lucille Lee Stewart, Naomi Childers, little Helen Connelly, Adele DeGarde, Josephine Earle, Jewel Hunt, Dorothy Kelly, Mary Maurice, Arline Pretty, Kate Price, Julia Swayne Gordon, Rose Tapley, Betty Howe, Lucille Crane, Florence Natol, Alice Washburn, Bobby Connelly, Arthur Cozine, William Dangman, William Dunn, Edward Elkas, Joseph Kilgour, Hughie Mack, Charles Kent, James Morrison, Evart Overton, Anders Randolf, Templer Saxe, Richard Turner, Gerald Gordon, Wallie Van, William Shea, William Duncan, Huntley Gordon, and Charles Wellesley.

The Vitagraph booths will constantly be in charge of some one to meet guests officially. On successive dates Sam Spedon, Frank Shaw, Fred Schaefer, Ray E. Gallagher and others will be in charge. Visitors will be given the most cordial welcome and shown every courtesy.

Coming Blue Ribbons

Two coming Blue Ribbon features on the Vitagraph program are "Britton of the Seventh" and "The Ordeal of Elizabeth." In the latter play Lillian Walker is supported by Evart Overton. Some very clever and unique photographic effects are introduced into this play. The exterior scenes are very beautiful and Director Wilfrid North took his company to Jacksonville, Florida, in order to secure a number of these exteriors.

"His Dukeship, Mr. Jack," is the latest of "The Escapades of Mr. Jack," starring Frank Daniels. In this play Mr. Daniels is assisted by Alice Washburn and Adele De Garde. The picture is directed by C. Jay Williams.

"The Double Double Cross" is another single reel comedy in which William Dangman takes the leading part. He is supported by Lucille Crane, Winthrop Mendell, Jesse Miller and William Lyttel, Jr. The picture was written and directed by Frank Currier.

"Out Ag'in. In Ag'in" is the title of a comedy written by George McManus and directed by Lawrence Semon. Hughey Mack, John T. Kelly, Kate Price and Jewell Hunt play the important parts.

"O'Hagan's Scoop" is a newspaper drama in three parts, written by Ross D. Whytock and produced by Harry Davenport. The stellar roles are in the hands of Harry T. Morey and Belle Bruce, assisted by Robert Gaillard, Thomas R. Mills and Harry Davenport.

Paul Scardon, the Vitagraph Director, has completed "The Man Hunt," a three-part Broadway star feature, and it was released on April 29.

The Vitagraph Company is very fortunate in its editor-in-chief of the scenario department, Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady. Col. Brady has been wtih this company for three years and an interesting story is told of the way he started to work for them. He was writing a series of Mexican articles for a New York newspaper, and his son, after reading one of the articles suggested that it would make a wonderful motion picture. Acting on the suggestion the colonel met Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, delivered his story and started work for the Vitagraph Company and has been with them ever since. Besides his work as scenario editor Mr. Brady has written two plays which will be shown on Broadway next season, a novel and a number of scenarios. Before joining the Vitagraph Company Colonel Brady served in the United States Army and Navy for fourteen years, having graduated from the Infantry and Cavalry School at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. He was a member of the staff of General Leonard Wood. This army and navy life was a great preparation for Colonel Brady in his present occupation.

"The Wood Violet" is the name Anita Stewart, the Vitagraph star, has chosen for her bungalow at Bayshore. She may be forced to change it to Noah's Ark if her many admirers continue to send her the varied menagery which has been received recently. Miss Stewart now has bull pups, parrots, canaries and prize chickens. The only thing that worries Miss Stewart concerning this collection of furred and feathered pets is their meals. What each eats is a source of great worry, but she is rapidly learning their likes and dislikes and elaborate quarters are being installed for them at "The Wood Violet."

Stage and Screen Reversed

In the opinion of Hector Turnbull of the Photodramatic Staff of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, the time has come when the dramatic stage has begun to appreciate the material for the dramatic theaters which may be found in some of the best photoplays written originally for the screen. This opinion has been verified and the fact established that the screen itself has passed the day where it finds itself dependent upon material from the dramatic stage or novel by Mr. Turnbull's own experience.

Within several days subsequent to the first presentation in New York at the Strand Theater of Mr. Turnbull's photoplay, "The Cheat," with Fannie Ward produced by the Lasky Company, several Broadway theatrical managers advanced offers for the dramatic rights to "The Cheat." Arrangements have been completed by which A. H. Woods has secured the dramatic privileges to "The Cheat."

Kitty Gordon Film Company

A $150,000 corporation backed by prominent New York Wall street men is now being organized by Jack Wilson, the vaudeville actor, who has been appearing at the Palace theater in his own sketch, "An Impromptu Review," to be known as the Kitty Gordon Film Corporation. It is planned that eight feature pictures a year shall be produced with Miss Gordon in the leading role.

METRO'S ACTIVITIES

"Notorious Gallagher," and "The Spell of Yukon" Among New Releases for May—Changes in the Metro Forces

A strong five-reel feature is being produced by the Columbia Pictures Corporation and will be released on the Metro program May 22. The story, "Notorious Gallagher," is thoroughly human and strikes a realistic note throughout. Marguerite Snow and William Nigh are in the stellar roles and Mr. Nigh, who wrote the story, is also directing it. The strong supporting cast includes Robert Elliot, Roy Applegate, R. A. Bresee, Julius D. Cowles, Victor de Linsky, David Thompson, Cecilia Griffiths, Florence Vincent, Frank Montgomery and Martin U. Faust.

L. R. Stark, who has had four years' experience in various lines of the motion picture industry, has accepted a position with the Rolfe Photoplays, Inc., as assistant to Harry O. Hoyt, head of the scenario staff in the Rolfe studio. Mr. Stark will devote his time to reading scenarios submitted through Arthur James, Metro's scenario editor, and also reading books that give promise of being suitable for picturization.

Mme. Petrova has returned from a three weeks' vacation spent in Bermuda and Porto Rico. She was on the verge of a nervous breakdown following her continuous work in the studio but now is fully recovered and has already started work on another production. Mme. Petrova is a literary woman of no mean ability and in the near future will give a series of readings of her own poems at the Little Theater, New York. In addition to the poems she will also give brief talks on some of her favorite topics, the first of which will be, "The True Feminism."

Christine Mayo will make her debut as leading lady on the Metro program in "The Spell of the Yukon," a five-part play in which Edmund Breese is starred. This is an adaptation arranged by Wallace C. Clifton from the poem of the same name.

Leander de Cordova, the new assistant director who is working with Charles Horan producing "The Quitter," with Lionel Barrymore in the stellar role, is proving very useful while the players are at work along the Mexican border. Mr. de Cordova speaks seven languages besides the pigeon Mexican English used along the border.

Robert C. Smith, who for many years was in charge of the Dietrich Brothers boardwalk gallery in Atlantic City, has been engaged by the Popular Plays and Players as head cameraman for all Mme. Petrova's features made for the Metro program.

William Nigh, the Metro director, brought his college training into play recently to make an effective scene. In the courtroom scene in "Notorious Gallagher," he wanted to arouse an appearance of intense interest and sympathy in the jury. All efforts failed until he remembered a very touching tale he used to recite at college. He tried it on the jury and soon five of them were weeping and the effect desired was obtained. Incidentally the five soft hearted actors each received three dollars extra for their tears.

Lionel Thompson arrived at the country home of Mr. and Mrs. David Thompson, in New Rochelle, Sunday, April 23. The proud father is an assistant director at the Columbia-Metro studios, and he named the boy after Lionel Barrymore, who has worked under his direction in several Metro pictures.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

WHILE this department started out primarily with the idea of giving the readers of Motography a chance to ask questions, I believe a number of our exhibitors would like to answer them also, and that they are well qualified to do so. I have no jealousy at all about being the only oracle dispensing information, and would be very glad to have some of the questions appearing in this department also answered by exhibitors. No doubt many of the queries discussed herein are along lines which you have already worked out yourself in a successful manner. You may have some original ideas on the subject which would be of great help to your fellow-exhibitor seeking information. Please, therefore, do not consider this simply as a question department, but also as an answer department, and whenever you can cast a little light on some problem under discussion send me a letter for publication giving your views on the subject, and thus you will be sharing the benefit of your experience with others. If you are diffident about having your name appear it can be omitted, but your ideas were worth something to you and they will be just as valuable to someone else. Let us make this a give and take proposition and all reap the reward.

23—I notice in the March 25 issue of Motography you decline to answer Question 4—"What is the best screen?" Would you object to telling me the different kinds of screens which might be used and advise as to which gives the best results?

This correspondent evidently is going to get around my refusal in some way and insist upon an opinion. My objection was to arbitrarily recommending the products of any one company in this department. I have no objection whatever to telling you about the different classes of screens used and their relative merits, as this is a very important point to be taken into consideration in equipping a theater. A poor screen will not only give poor pictures but it will affect the eyes of the audience to such an extent that much of the pleasure of the entertainment will be spoiled. The choice of a screen must necessarily be guided to a large extent by the size and class of the theater, and also by the amount of money the manager feels he can expend upon this part of his equipment.

A screen may be a muslin curtain, a white painted drop, a metal surface, a plaster screen or a glass mirror screen. The surface of the screen may be shiny or dull. In determining the surface of your screen the fact should be taken into consideration that a shiny surface is very hard on the eyes and simply reflects glare, while a dull surface is restful to the eyes and diffuses the light. For this reason the practice of painting the surface of the screen with aluminum or gold bronze to make it shiny is rather to be condemned, for while it appears to make the picture brighter and gives a greater contrast between the lights and shadows, it makes a glare of light which reacts unpleasantly upon the eyes of the audience.

Of the screens mentioned the muslin is the cheapest but also possesses the lowest reflecting value. A muslin or canvas screen is often necessary for the reason that the screen has to be rolled up out of the way during vaudeville acts, which would of course be impossible with metallic surfaces or glass mirror screens. If a rolling drop is used means must be employed to fasten it securely at the sides and bottom to prevent its waving in the currents of air passing through the theater, as any movement of the screen produces very disagreeable results and should be reduced to the lowest possible limit. A heavy pole may be used at the bottom of the drop or a tackle employed to fasten it securely to the stage. If the curtain does not have to be raised the fabric may be mounted on a wooden frame and stretched tight, so there is no possibility of movement.

The plaster screens are also cheap and are better reflectors of light than muslin. Plaster screens having a dead white finish coat give good results if kept clean. If the screen is to be placed flat against the wall a white finish coat can be given by the plasterers, and a black painted border run around for a frame. The border should not be neglected, for it adds greatly to the value of the projection and is effective in eliminating the ragged edge appearance of an old or patched film.

The most expensive screen, and at the same time the most effective is the mirror screen. The mirror used for this purpose is of thick glass, silvered on the back and the face prismized to a dull white finish without gloss or shine. The principal virtue of the mirror screen is that in producing a picture it has perfect perspective, and also medical men claim that the mirror screen with its frosted surface is the easiest upon the eye. The ground glass surface reflects a portion of the light, the balance passing through the glass to the silvered surface where it is again reflected back to the audience. The image of the picture is caught in front of the mirror and the effect is the same as if you were standing in front of a mirror and see yourself reflected just as you are, with perfect roundness and stereoscopic appearance.

In placing your screen, if the projector is above the center of the screen, as it generally is, and is pointed down, it is necessary to tip the screen back at the top so that it is perpendicular to the optical center of the projector. If this is not done, the image on the screen will be distorted, the amount of distortion being proportional to the angle made by the optical center with the screen. For the same reason, the projector should be set exactly in the center of the screen in a horizontal direction.

24—I have been contemplating the selling of candy in my theater. Do you think there is any profit to be gained from this sale? How would you advise my handling this?

There is always a question as to whether the sale of candy is an addition or a detriment and whether the small profit made in this way is worth the trouble involved. There is always the drawback to be considered that the boxes or papers in which the candy is wrapped will be liberally strewn over the theater, giving it a very untidy appearance. It is almost impossible to keep these cleaned up as the audience is changing so incessantly and every newcomer is liable to add his little offering to the pile of debris already accumulated, and this array of empty boxes and torn papers is anything but pleasing.

There are three ways of distributing this candy—by a vender; in slot boxes attached to the back of the seats; or by selling it at a little stand inside the lobby of the theater.

The vender is in almost all cases a nuisance to the audience. He attempts to distribute his wares during the intermission, which is the time when the aisles are congested with the outgoing and incoming crowds, and his "patter' is generally anything but interesting.

There are a number of firms manufacturing small metal boxes to be fastened to the backs of the seats containing small packages of candy. These boxes are operated by a slot and a nickel or dime inserted in the slot brings forth the desired carton of candy. This is an easy way of distribution and much to be preferred to the vender going about the theater.

If you are determined to go into the candy business the neat little stand in the lobby is the best method. Here you can have a larger assortment of confections and at the same time the sale does not in any way interfere with the program of the theater. Frankly speaking, however, I do not think the sale of candy adds anything to your establishment and it is usually more bother than anything else.

25—I have one or two problems on my mind, regarding which I will be pleased to have your opinion. The first is the matter of location and a background for the orchestra. I have noticed in some theaters that they use a curtain about three feet high in front of the orchestra pit, which I understand is to protect the audience from the glare of light one naturally gets from the lights on the music racks. It is a question in my mind, whether this reflection of light is more detrimental to the audience than the effect it might have in reducing the volume of tone of the music. I will be pleased to have your opinion as to whether the curtain is or is not being used in the better class of theaters.

Now that music is playing such an important part in the program of the moving picture theater the matter of the location and arrangement of the orchestra is a problem. In many cases a solution is hard to obtain for the reason that the manager is not able to arrange this matter as he would like to, but rather as the space and the general plan of the theater permits. The ideal disposition of the musicians is on the stage, or in a balcony especially constructed for this purpose, and these are the two plans which are being used by the highest class theaters today. If the orchestra is placed on the stage palms and flowers can be arranged to cover the lights and also to hide the musicians and at the same time they do not interfere in the least with the effect of the music. This plan is effective also from the artistic standpoint and the bank of palms and flowers used for hiding the players adds to the general beauty of the theater. The balcony especially constructed for the orchestra also adds to the artistic effect of the theater as it is built in as a part of the architectural plan. In this case an ornamental railing hides the musicians, or a two or three-foot curtain harmonizing with the general color plan of the decorations, is used around the balcony. When the orchestra of necessity has to be placed in the pit in front of the stage the same bank of palms and flowers is often used instead of the curtain, and this eliminates any tendency of reducing the volume or tone of the music caused by the curtain. I think you will find, however, that the depletion in the volume or tone of the music by a loosely hung curtain is negligible.

26—A matter that interests more especially the exhibitor like myself who is located a considerable distance from the exchange centers and does not have an opportunity to review pictures before showing, is the question of proper advertising. It is my experience that the press matter furnished by the exchanges is oftentimes very misleading. This is a hard matter to get action on but I really think there should be enough complaints made from all sources to bring the proper pressure to bear on the various releasing organizations to furnish better press matter for their subjects.

The exhibitor whose theater is located in the city does have an advantage over his brother-manager situated in the outlying districts in that he has the opportunity of witnessing the films from start to finish in the projection rooms of the film companies. There are ways, however, in which the exhibitor who has not this advantage can overcome the disadvantages presented. If he uses second and third run films it is well to make frequent visits to the nearest cities and attend three or four of the performances of the larger theaters where he can view the films of which he has read and at the same time listen to the comments of the audience. A careful study of the audience is an invaluable guide in the selection of films to please your patrons for a moving picture audience is much the same wherever gathered and what especially pleases the people in one theater will be pretty sure to be well received in another. The energetic and wide awake theater manager will be pretty well able to pick a good program, however, whether he sees the film before or not, if he will make a practice of studying carefully the trade papers. These papers always announce the new releases and the date of their release and give a little commentation on the kind of story they show. Also these papers always carry reviews of the releases which give fully the story of the play. In the pages of Motography are given very thorough reviews as well as announcements of the latest releases, and I am sure a perusal of these pages will give the exhibitor a very clear idea of the nature of the film he is selecting and allow him to judge whether it will be suitable to and popular with the patrons to whom he is catering, whether he has a chance to see the film itself or not.

The exchanges aim to please in the press matter which they distribute, and if you would write them a letter stating just wherein you think this advertising matter fails of reaching the goal intended I am sure they would be very glad indeed of any suggestions, and would do their best to conform to any ideas which they believed were reasonable and logical.

A great deal of time and studying was devoted to the securing of a capable cast to support De Wolf Hopper in Fine Arts' "Casey at the Bat," and after much deliberation, the following cast was assigned to Director Ingraham: Marguerite Marsh, Frank Bennett, Kate Toncray, Carl Stockdale, Elmo Lincoln and little May Giraci, who played with De Wolf Hopper in "Don Quixote."

M. Cutler, for the past year sales manager of the Chicago branch of the Famous Players Film Service, Inc., has tendered his resignation to take effect May 15. For several years prior to joining the Famous Players' forces Mr. Cutler was doing a constructive work, being in the employ of several string theater owners building up the patronage of their houses.

V. L. S. E. Announces Attractive Features

PROMINENT STARS GLEAM IN NEW SHADOW DRAMAS

ANOTHER of Daniel Carson Goodman's remarkable psychological dramas in five reels, is scheduled for May 8. It is entitled "Love's Toll," and features Rosetta Brice and Richard Buhler. It is the triangle of two men in love with the same girl, and contains some very tense dramatic scenes.

For May 15, Vitagraph will show a six-reel drama entitled, "The Ordeal of Elizabeth," featuring Lillian Walker and Evart Overton. This is a story of an ill-fated marriage and a false accusation of murder, which is finally straightened out through many exciting scenes.

An important event in the world of pictures is scheduled for May 15, when Essanay will present "Sherlock Holmes," with William Gillette posing as Conan Doyle's famous detective. Mr. Gillette, himself, prepared the scenario for this play, and as rendered in seven reels by the author it bids fair to rival its success before the footlights. A competent cast supports Mr. Gillette, including Alice Faulkner, Ernest Maupain and Edward Fielding.

On May 22 Vitagraph will release a five-reel production of "The Redemption of Dave Darcey," written by Charles T. Dazey and directed by Paul Scardon. The plot of this play is one of intense heart interest, simple in construction, yet alive with exciting situations. It tells the tale of a man's fight against heavy odds to redeem himself from his past. James Morrison, Belle Bruce, Billie Billings and Mary (Mother) Maurice, are featured in this production.

Another Vitagraph release will be "The Suspect," a five-part drama to be released May 29. This feature was written by H. J. W. Bam and directed by Mr. Drew. Anita Stewart and S. Rankin Drew will play the leading roles. This story deals with Nihilism and gives Miss Stewart a role totally different from any in which she has before appeared, and affords a chance for her to display her ability in handling a part which calls for tremendous tragic concentration.

Other releases on this program include "The Law Decides," and "Britton of the Seventh," two five-reel Vitagraph productions; and "At Piney Ridge" and "Into the Primitive," two five-reel Selig releases.

For the first time in the history of the motion picture industry a body of exhibitors saw fit to openly acknowledge the services of an exchange when the Associated Motion Picture Exhibitors of Brooklyn officially endorsed the business policy of the V. L. S. E. in a resolution which was passed unanimously. The policy thus endorsed was the V. L. S. E. booking of its pictures on the open market, known as "Open Booking."

Two changes have been made in the V. L. S. E. exchange staffs. J. C. Kendall, of the Cincinnati branch, has been promoted from booker to salesman; and J. A. Steinson, formerly an exhibitor at McAlister, Okla., has been engaged as salesman at the Dallas office.

In a "favorite star" contest recently conducted by the Evening Journal of Ottawa, Canada, Henry B. Walthall, Essanay V. L. S. E. star, polled a tremendous vote, and won first place in the male division with a substantial lead. The final poll of the feminine vote in the same competition found Grace Cunard in first place, Mary Pickford second, and Anita Stewart, the Vitagraph star, third. Miss Stewart's admirers voted for her strongly during the closing stages of the contest and forced her from sixth place to third.

A Thousand Charlie Chaplins

Tom North, northwestern manager of the V. L. S. E. at Seattle, aided by the editor of the Seattle Star and John Hamrick, manager of the Rex Theater, organized a Charlie Chaplin parade in that city. A number of prizes were offered for the best imitation of Chaplin and nearly a thousand youths, both boys and girls, joined in the parade. The costumes were varied and spectacular, some clinging to the old-style Chaplin outfit of tramp clothes and extensive shoes, while others followed out the new fashion set by Charles in his latest screen adaptations.

While the Big Four spectacle, "The Battle Cry of Peace," has proved a tremendous stimulus to recruiting in both army and navy circles, the western branch of the V. L. S. E. at Seattle, under the management of Tom North, offers a still more convincing proof of the belief of the organization in the nation-wide slogan of "get ready for possible trouble." This is in the form of a statement that it will pay ten days' salary to such of its employes as are National Guardsmen during the ten days militia camp this summer, and undoubtedly as soon as the militia camp near Seattle is ready for business the Big Four employes will be there in force.

Ralph Ince Begins Railroad Drama

Ralph W. Ince is about to start work on a railroad drama, which we are told, will be a second "Juggernaut," and when the excellence of that classic is remembered, something big can well be expected. The name and length of the picture is not known as yet. It will take at least eight weeks to complete the filming. Lucille Lee Stewart, Mr. Ince's new leading woman; Huntley Gordon, and William Dangman will portray the principal characters and will be assisted in its enactment by a company of recognized ability.

Director Ralph W. Ince, Vitagraph.

A large open air studio is being erected for the Vitagraph Company by Managing-Director Ince. It will be located directly in the rear of the Bay Shore Plant and will enable the Long Island forces to have six sets for use when required. This makes the task of those connected with the filming of the pictures very agreeable.

Mr. Ince informs us that an up-to-date exhibition room, perfect in every way has just been finished. This finishing touch makes the plant complete in every detail.

Hoffman Now Lasky General Manager

Milton E. Hoffman has left his position as general manager of the Peerless Feature Producing Company at Fort Lee, New Jersey, to accept the position of general manager of studios of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company at Hollywood, California.

In Eastern film circles few active men in the industry are better known that Mr. Hoffman, who has been prominent since its organization, in the practical affairs of the World Special Film Corporation. He was general manager for the Peerless Company for the past two years.

Mr. Hoffman has achieved exceptional success in the motion picture field following a thorough understanding and experience in the theatrical business.

Nat Goodwin and a company of players from the Mirror Films studio have gone to Quebec where they will appear in the exterior scenes of the fourth Mirror picture in which Mr. Goodwin is to be featured by the Mirror company.

Exhibitors Fight New York Bill

At a banquet and business meeting held by the members of the New York State Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association much opposition was expressed to the proposed legislation providing for a state board of motion picture censors to be appointed by the Board of Regents, and resolutions were adopted protesting to Governor Whitman not to sign the Cristman-Wheeler censorship bill.

It was also decided to select representatives of the association to appear before Governor Whitman at the hearing, and oppose the censorship bill.

More than two hundred motion picture exhibitors were present from the larger cities in the state. The principal speakers of the evening were W. Stephen Bush, of the Motion Picture World, and Lee A. Ochs, president of the New York branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Mr. Bush spoke of the necessity of co-operation among the exhibitors to enable them to properly protect their business interest in all parts of the country.

Mr. Ochs in a very interesting speech pointed out that their organiation through persistent and vigorous work had succeeded in placing all matters in connection with the New York State exhibitors upon a more harmonious basis, which he believed would surely result in big things to the advantage of exhibitors throughout the state.

William Fox, president of the Fox Film Corporation, has written a comprehensive and convincing letter to Governor Whitman objecting to the pending Christman-Wheeler bill as an exhibitor, owner of 22 theaters and producer.

Real Film Song Appears

One of the features of the two spectacular expositions, which the motion picture "fans" of the country have in store for them, will be a real film song. It has been written by two women and named after and dedicated to Florence Lawrence, the screen favorite. The words are by Margaret J. MacDonald and the music by Emma R. Steiner. It is a real motion melody, the music running to a lively dance including waltz, fox-trot and one-step.

The song will be sung and danced at both expositions, Grand Central Palace and Madison Square Garden, by well-known artists. The words and music will be on sale to the public and the proceeds will be donated to the Motion Picture Campaign for the Actors' Fund.

New York General Office Moved

The General Film Company, Inc., has moved its New York headquarters from the Fifth Avenue building to the Passavant building, 440 Fourth avenue, corner of 30th street, where the top floor has been entirely remodeled with a view of providing the necessary requirements in the way of space for the different departments. The branch office of the General Film Company, Inc., in West 23d street, will remain where it is.

Stanhope Wheatcroft, who will be seen for the first time in a Fox film made by Director James Vincent, also will be seen shortly afterwards in the latest Theda Bara picture now in the making at the Eclair studio at Fort Lee.

Winifred Greenwood is featured in "Lying Lips," supported by Franklin Ritchie, and the cast is comprised of Eugenie Forde, Clarence Burton, Roy Stewart, and George Webb.

scenes of "A Man's Soul," a five-part production. The theme of this play has to do with a leper colony and the scenes are very realistic.

Although the Signal Film Corporation has only been in the producing field about five months, it has been so successful that it was recently found necessary to remodel and enlarge its plant. An option is held on a large site on both the west and east sides of the studio property, which, when taken over will furnish the Signal Company with one of the largest sites of its kind in that section of the country. Just now work at the studio is being centered on the last two reels of "Whispering Smith," which is to be released in the Mutual five-reel feature. This production is being directed by J. P. McGowan, who also appears in the title role. Helen Holmes, Leo Maloney, Paul Hurst and Thomas Lingham also appear in the play.

For the week of May 8 will be released "Soul Mates," from the American studio, with William Russel and Carlotta Burton in the principal roles, supported by Leona Hutton, Henry Keenan and several others. Another Masterpicture will be "Her Father's Gold," a Thanhouser contribution, starring Louise Emerald Bates, Harris Gordon and Barbara Gilroy.

Short length features for the week of May 8 lead off with a three-reel American-Mutual drama, "The Profligate," the chief roles of which were assigned to Edward Coxen and Winnifred Greenwood.

Vogue comedies include "Germantic Love," with Arthur Travares and Madge Kirby. Beauty's offerings are "Skelly's Skeleton," released May 10, and "No Title," released May 14. "Jerry's Perfect Day" is the title of the Cub comedy featuring George Ovey to be released May 12.

Second "Reel Life" release of May 14 and Mutual Weekly No. 71 and "See America First," released on May 10, complete the production.

Ann Pennington with Famous

Ann Pennington, whose reputation has been won to a large extent by her clever work in the Follies for the last three years, has signed a long term contract with the Famous Players Film Company to star in the productions of that concern on the Paramount program. "Susie Snowflake," a play filled with the atmosphere of the musical comedy stage, has been chosen as the first release starring Miss Pennington and it will provide her with an opportunity to "be natural" in her screen introduction.

Miss Pennington, small in stature and in years, says she has no ambition to be a tragedian but would like to do some real comedy roles with perhaps a touch of pathos.

New General Manager for Lasky

Milton E. Hoffman, who for the last two years has been general manager of the Peerless Feature Producing Company at Fort Lee, N. J., has left that company to accept the position of general manager of the studios of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company at Hollywood, California. Mr. Hoffman's position with the Lasky Company is specially created as he will displace no one at the studio organization.

Mr. Hoffman's film experience was preceded by an active and varied theatrical experience. He is well known in eastern film circles as he has been prominent in the industry since its organization and in the practical affairs of the World Special Film Corporation.

Barry Resigns From Powers

William ("Bill") Barry, one of the most popular and best known men in the motion picture industry, former secretary of the Screen Club, and for the past several years advertising manager of the Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of motion picture machines, has announced his resignation to take effect on May 1. Mr. Barry has secured an interest in the Monroe Press, an old established printing house, and judging from the energy and perseverance he put into his work while with the Powers Company, the success he merits will be no doubt assured.

Big Themes in Pathe Series

"WHO'S GUILTY" FEATURES TOM MOORE AND ANNA NILSSON

BEFORE May 8, the date of release of the first photo-novel in Pathe's "Who's Guilty?" series, produced by Arrow Film Corporation, eight of the fourteen photo-novels comprising this series had been delivered by the producers to Pathe. This in itself marks a record in photoplay production even for a record-breaking series.

It has made possible, too, the delivery by Pathe to the many newspapers which will run the "Who's Guilty?" stories of six complete novels prior to the publication of the first one. Thereby the newspapers have been enabled to give these stories unusually fine space and layouts.

It was decided to release these pictures in the following sequence: "Puppets of Fate," May 8; "The Tight Rein," May 15; "The Tangled Web," May 22; "The Silent Shame," May 29 and "Sowing the Wind" on June 5. These are the first five of the "Who's Guilty?" series.

All of these photo-novels are problem plays that present a terrific indictment of certain present-day habits and conventions of society. They are concerned with the moral guilt of the men and women back of those immediately guilty. They are pages out of life as it is lived by us all, showing us as the creatures of environment and circumstance and caught in the whirlpool of our strenuous existence.

Miss Anna Nilsson and Tom Moore, the co-stars of the "Who's Guilty?" series, are seen in a variety of roles that call for the highest histrionic ability. No two of the stories are alike in plot, set, or costume; the result has been to tax to the limit the energies of the players, of Howell Hansel and Lawrence B. McGill, who are directing the "Who's Guilty?" stories, and of Hickson, the Ffth avenue modiste who has designed Miss Nilsson's gowns exclusively for the "Who's Guilty?" series.

"Puppets of Fate," the first of the series, hinges on the moral and legal right of a surgeon to perform a serious operation on a member of his own family. Medical and surgical ethics frown on such a practice: but there is no legal prevention of it. When the surgeon in "Puppets of Fate" makes his big mistake, it is left to the audience to determine who actually is guilty—the surgeon, his wife, a wealthy widow who has perhaps over-encouraged his ambitions, a fellow-surgeon, or the latter's wife.

In the same manner the right of a parent to determine whom his son shall marry is presented in "The Tight Rein." Out of the desire of a Puritanical mill-owner to weld two fortunes through the mating of his son with another mill-owner's daughter comes a cataclismic tragedy that affects the son, the daughter, the parents and many others.

In "The Tangled Web," the third of the "Who's Guilty?" series, there is presented the problem of love versus money, the primal instinct of a woman to possess her husband's love rather than to be merely the choicest possession his money has brought him.

The fourth of the series, "The Silent Shame," attacks the divorce evil, which now is arousing the interest of ministers, jurists, law-makers and laymen everywhere. A too hasty judgment of an innocent man's act—whereby he is forced to take up the life of a haunted and hunted criminal—is the basis of "Sowing the Wind." The economic struggle—a wealthy wife and a poor husband—is shown in "Sold Out," the sixth of the "Who's Guilty?" series. "Truth Crushed to Earth" concerns itself with the attitude of parents toward their children, of punishment given in moments of passion, of truth and honor crushed when they should be rewarded. "The Weaker Strain" asks the question—should a wife be dependent on her husband or has she a right to a career of her own, gained solely by her own efforts?

It is on big but homely themes like these that the "Who's Guilty?" pictures have been built. It is believed that a new dramatic note has been reached in this Arrow-made series released by Pathe.

Pathe Directors Formerly Actors

Two more dissimilar men in many respects could not be found than Howell Hansel and Lawrence B. McGill, who are directing the fourteen photo-novels comprising "Who's Guilty?" the new Pathe series being produced by the Arrow Film Corporation. Yet in some respects they are decidedly similar, each succeeded through hard work, each put in an apprenticeship on the stage, and each is fairly possessed of the mania for hard work.

Mr. Hansel made his debut on the stage with Madame Modjeska. For a number of years after this he led the nomadic life of an actor supporting Margaret Mather, James O'Neil and Kyrle Bellew and playing second lead to Robert Edson. For three years he was with Charles Frohman and then followed stock engagements in New York, Philadelphia, Denver, Indianapolis, Montreal and Chicago, and ending with six years in the Castle Square stock company of Boston, from which he entered the motion picture field as a member of the directing staff of the Thanhouser Company.

Mr. Hansel is not merely an actor who has become a photoplay director but is a well-rounded, well-balanced character, and as famed for his work in wood, brass and copper.

Mr. McGill started his theatrical career as a member of a traveling minstrel troupe and then he joined a repertoire company. Advancing quickly McGill became known as a clever youth who could and would play any part on call. Soon he had money enough to form his own company, and then followed twenty years of stock company production. In the motion picture field Mr. McGill was for three years director in the old Reliance plant, from there he was with the All-Star and Metro before he joined the Arrow forces.

"Iron Claw" Going Strong

The Chicago Herald recently had the following to say of Pathe's serial success, "The Iron Claw":

> "The Iron Claw" rage has struck Chicago and vicinity. Over 112 theaters in this locality are using the serial and daily requests for one episode or another are reaching the Chicago Pathe office. This is true also in New York and the West. Serials have a way of starting out bravely and coming to a sad end. The interest becomes indifferent and the story gets to a place where it lacks punch. "The Iron Claw" has proved that is not a necessary result. Instead of starting out with a smashing wave, it broke quietly into existence and has been gaining in favor ever since. "The Perils of Pauline" and "The Exploits of Elaine" were both from the Pathe studio, and considered at the time of their release wonderful examples of successful serials, but these have faded into nothing as compares with the sale of "The Iron Claw." "The Iron Claw" has proved from the number of prints exhibited that it is up to date the most popular continued pictorial story ever made.

The above is but one of a large number of expressions of approval of Pathe's recent photodramatic work.

ESSANAYS FOR MAY AND JUNE

Many Stars With Strong Supporting Casts Mark the Essanay Releases for These Two Months

Essanay's policy is not only good stories for both features and short films, but also good casts to support the pictures. This policy is well demonstrated in the releases of this company for May and June.

"That Sort," a five-reel picturization of Basil McDonals Hasting's play, soon to be released, offers an example of this method. In it are four stars, Warda Howard, Ernest Maupain, Duncan McRae and John Lorenz, together with the best Essanay has in its company to support them. So it is also with "According to the Code," also in five acts, which includes Lewis S. Stone, Marguerite Clayton, E. H. Calvert and Sydney Ainsworth in its cast.

William Gillette in "Sherlock Holmes," now ready for release, in seven acts, is also supported by an exceptional cast which includes most of the players who were with him on the stage as well as Essanay actors headed by Ernest Maupain.

In the five-reel release, "The Little Shepard of Bargain Row," Sallie Fisher, the musical star, is featured with Richard C. Travers and John Junior, supported by John Cosser and Patrick Calhoun.

The shorter pictures have also received just as much attention. In the three-reel offerings for May Bryant Washburn and Nell Craig are to be seen in "Once a Thief." Ann Kirk, Edmund F. Cobb, together with Patrick Calhoun and Richardson Cotton, appear in "A Rose of Italy." "The Jester," with John Junior and Gertrude Glover; and "The Schemers," complete the three-reel subjects.

"The Song in the Dark," is a two-reel reissue due May 30 featuring Richard C. Travers. "The Condemnation" is an original two-reel offering with Darwin Karr and Nell Craig. Lillian Drew, Harry Dunkinson and Edward Arnold are the principals in "A Return to Youth—and Trouble," a two-reel light comedy adaptation from one of Albert Payson Terhune's short stories. "The Double Cross," also in two acts, is offered with Elizabeth Burbridge and Patrick Calhoun.

Leading the one-reel offerings are the new George Ade fables, "The Fable of the Willing Collegian who was Hunting for a Foothold" was filmed with some of the leading business professional men of Chicago taking part. Others just completed are "The Fable of the Good Fairy With the Lorgnette and Why She Got It Good," and "The Fable of the Preacher Who Flew His Kite, But Not Because He Wished to Do So." Each one is a guaranteed scream.

NEW UNICORN EXCHANGES

General Manager Schlank of the Unicorn Film Service Corporation Completes Organization of Territories—New Officers

Ike Schlank, general manager of the Unicorn Film Service Corporation, recently returned from a trip in the Middle West where he completed the organization in that territory of the exchanges which are to handle the Unicorn program of twenty-one reels weekly, made up of comedies, dramas and western plays of one and two-reel lengths. There are eighteen exchanges now operating in the cities of New York, Boston, Springfield, Bangor, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Kansas City, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, Chicago, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Detroit and Cincinnati.

J. A. Eslow, formerly manager of the Boston Universal exchange, has been appointed Western Division Manager. He is now engaged in the preliminary work attached to the opening of Unicorn exchanges in his territory.

By May 15 exchanges in San Francisco, Denver, Salt Lake City, Seattle, Washington, Portland, and Los Angeles will be added to the above list.

Fred J. Murphy, former president and owner of the United Film Service in Boston and Buffalo, has been appointed eastern division manager.

Mr. Schlank's vast experience in the motion picture industry is reflected in the manner in which he is strengthening the links in his chain of exchanges. He has bent his efforts towards securing men with established reputations and proven ability in the various territories in which they are to handle Unicorn service.

Mr. Schlank is now on a trip South where he will open exchanges in Atlanta, Washington, New Orleans and Dallas.

The officers and directors of the company are: Leslie R. Palmer, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, president; J. A. Coram, vice-president; Ike Schlank, vice-president. Mr. Schlank during his long association in the film business has operated theaters in St. Louis, Kansas City, and Omaha, and is well-known as an independent exchange manager in the Middle West.

Alwyn Ball, Jr., prominent for his real estate operations in and about New York City, is treasurer. J. A. McKinney is secretary of the concern. Mr. McKinney has been an active figure in film circles for years. Quick action and silent force are his characteristics, and through them he has won the respect and confidence of his business associates. He was formerly a director in the Universal Company as well as being engaged in the organization and management of other film organizations.

P. A. Chase has been named as comptroller of Unicorn. This appointment is in line with the company's policy of having every department of its organization manned by people of known ability. Some time ago Mr. Chase was the auditor of Warner's Features, Inc.

Only recently he occupied a similar position with the World-Equitable from which he resigned to take up his new post with Unicorn. Mr. Chase will have as his assistant, Frank L. Drumm, who also recently resigned from World-Equitable.

Eight Stars in New Triangles

SWEEP WHOLE DRAMATIC GAMUT

THE Triangle entertainment for May features eight stars and eight Fine Arts and Ince pictures, as well as twice that number of comedies from the Sennett studios. Important among these features are the first appearance of William Collier as a light comedian of the screen and the second picture Mae

Robert Harron and Mae Marsh in "A Child of the Paris Streets."

Marsh has completed since the Triangle was organized.

Collier and Fairbanks featured in two releases for the week of May 7. "The Good Bad Man," for which Fairbanks wrote his own scenario, was selected by S. L. Rothapfel to dedicate his new Rialto theater. This play shows the star as a sort of film Robin Hood in a western environment. Bessie Love plays opposite him, and Sam De Grasse, Mary Alden, Pomeroy Cannon and Bred Burns have important parts.

"The No-Good Guy," in which Collier is starring, is a five-reel comedy. In this play the comedian portrays the part of a ne'er-do-well spendthrift, and Enid Markey plays the clever female detective. Charles K. French, Robert Kortman and J. Frank Burke head the supporting cast.

Two women stars, Dorothy Gish and Bessie Barriscale, furnish the May 14 releases. Miss Barriscale has a powerful play entitled "Not My Sister." James Montgomery and C. Gardner Sullivan collaborated on the scenario for this play. The supporting cast are William Desmond, Franklin Ritchie and Alice Taafe.

In "Susan Rocks the Boat" Dorothy Gish takes the part of a modern Joan of Arc. In this picture she again has the support of Owen Moore.

Mae Marsh has completed the new Fine Arts picture, "A Child of the Paris Streets," which will be released May 21. This play is a highly spectacular and dramatic story of the Latin quarter and in it Miss Marsh plays the part of a little Apache. With her are playing Robert Harron, Tully Marshall, Jennie Lee, Carl Stockdale, Loyola O'Connor and Bert Hadley.

Another release of this same week will be "The Primal Lure," in which William S. Hart will make his last appearance for some time in his familiar western characterization. Hopper in "Mr. Goode, the Samaritan," and Warner starring in "The Market of Vain Desire," will be released the end of the month.

Al St. John, who started out as one of the original Keystone police, and established the traditions of this unique force, has jumped into the headlines and will be starred in the next Triangle comedy made at the eastern studios of the corporation. Roscoe Arbuckle will direct the new production and Alice Lake will play the leading feminine role.

The publicity department of the Triangle Film Corporation has begun a campaign of education in which it is endeavoring to teach the exhibitor that the newspapers have many departments besides the photoplay in which he may break into print, and that the editors of each of these departments are glad to get news or features designed to interest their readers. A new form press sheet is the text book in this educational campaign. These bulletins contain stories with a couple of lines above each indicating the department of the paper for which it is designed.

The Knickerbocker theater, New York, for several months the Triangle Film Corporation's model for its hundreds of exhibitors, has closed its doors on Griffith-Ince-Sennett motion picture productions. Thus the new Rialto theater becomes the first-run home of Triangle pictures, and the successful opening of this theater appears to be the explanation for the sudden decision of the Triangle. The Knickerbocker has been leased for a term of years by Charles Frohman, Klaw & Erlanger, the former lessees.

Congratulations on "Civilization"

The appreciation with which "Civilization," Thomas H. Iince's million-dollar spectacle, is being received is denoted by the flood of congratulatory telegrams sent to Mr. Ince. From all parts of southern California these notes of praise are coming in. Noteworthy among these is one from Governor Hiram W. Johnson of California, another from Harry H. Culver, the noted California realty magnate, one from David A. Hamburger, the millionaire southern California merchant, and still another from W. E. Good, vice-president of the Kilts & Jackson Company. Within a few weeks Ince is expected to have decided whether he will take the production to New York, Chicago or Washington first. It is said he is not negotiating to exhibit it at a private showing to the president, his cabinet and all other government officials.

The current issue of Triangle, issued by the Triangle Film Corporation, points out the progressive tendency which has developed toward genuine co-operation among exhibitors. It reports that in many sections Triangle customers have organized "district advertising clubs," and the scheme has resulted in a concentration of ideas and a crystallization of all loose ends into an effective unit. It points out that with common and general working funds exhibitors could increase their daily results by a hundred per cent, and that the big results today are not obtained through individual effort, but through co-operation of big numbers of individuals.

H. B. Warner has concluded the fourth Triangle-Kay-Bee subject in which he will be presented as a star by Thomas H. Ince. The scenario for this piece was prepared by C. Gardner Sullivan. The cast also includes Enid Markey and Margaret Thompson.

A village in the Brazilian jungle was constructed for scenes in the current Triangle-Kay-Bee feature in which Dorothy Dalton is appearing under the direction of Walter Edwards. The story was written by Monte Katterjohn, and the leading man is Howard Hickman. Gertrude Claire is said to be doing a remarkable piece of work as the hag godmother of Dorothy Dalton in this production.

For the first time since he affiliated himself with the Ince-Triangle forces, William Desmond is appearing in a Hart production at Inceville. He is working with William S. Hart in the Triangle-Kay-Bee feature by C. Gardner Sullivan.

When finished playing in the concluding scenes of "Going Straight," the Triangle drama, Norma Talmadge will start immediate rehearsals in another dramatic picture under the direction of Edward Dillon. The story is by Chester Withey and Roy Somerville, and the two stellar roles will be portrayed by Norma Talmadge and Tully Marshall.

In the feature in which Lillian Gish is now working she once again has a chance to wear some strikingly beautiful gowns. The clothes which she wears in the scenes of this new play were designed especially for her by Madam Clare, who conducts the "Maison Clare" on Fifth avenue in New York city. Mary Alden, who appears in the same play, also wears some very artistic negligees and evening gowns. In this play Sam de Grasse plays opposite Miss Gish, and Spottiswoods Aitken, William De Vaull and Jennie Lee also appear.

One of the big events of the month at the California Fine Arts studio was a birthday party given in honor of Director William Christy Cabanne's twenty-eighth birthday. The prominent studio people who attended the celebration were De Wolf Hopper, Dorothy Gish, Douglas Fairbanks, Norma Talmadge, Robert Harron, Allan Dwan, Constance Talmadge and Jean S. Cabanne.

De Wolf Hopper is a most enthusiastic baseball fan, and he is in his element in the production on which he is now working "Casey at the Bat."

Fay Tincher, the Fine Arts comedienne, will be absent from the studio for about three weeks on a vacation, and will not, therefore, appear in Director Dillon's next play.

To Report Hughes Bill

Washington, D. C., May 3, 1916.

Motography: The House Committee on Education today voted to report the Hughes censorship bill. Chairman Hughes was directed to redraft the measure, and report it to the House. This means that the Hughes censorship bill will be placed on the calendar, come up for discussion and passage at the present session of Congress.

The action of the House committee in reporting the bill follows hearings given on the measure and a long wait to secure a quorum.

The bill as ordered reported provides for prepublicity censorship and license fees. It is stated, as drawn the bill will tax the industry, based on current output, about $100,000 a year.

It is predicted that the bill will lead to considerable discussion on the floor of the House, and it is intimated that the companies who favor censorship will make a strong fight to have the bill passed.—Thomas O. Monk, Motography's Washington Correspondent.

MUTUAL AT EXPOSITIONS

Every Department of Mutual Will Have Representation and Noted Actresses Will Act as Patronesses

The Mutual Film Corporation is to be well represented at both expositions. They have 1,500 square feet of space at the Madison Square Garden and also have taken liberal space at the Grand Central Palace. The exhibits at both places will offer many pleasant and original surprises to all attending.

Among the Mutual actresses who will act as patronesses are Mary Miles Minter, Marguerite Courtot, Florence La Badie, Gladys Hulette, Marion Swayne, Gertrude Robinson, Lucille Taft, Iva Shepard, the Fairbanks Twins, Madeline and Marion, Barbara Gilroy, Kathyrn Adams, Grace De Carlton, Helen Holmes, Kathryn Cooke and a score of others.

Richard Bennett, who is now playing in a Broadway production, will also be found at the Mutual booth.

Arrangements for the Mutual exhibit are in the hands of Hopp Hadley and J. G. Rohlfe.

An innovation at the exposition at the Garden will be the actual photographing of a motion picture play. A typical studio where pictures will be produced, assembled and the mysteries surrounding the making of pictures will be exposed. The pictures will be developed, printed and joined as soon as possible and thrown on the screen without editing.

As a further means of entertainment a large stage will be constructed at the Fourth Ave. end of the building which will contain the largest motion picture screen ever built and all the latest feature plays and comedies will be shown.

One day each will be devoted to Exhibitors' Day, Manufacturers' Day, Bankers' Day, Fire Insurance Day, Projection Day, Board of Trade Day and Bureau of Standards Day. Each day has a peculiar significance in connection with the picture industry and addresses will be made by prominent speakers on subjects applicable to the day.

Among the important subjects to be discussed are the Educational Value of Motion Pictures taking up their future in the schools and colleges; the Motion Picture Machine and Its Evolution; the Value of the Motion Picture in Crime Detection and Police Work; The Moralizing Force of Motion Pictures, a subject especially to clergymen and church workers; Recruiting the Army and Navy by Motion Pictures, which has been found highly successful in the present European War, and Motion Pictures and Commercial Progress, a subject of wide scope appealing to men in every branch of business.

A daily newspaper of standard size, composed of eight pages of motion picture news, will be circulated. This will be called the Motion Picture Daily Trade Show Bulletin, and will be edited and written by men who write exclusively of pictures and the picture trade.

Among other attractions is the dancing space which has been set aside in the center of the Garden, which is large enough to accommodate three thousand dancers. A band and several orchestras will provide concert and dance music.

CHAPLIN IN THIRD SUIT

Noted $670,000 Picture Comedian Is Kept Busy Starting Suits and Being Sued—Several Legal Tangles

Charlie Chaplin's latest success seems to be a tangle of legal proceedings from which it may cost him a considerable sum of money to become untangled.

While a hearing was in progress in the Supreme Court on the injunction instituted by Charlie Chaplin to restrain the V-L-S-E and Essanay companies from releasing the film of Chaplin's burlesque on Carmen in four reels, a process server was in the courtroom seeking the comedian with papers in a breach of contract suit instituted by the Essanay Company for $500,000. And in consequence of the injunction proceedings instituted by Sidney Chaplin as agent of Charles Chaplin, the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company have brought in the Federal District Court a similar proceeding against the Chaplins.

In its complaint Essanay states that if the Chaplins succeed in obtaining an injunction in the State Supreme Court the company will sustain a very serious loss, probably amounting to $500,000. The film company, therefore, asks the Federal Court to enjoin the Chaplins from taking any further proceedings in the State Supreme Court until the United States District Court for the eastern division of the Northern District Court of Illinois shall have passed on a motion to transfer or remand the suit pending there, and if the order to transfer or remand is not granted the injunction asked for by the company be made perpetual.

A motion was made to dismiss the application filed by Charles Chaplin against the Essanay and the V-L-S-E to restrain those companies from distributing the Chaplin burlesque on Carmen but decision in the case was withheld until the court could decide some of the intricate legal questions involved.

It is claimed there is no objection to the picture being released in two reels but the objection was based upon the use of the comedian's name as author of the longer version with its alleged unlawful interpolations.

It was urged that the case is out of the jurisdiction of the New York courts as the defendant was an Illinois corporation and Chaplin was not a resident of New York State. Judge Delehanty reserved decision on the case.

Exposition Finds Prettiest Girl

The following advertisement appearing in the female help wanted columns of New York newspapers brought many aspiring applicants:

> Wanted—The prettiest girl in New York to appear as the moving picture muse at the motion picture exposition at Grand Central Palace. Apply 12 to 3, Hall's Studio, to-day.

From the numerous young ladies assembled Miss Evelyn Mansfield was chosen, and it was explained to her that during the exposition her name was to be changed to Mettuccep, and she is to become a Grecian goddess. The name was created by combining the first letters of the Grecian divinities, Thalis, Melpomene, Terpsichore and the other nine Greek goddesses, because Mettuccep is to combine the qualities of each of her sisters.

Mettuccep will be a conspicuous exhibit of the film exposition. She will be encumbered by a papier mache ball and chain, handcuffs and manacles. A make-believe State Board of Censors will hold the nether ends of chains binding the muse. The make-believe censors will be bewigged and visaged to register bigotry, intolerance and cruelty.

Though bound, Mettuccep will not be gagged, for her mission at the exposition will be to influence signatures to an anti-censor petition to Governor Whitman requesting his veto to the Cristman-Wheeler censorship bill, passed by the State Senate and Assembly, and now only awaiting the governor's endorsement to become a law.

PICTURES TOOK SCULPTRESS

Theda Bara Gives Up Ambition to Be a Noted Sculptress to Become a Famous Motion Picture Star

Although the motion picture world has always looked upon Theda Bara, the Fox star, as a most accomplished actress they have not before been allowed to see behind the scenes and discover that in becoming famous as an actress she was compelled to give up her greater ambition to become a sculptress. To few of us is accorded the honor of becoming famous in only one art to say nothing of having to choose between two careers.

Theda Bara sketching.

A few years ago in Paris Miss Bara was the guest of honor at a tea given in one of the studios on the Boulevard Montparnesse. There she met a pupil of Rodin who afterward took her to the great sculptor's studio. From that day she cherished an ambition. Her progress in the work was pronounced and when she returned to America she devoted the greater part of each day to the art. Then came her meteoric screen success, and as it was a physical impossibility to follow successfully two great arts, one had to be relinquished, and needless to say it was the sculpturing.

But, just because Miss Bara has been baffled in one ambition this does not mean that she has been prevented from other artistic development outside of the motion picture studio.

She is an accomplished and versatile artist, who draws well with crayon or Blaisdell pencil and also in brush work after the manner of Boardman Robinson, Weed Starrett and other accomplished cartoonists whose work is known through the larger daily newspapers of the country.

Miss Bara is seen in an accompanying photograph at work on her drawing board in a little corner of her home that she sets aside for this purpose.

An amusing incident showing Miss Bara's love for the art, occurred when "The Eternal Sapho" was being filmed. In a studio scene the sculptor shatters a statue he has been making. Miss Bara, as the model, comes in to find the masterpiece destroyed and is supposed to fall into a chair convulsed with sobs. But the sculptor's instinct was too strong, and before the director could stop her Miss Bara was on her knees making a desperate effort to piece the fragments together. The result was the retaking of about one hundred feet of film.

NEW STARS FOR MOROSCO

Rita Jolivet, Edna Goodrich and Jack Nellson Latest Additions to Morosco Company's Cast

The Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company has materially added to its cast of stars in the acquisition of Mlle. Rita Jolivet, Edna Goodrich and Jack Nellson. By a strange coincidence both Mlle. Jolivet and Miss Goodrich have appeared on the Paramount program in the past under the Lasky trademark.

Mlle. Jolivet has been a success on the legitimate stage, both in America and Europe, before going into the films, her first debut on the American stage being with Otis Skinner in "Kismet." Although the subject in which Mlle. Jolivet will make her initial screen appearance under the Morosco management is not known at this time, it is understood that it will be one of George Broadhurst's recent stage successes.

Miss Goodrich, although scarcely past her twenties, has spent eight years behind the footlights. She is already at work upon her initial Morosco photoplay, "The Tangle," which will be released on the Paramount program early in June. This production is an adaptation from the play, "The Making of Maddalena."

Mr. Nellson has also appeared on the speaking stage, having been for ten years under the management of Belasco and Henry Miller. Mr. Nellson's first appearance on the screen was in support of George Beban in "The Alien," and his first appearance on the Morosco-Paramount program will also be in support of Mr. Beban. "Pasquale," the release in which he is to appear, calls for more than ordinary talent and gives him an opportunity for strong characterization.

Myrtle Stedman, the Morosco star, was accorded a pleasant surprise on the occasion of the "Actors' Fund Benefit Dinner," held in a Los Angeles restaurant. The management learned that Miss Stedman was giving a little birthday dinner party at this affair and presented her with a huge birthday cake illumined with candles.

GENERAL BRANCHES GROW

Boston, San Francisco and Newark, New Jersey, Offices of the General Film Company Removes to More Spacious Homes

Natural "growing pains" have made it necessary for the General Film Company, Inc., to move into roomer and more convenient quarters.

Its Boston offices have been transferred to Ferdinand and Isabella streets, where an entire building is occupied by them.

E. J. Farrell, formerly division manager of the General Film Company, has assumed management of the Boston office. Mr. Farrell sometime ago was manager of the Boston division, prior to being transferred to take charge of the southern division. Having completed his work in that territory, he returned to his old post as manager of the Boston branch.

Business conditions in New Haven have assumed such a favorable attitude that the General Film Company found it necessary to provide many additional films for use in that territory to meet the increasing demand. N. J. Hacking, formerly in charge of the Boston office, has assumed management of the New Haven branch.

The San Francisco office of the General Film Company is now thoroughly settled in new premises, 225 Golden Gate avenue, in a new building which was erected for the sole use of the General Film Company, whose business on the Pacific Coast has grown to such an extent and is still rapidly expanding, that it was necessary to obtain more adequate quarters than those which it previously occupied.

To satisfactorily take care of the requirements of the business in New York State the General Film Company recently took over commodious quarters in Syracuse at 445 South Warren street, from where the majority of theaters in that portion of the state will be looked after, instead of from Albany as heretofore.

The Newark office of the General Film Company, which up until a very short time ago had operated as a distributing branch, has found it necessary to obtain increased space in order to take care of additional business. Exhibitors in New Jersey will be pleased with this new arrangement as it saves them the necessity of coming to New York for their programs.

Judging from advance reports from the West Coast, "David Garrick," the newest Pallas Pictures subject for the Paramount Program, will offer a fitting screen version of the famous old classic. "Dusty" Farnum will present the title role which has been portrayed on the stage by such celebrities as Sir Charles Wyndham, Lawrence Barrett, E. H. and E. A. Sothern, Nat Goodwin and Thomas Salvini.

Metropolitan Opera House Duplicated

An exact copy of the second floor of the Metropolitan opera house in New York City has been constructed by the stage carpenters of the George Kleine studio, in which "Gloria's Romance," the motion picture novel in which Billie Burke is being starred, is being made. The scene, when completed, will only be used for a little over half a day, but though it cost more than $20,000 to correctly reproduce the Metropolitan, the producers of "Gloria's Romance" felt that the expenditure was well warranted by the knowledge that the screened scene, which has the second floor of the Metropolitan as its setting, would be correct in every detail.

Wild Cat Promoters Denounced

David Horsley urges a concerted effort on the part of the picture interests to expose and eliminate from the field the activities of unscrupulous wild cat motion picture promoters, whose vivid tales of the vast fortunes to be made in the film industry have been the means of mulcting a gullible public of considerable money.

Mr. Horsley says:

"There are a great many would-be promoters throughout the United States who combine a talking knowledge of the business with fairy stories of the immense fortunes that have been made in the business, and prey upon the outside public for the purpose of making money out of the investor instead of making it out of the business, and not only the outside public suffers in consequence but the whole industry as well.

"I have been asked before for advice in such cases and I have told my inquiriers to avoid motion picture investments except in the stock of established companies who are active producers and who have marketing facilities and who can demonstrate the likelihood of their being money makers by their past performances in that respect."

Fannie Ward, under the direction of George Melford, has begun work at the Lasky studio on a photoplay by Willard Mack, entitled "The Gutter Magdalene," which will be released on the Paramount program. The famous star of "The Cheat" and "Tennessee's pardner" will appear in this play as a Salvation Army lass who assuages the hurts and wrongs of society on the flotsam and jetsom of the bowery.

EXPOSITIONS TO CONTRIBUTE

Special Days Will Be Set Apart, the Proceeds of Which Will Be Given to the Actors' Fund

On Monday, May 1, festivities started with the grand opening of the exposition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League in Grand Central Palace, and was followed at once by the Exposition of the Motion Picture Board of Trade at Madison Square Garden. Theater owners, exhibitors, manufacturers, trade representatives generally and the public will be in New York for the carnival from all parts of the United States. One thousand stars will appear in person so the public may have the pleasure of meeting them. Special "Days" will be devoted to "Orphans," "Allies," "Germans" and the final grand fire-works of the two shows will be one day in each devoted to the Motion Picture Campaign for the Actors' Fund, and the money obtained from the two expositions on these days will be contributed to the fund. It is expected the big hearted American public will rise to the occasion and make the proceeds of these two days substantial.

The interest in this fund is nation-wide. Special Tribute Performances and Grand Balls are being given in all the large cities from Coast to Coast and on Sunday, May 14, one of the big Boston theaters will be the scene of a great function held for the Campaign. Other large and interesting affairs are taking place within the next few days in Philadelphia, Buffalo, Omaha, San Francisco, New Orleans, Detroit, Seattle, and Dallas, Texas; and the Grand Tribute will take place at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, on Tuesday, May 16.

Philadelphia is giving a Grand Ball for the swelling of the fund, which it is believed will be a great social and financial success. To what an extent this is true can be judged from the committee of patronesses, which includes such names as Mrs. Cornelius Stevenson, Mrs. William Yorke Stevenson, President of the Plays and Players Club; Mrs. Samuel Chew, President of the Charlotte Cushman Club; Mrs. Otis Skinner and Mrs. R. Emmet Hare.

Boston, not to be outdone, is also planning a grand motion picture ball, and the auction sale of the boxes will help swell the fund. They are also planning a Grand Tribute performance on National Motion Picture Tribute day at which Pauline Frederick and Nat Goodwin will appear in person. An energetic committee of film and newspaper people is pushing the work there. It is headed by Moe Mark, of the Strand Theaters, assisted by George K. Robinson, Al Newhall, Salita Solano and Harold D. Valpey. Mayor Curley and Governor McCall are honorary chairmen of the committees.

The Screen Club of Buffalo is also planning a grand ball, and special announcement slides in all hotels, restaurants and cabarets are helping to sell hundreds of tickets.

Anita Stewart, the popular Vitagraph star, has been working most heroically to help swell the Actors' Fund. Miss Stewart has instantly responded to requests for "personal appearance" at the different theaters giving Tribute performances, and on one occasion journeyed to Salem, Mass., simply to appear for a few minutes on the stage of a theater aiding this campaign. Miss Stewart's latest assistance is in the shape of a personal check for $100. This contribution places her in the list of personal contributors of importance among the screen actors and actresses.

Pittsburgh has evolved a novel scheme for adding to the Actors' Fund. The public has taken such an interest in the city's donation to the campaign that the Mayor and Common Council have allowed a temporary lifting of the Sunday ban and are permitting shows in the better class of motion picture houses on Sunday with collections instead of paid admissions, the proceeds to go to the fund.

The Pittsburgh Screen Club has also devised a unique money raising scheme consisting of the sale of tickets at ten cents each which will be accepted as admissions to any of the principal motion picture theaters in Western Pennsylvania and West Virginia, and the money is sent to the fund.

M. Ernesto Solorzano, Counsul General of Nicaragua in New York, sent the following letter to Fund Chairman Samuel Goldsmith: "My attention is called to the most commendable project under which you are laboring on behalf of the actors and actresses who are in dire distress or broken down in old age and I sincerely wish you every possible success in the complete accomplishment of the object of the Motion Picture Campaign for the Actors' Fund."

The Thanhouser Club of Jacksonville, Fla., has contributed $435.00, the proceeds from its motion picture charity ball, to the Actors' Fund.

Walthall with Moss

It has been reported that Henry B. Walthall, the Essanay star, and famed for his "Little Colonel" in "The Birth of a Nation," has joined the B. S. Moss producing company. This is, as yet, unconfirmed and uncensored news from the front.

Favor Motion Pictures in Schools

The Civic League of Lexington, Ky., has recommended the use of motion pictures for educational purposes in the schools. The installation of moving picture machines and the use of the school buildings in the evenings was urged. It is proposed that the pictures be chiefly of an educational character.

Anna Nilsson was born in Sweden, but when Director Hansel emoted her and Tom Moore around in several snow scenes she shivered in her ball gown. It was Pathe's new series, "Who's Guilty?" in the filming.

Censoring the Censors

WHAT IS BEING DONE BY AND TO THE FILM REVIEWERS

THE Motion Picture Producers' Association of Los Angeles has launched a nation-wide fight against the censorship of pictures. The campaign has been carefully laid out by the officers and members of the association. This list includes H. O. Davis, of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company; Thomas H. Ince, of the New York Motion Picture Corporation; David W. Griffith, of the Fine Arts Film Company; David Horsley, Bostock Jungle and Film Company; Frank A. Garbutt, of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company, and George W. Stout, of the Keystone Film Company.

The association has chosen a unique way of getting its ideas before the public. To each exhibitor they are sending a letter setting forth the evils of censorship and claiming that if the Federal, state and city censorship become a reality the motion picture industry will be a thing of the past. They state to the exhibitor that their business is threatened, their investment will be a total loss, their enterprise will be wiped out of existence. With this letter goes a perforated slip which is to be placed between two pieces of glass the size of the slides used and projected on the screen. It contains brief but emphatic reasons why the American people should be the censors instead of permitting politicians to take the matter into their hands.

After the audience have read this message the exhibitor is instructed to turn the lights on all over the house and explain to the audience in a few words that the motion pictures—their own popular form of entertainment and amusement—are seriously threatened by a lot of politicians and ill-advised reformers, and ask them all to sign a petition asking that all forms of censorship be done away with.

The ushers are then to pass around the petitions, which will be supplied by the agency from which the service is obtained.

The theater owner is urged to repeat this at each performance until everyone attending his house has signed the petition, and then to go out to the business men for signatures, urge the newspapers to take up the matter editorially, and talk non-censorship to everybody.

This is only the beginning of the campaign which the association has in mind and they are making every effort to further the cause through the exhibitors in the hope of inducing everyone to take an active part in this campaign and kill censorship in every form.

Common Sense Censorship

The Chicago Tribune of April 22 contained a very interesting editorial on "Common Sense Censorship." This editorial speaks of the way in which crime was exploited in the films a number of years ago, showing not only that the wages of sin is death, but showing the process by which that end was reached. Now all the horrible details are eliminated but at the same time the moral is brought out just as forcefully. While this is at it should be, and everyone is willing to admit that good work has been done in this respect, the writer of the article claims there is still great room for the use of common sense in censorship.

In part the arguments advanced are as follows:

We need a common sense censorship. We have not had one. The duty of determining what we shall be permitted to see in the motion picture theaters and what we shall not see has reposed apparently in a body of people enormously sensitive to shock, in people who dislike seeing unpleasant things.

We are all, in the eyes of the motion picture censors, on the edge of committing some dastardly deed without regard to consequences the moment the method of perpetrating it is shown us. There is some mdical support for their opinion of us. It is a strange man whom some physician cannot prove to be mentally subnormal these days.

But in spite of the opinions of the alienists we have not completely adopted their point of view. Somehow most men, and most women also, feel that they are not completely out of their heads nor devoid of all restraint. They resent the evident assumption of the censors that they are all morons.

San Francisco Committee Discusses Question

A very spirited and lengthy discussion lasting about three hours was held before the San Francisco supervisors' police committee on the proposed amendments to the motion picture censorship. The proposed changes were sponsored by the California Club.

The amendments would increase the present board from five to nine members, and would give them power to order the discontinuance of any pictures tending to incite race hatred or prejudice. The latter amendment has been stamped "unenforceable" by City Attorney Percy V. Long.

He advised the supervisors that it was too far-reaching. He said:

"This amendment would vest in the censorship board discretion to reject films delineating character periods of history if, though true to life, they tend to offend the sensibilities of some race.

"War pictures or the filming of stories or plays which have become classics could be barred if the people of any race felt that they reflected reproach on them.

"The prohibition would be almost unlimited where portrayal of character or type was sought."

Liberal Policy for Chicago

The moving picture producers, theater owners and general public in Chicago are rejoicing over the lifting of the strict censorship of films that has been in force for many months. Corporation Counsel Ettleson submitted to Mayor Thompson an opinion which held that Chief of Police Charles C. Healey and not Major M. C. L. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police, has full authority to pass on motion picture plays under the prevailing city ordinance. While this means that the censorship in the future will be much more liberal it does not mean that the bars are to be let down entirely or that any sort of play may be shown. It does mean, however, that more discrimination in the ordering of "cut-outs" will be displayed, and that every little incident in a filmed drama that involves the use of fire-arms or depictions of crimes will not be ordered cut-out as at present.

Censors' Fees Profitable

Hon. J. W. Bowser, attorney general of British Columbia, reports that during the year approximately 68,000 reels of film were examined by the censor's department and of this number a total of 800 reels were rejected.

He also reports that the license fees and charges for censoring are almost twice as great as are necessary to make the department self-sustaining, as the net profit for the last year was $8,638.10. The censor's office has charge of the inspection of motion picture theaters in the province as well as the licensing of theaters, exchanges, operators and all other revenue producing sources of the industry.

Film Shown Without "O. K." Stamp

In spite of the fact that the National Board of Review refused to give its sanction to "Where Are My Children?" the Universal Film Manufacturing Company decided to run the picture at the Globe Theater without the official stamp of the Board.

As the picture has been endorsed by Father W. E. Cashin, Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, Rabbi Jacob Kohn and Superior Paulist Father John Hughes, Universal believes that it will not be offensive to public taste.

Grants Hearing on Censor Bill

Since the Cristman-Wheeler censorship bill passed both houses in the New York state legislature, Governor Whitman has been deluged with protests against signing the measure. This correspondence has become so voluminous that Franklin B. Lord, Counsel to the Governor, has had a printed reply prepared.

In a message to J. W. Binder, executive secretary of the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America, Governor Whitman has signified his intention of granting a hearing or a series of hearings on the censorship measure within the next thirty days.

Rochester Censorship Lenient

The motion picture censorship of the city officials of Rochester, N. Y., is not to be stringent or of a nature to embarrass the exhibitors. The censoring has been done mostly from the descriptions of the plays furnished by the producers and from the titles. There has no attempt been made to require a showing of the films in advance. The commissioner goes on the basis that only ten per cent of the films need censoring and that the exhibitors will work with him in censoring their own programs.

Court Sustains Censors' Verdict

The decision of the Pennsylvania Board of Censors in respect to the film "Virtue," certain parts of which they decreed should be eliminated, was upheld by the Court of Common Pleas. It was pointed out that while that tribunal thought the action of the Board of Censors "minute and far-fetched" and "without merit," yet it did not find that the censors had been guilty of any arbitrary or oppressive abuse of discretion.

Griffith Publishes Book on Censor Menace

David Wark Griffith, the noted producer, has published a book on the censor menace under the title, "The Rise and Fall of Free Speech in America." This is a powerful argument against the censoring of motion pictures and it is illustrated with satiric drawings showing the absurdity and hypocrisy of the censorious attitude of the mind.

City Censors Unpaid

A new ordinance in Benton Harbor, Mich., provides that the mayor shall appoint three citizens to act as censors of motion pictures, to serve without pay.

Paragon Fights Censor Bill

The Paragon Film Corporation is circulating petitions with the hopes of influencing Governor Whitman to veto the Cristman-Wheeler Bill. This company expects to send a petition bearing 100,000 names to the Governor within ten days. The Paragon is counting on the moving picture patrons for the bulk of these names and copies of the petition, with blanks for signatures, are being circulated among all the motion picture houses in Greater New York.

National Board of Review Fight Bill

The National Board of Review of Motion Pictures has arranged for a series of public protests against the signing of the Cristman-Wheeler bill. The first of these protests will be made at the Forty-fourth Street Theater on Monday evening, when Cranston Brenton, chairman of the National Board, will present facts showing the dangers with the motion picture as a great public entertainment would be subjected to in the State of New York should Governor Whitman sign the bill.

Neil O'Brien Joins Friars' Frolic

The triumvate of black-face funmakers was completed when Neil O'Brien joined George Primrose and Lew Dockstader in the cast of George M. Cohan's Friars' All Star Frolic. Rehearsals for the big show will be started on May 8, and every Friar expects a show bigger and better than the Barnum and Bailey Circus.

Mary A. Mersch, familiar on both stage and screen, has been engaged by Pallas Pictures to appear in important characterizations on the Paramount Program. The initial production under which Miss Mersch will appear under the Pallas brand is "David Garrick," in which Dustin Farnum plays the title role.

George Beban is unexcelled in his convincing characterizations. Witness him humoring his horse in "Pasquale," at the Morosco studios. Director Taylor is on the extreme left.

Current Releases Reviewed

"Maria Rosa"

Geraldine Farrar in Lasky-Paramount Release. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

WHAT doubts existed as to Geraldine Farrar's ability in the silent drama were dispelled with the release of Lasky's "Carmen" and the famous operatic star is now also a famous moving picture actress with great things to live up to in photoplay portrayals; for picturegoers and a number of people who visit the picture shows but who are a bit coy about being called a "goer" will be exacting in their desire to see Geraldine Farrar realize the utmost, in the matter of acting, that the screen is capable of. "Maria Rosa" gives one a glimpse of the noted star at her best as a moving picture actress.

While at the Lasky studios last summer Geraldine Farrar appeared before the camera as the star of three pictures and "Maria Rosa" was the first to be produced, though it is the third to be released. This fact is rather remarkable when one considers that "Maria Rosa" is the equal and in certain respects the superior of both "Carmen" and "Temptation." The star's performance as "Maria Rosa" is of an unusually high character. To single out the most impressive scenes—the ones in which her grasp of the camera's requirements is most noticeable—would not be fair to her portrayal as a whole. Geraldine Farrar's acting as the Spanish maid went beyond the expectations of one who entered the projection room with eyes prepared to behold acting of an extraordinary degree.

"Maria Rosa" is an adaptation of the play which Lou-Tellegen appeared in three years ago. It is a love story laid in Spain and its selection as a screen vehicle was judicious enough, for it is a story offering opportunities to the motion picture producer. The scenario by Wm. DeMille was produced by Cecil DeMille. The picture tells of a Spanish girl's intense love for a young vintner. Through the treachery of a jealous rival, Andres is accused of a crime and sent to prison. Maria Rosa vows that she will await the return of her lover. Some time after this, Ramon presents a letter, supposedly written from the prison, telling of Andres' death. Maria Rosa finally consents to marry Ramon. On the wedding day Andres returns, and on learning of Ramon's perfidy she stabs him. Fatally wounded, Ramon's true love for Maria Rosa asserts itself, and he clears her of guilt in a "death-bed" confession.

The picture will add luster to the fame of the producers. The director held the star in the center of the stage with the minimum of theatric effect, and all the action is surrounded by an atmosphere that is delightful. Both production and photography "Maria Rosa" is up to the Lasky Company's best standard. Pedro de Cordoba is in every sense an excellent Ramon, and Wallace Reid a satisfactory Andres, though once or twice we regretted that Mr. Reid saw fit to wear his shirt open so low at the throat. Anita King, Horace B. Carpenter and Ernest Joy also do their parts full justice.

"The Bugle Call"

Triangle-Ince Offering Is Delightfully Human. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE BUGLE CALL" makes one feel rather justified in deploring the fact that there is at present a marked scarcity of pcitures akin to it in breadth, depth and wholesomeness of appeal. There is in this picture a powerful human interest delightfully blended with an atmosphere which is gratifyingly pure and thrilling Indian raids on an army post in Arizona. We believe all classes of audiences will thrill at the daring feats of horsemanship, which, besides giving zest to pleasant story, fit in nicely with the simple charm of the central characters and incidents.

C. Gardner Sullivan, the volume of whose product we contemplate in wonderment equal to our admiration for its quality, is the author of "The Bugle Call." It is a story which holds the interest unflaggingly and plays upon the spectator's emotions without once bringing in outraged womanhood, corrupt manhood, or the interior of a bar room At this point we cannot suppress our desire to express the opinion that if producers persist in offering pictures built entirely upon these last mentioned elements picturegoers will in time either pleasantly accept them, which they do not do at present, or they will seek other places and forms of entertainment "The Bugle Call" is splendid entertainment, it having moments of pathos, humor and excitement, and it is wholesome. And for this fact praise where praise is due will be forthcoming from the real supporters of motion picture plays.

William Collier, Jr., is the star of this picture. He proves himself to be excellently suited to play the part of the boy whose conflicting emotions are conveyed in all reality and force in this story centering about the young son of a Captain at a Western Post who, a few years after the death of his wife and the mother of his boy, marries again. Billy languishes between his growing love for his new mother and the all powerful love he holds for his dead mother. While Billy, the pet of the post, thus hesitates because he feels that it would be disloyal to his own mother to gratefully accept the kindnesses of his father's second wife, all three are unhappy. But the Captain's deep affection for his son and Mary's sincere desire to be a mother to Billy are rewarded.

Wyndham Standing as the Captain and Anna Lehr have parts which enable them to hold the sympathy. Such characters are a delight to behold and these players make them as real as can be. Thomas Guise also has a grateful part; he is cast as Sergeant Hogan. The scene in which he comforts Billy on the night of the wedding is a charmingly human and pathetic one. These three players and the youthful star compel admiration. The many details which make this an exceptional picture cannot be touched upon, but considering them all at their true value one can heartily recommend "The Bugle Call," and no provisos are inserted into the recommendation.

"The Double Cross"

Two-Reel Essanay Drama Released May 16. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

ELIZABETH BURBRIDGE plays a girl detective in this little drama, which deals with a group of crooks. The story is presented in a manner not too serious, cleverly worded sub-titles aiding the players in portraying the characters. Material which usually goes to form a heavy sociological study has been deftly used for a short comedy, which still rings true and teaches a lesson without making it too obvious.

Sammy Dowd and Leona Laird are in love, a fact which interferes with Sammy's devotion to his job to such an extent than he is soon "fired." While out of work he meets "Snake" Peters and his gang, a group of counterfeiters. Sammy is easily led and soon becomes a tool of theirs in getting rid of counterfeit money. Then "Snake" meets Leona and decides to take her away from Sammy. He tells her Sammy is a crook and is prepared to prove it to her and to the police. A few days later "Snake" meets a girl who attracts him more than Leona had. The girl is apparently charmed by him, and when she reveals the fact that she is a pickpocket "Snake" tells her of his "game." The next day, when she visits their den, the place is raided and all are arrested, except Sammy, who was absent.

At the police station the girl, who is Molly Burke of the police department, shows her star, and "Snake" realizes that it was she who trapped him. Then Molly, who had watched with interest the affair of Sammy and Leona, reunites the couple, warning Sammy against evil associates.

Elizabeth Burbridge is very good in the leading role. The supporting cast includes Patrick Calhoun as "Snake" Peters, Thurlow Brewer as Sammy Dowd, and Alice McChesney as Leona Laird.

"Love's Toll"

V. L. S. E. Modern Drama Produced by Lubin. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

PRODUCED by Lubin under Jack Pratt's direction and for release on the V. L. S. E. Program on May 8, "Love's Toll" is a modern drama centering about a country girl who comes to the city where indiscretion is the outcome of an affection for a man who has won her love and confidence deceitfully. The story is by Daniel Carson Goodman, whose intent it was to draw a moral forcefully in a photoplay dealing with convincing characters and every-day events. "Love's Toll" is a picture written and produced with a sincere attempt at drama-with-a-purpose, and its sincerity is felt by the spectator.

While it it a fact that this picture concerns itself with conventional material and its treatment is familiar to the screen, it has a certain depth that causes one to consider it in a serious light as an offering combining a moral lesson with action of proven popularity with a goodly share of the various classes of audiences which make up the numberless photoplay enthusiasts. It is an interesting play containing situations which will be dramatically strong to the majority and entertaining to all. The characters are well presented and, on the whole, commendably acted.

Produced with fine judgment as to attractiveness and careful attention to detail of setting, "Love's Toll" first shows Marion Lane living in a small town with her parents. She has a singing voice of pleasing quality and is encouraged by her friends to avail herself of the city's opportunities to the development of her talent. She is invited to live with a girl friend who studies painting at the art school supported by a group of wealthy people. At one of the school affairs Marion makes the acquaintance of Allan Crauben. Though Lucy warns her friend that men of Crauben's position and wealth are not for girls of their kind, Marion trusts this handsome young man.

The result is that Marion, in her darkest hour, is deserted by Crauben, who thinks his responsibility ends with his offer of financial aid. Marion therefore finds herself a patient, deserted by even her close friend Lucy, in a charity maternity hospital. The child dies. As a chorus girl Marion again meets Crauben and openly reproaches him. Then she becomes a nurse and receives much attention from a young physician, who finally persuades her to marry him. Later Marion can no longer hold the truth from her husband. Page spurns her when he learns of the past and he demands the name of the man who wronged her. At this point coincidence leads Crauben to the Page house. The truth comes out and in a struggle Crauben is killed, which leaves the way clear for the future happiness for Page and Marion.

Rosetta Brice is Marion and Richard Buhler plays opposite her as the doctor. Mr. Buhler is very effective in this part and Craufurd Kent is praiseworthy in the heavy role. Inez Buck makes Lucy Mallory a prominent and a highly pleasing character. Karva Poloskova is another member of the cast who does well.

"The Living Dead"

Episode Ten of "The Iron Claw." Reviewed by George W. Graves.

THOSE who like to see a villain's subtle plots fall completely through every time he concocts some new dastardly method to obtain his ends, will take great satisfaction in "The Iron Claw." Legar's schemes are detected and thwarted in their operation in every episode, by the Laughing Mask, an individual whose identity is not disclosed but whose solicitude for Margery Golden's welfare and uncanny ability to save her from her would-be abductors is quite apparent.

The part of Margery Golden, the girl whose liberty is so constantly endangered, is taken by Pearl White, who is extending in these episodes the fame she won in "The Exploits of Elaine." The other two featured names in this serial are those of Creighton Hale, who has the part of Davy, Golden's secretary, and Sheldon Lewis, who impersonates Legar.

Overlooking a few inconsistencies, "The Living Dead" makes quite an acceptable link in the serial chain. Several scenes within a foundry are taken at some risk and they savor of realism. Altogether this episode is on a par with those which have gone before, and people who have debated the question of who the Laughing Mask is, will find their desire for the revelation of this character is growing keener.

Davy, Golden's secretary, pretends to be dead as a result of being pierced by one of the darts which, as we learned at the end of the last episode, were previously rendered harmless by the Laughing Mask. Legar sends one of his female lieutenants to betray Margery into his power, but while she is in Margery's bedroom that which appears to be the ghost of Davy looms up on the other side of the room. This and other appearances of what Legar's men think is Davy's ghost, lead Legar to make an investigation at the mausoleum. Immediately after Legar has discovered that the corpse there has been masked to look like Davy; in walks the latter.

The Iron Claw falls upon the man who has tricked him, but the police are without and they proceed to take Legar. Then Legar blows up the mausoleum. Both he and Davy are wounded and they make their separate escapes. Legar comes upon Margery in the wood near her stalled auto, but the Laughing Mask saves her and then pursues the Iron Claw. The latter leads his pursuer into a foundry and finally evades him there.

"Spellbound"

Knickerbocker Star Feature Released by General Film. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

INDIAN mysticism brought to England is used as a means to bring the story dealt with in "Spellbound" to an ending that is happy for the central characters in this Knickerbocker Star Feature for release on the General Film Program May 17. The story has, at no stage of its development, any regard whatever for logic. It is wildly improbable, and no attempt has been made to present it as anything but a pice of screen fiction. As such it contains enough that appeals to make it a good program offering.

Lois Meredith, whose popularity should help the picture to attract, heads a cast made up of William Conklin, Edward Brady, George Burrell, Frank Erlanger, Daniel Gilfeather, Joyce Moore and Edward Peters. "Spellbound" is a Horkheimer production directed by Harry Harvey.

The story by Bess Meredyth tells of an English heiress who is engaged to a man named Harrington Graeme. Both Graeme and Elsie are a queer combination of good and bad. The girl's guardian returns to England after an absence of ten years, spent in India. He brings with him a bronze idol, which he purchased from one of the natives and which was stolen from one of the temples. Major Cavendish asks Elsie to marry him but she laughs heartily at the thought of such a thing. The night she has planned to elope with Graeme is fraught with strange happenings. Sitting and watching the idol she is suddenly frightened when she sees it move, or she thinks it does. Cavendish comes into the room and reassures her, and Graeme, looking in at the window, thinks he is witnessing a love scene and hurries off to Africa to forget.

Then there comes to the Cavendish house a noted yogi. Katti Hab sees the idol and in an attempt to recover it kills Cavendish. Graeme, back from Africa, is accused of the murder, but acquitted at the trial. Elsie and Graeme now marry, and in a little while are unhappy. Elsie gambles and Graeme, unknown to Elsie, pays visits to the apartment of a certain chorus girl. A child is born, and it is unwelcome in the Graeme home. But Katti Hab returns. He is trapped in a closet in the house and calls for deliverance to the idol. The statue commences to move around the table, knocks a lamp off it and a fire starts. So Katti Hab instead of being delivered is destroyed. The baby is rescued and happiness is brought to the Graemes by this fire. Then it is discovered that the idol's head is full of jewels.

The settings for the action are all commendable and the photography is quite good.

"Susan Rocks the Boat"

Triangle-Fine Arts Comedy With Gish and Moore. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

DOROTHY GISH as a society girl with a large fortune and Owen Moore in the role of Larry O'Neil, the son of an ex-political boss, who lives in the slum district and, though their intellectual superior, he consorts with underworld characters, are the featured players in "Susan Rocks the Boat," which is a melodramatic comedy coming from the Fine Arts Studio. We have seen Dorothy Gish in parts much better suited ot her, but she is an actress of natural and acquired skill so her performance as Susan is not in the least disappointing, while Owen Moore is a very good Larry O'Neil.

Leading the spectator along a well-beaten path "Susan Rocks the Boat" arrives in the slums, the place screen patrons have grown to know so well, and continues on through a romance fundamentally quite conventional. Despite the fact that one never was in doubt as to what would eventually happen, the director brought "Susan Rocks the Boat" to a thrilling climax, one that is sensational, but there is no denying that it thrills. The melodramatic suspense coming out of a situation which shows a young, innocent girl locked in a room with a saloon keeper whose desires are evil spelled with a capital E, is brought out in its full power and duration in this picture.

Paul Powell is the producer of this story by Bernard McConville. The picture opens with some humorous scenes introducing Susan Johnstone as a society girl who is bored with her present life. She reads a few paragraphs of a story about Joan of Arc, and determines to use her time, energy and money in uplifting the poor. Susan founds a mission in the slums and she is an easy mark for all the fakers in the district. When Larry O'Neil exposes one or two cases of hypocrisy Susan becomes vexed and her displeasure centers in Larry. But this Larry regrets rather than resents and he uses brawn in upholding her good name, and when Susan hears about it she again looks with favor upon Larry.

Susan has an idea that she can accomplish a great good by persuading Jim Cardigan to convert his saloon into an ice cream parlor. Cardigan has only to pretend he is taken with the idea to lead Susan to his private office, one flight up a stairway whose location and appearances are all against it.

Susan once in the room realizes and struggles with Cardigan. It is here that Mr. Powell used very effective means to give the story all the power of its melodramatic self. Larry finally learns the state of affairs and rescues Susan, receiving a bullet wound that is the means of bringing the romance to a happy culmination.

The supporting cast is made of up capable players, including Fred J. Butler, Clyde E. Hopkins, James O'Shea and Fred A. Turner. The settings add to the realistic quality of general action that is highly satisfactory, and the photography is good enough to merit special mention.

"The Touch on the Key"

Two-Reel "Flying A" Drama Released May 8. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE interest which lies in the profession of news-gathering makes this story one which will prove entertaining to a large number of people. There is a newspaper office which really looks like one. There is a girl reporter who outwits a rival reporter and gets a big political story for her paper. The story is given a new twist, and there are a number of exciting episodes. Another attractive element in the play is the beauty of the exterior scenes. They are unusually lovely. In fact, the offering is an especially acceptable one.

Jane Randall (Vivian Rich) is sent by her paper to the summer home of Marsden Thomas, a financier, to learn his decision in regard to an important loan. Phil Norton (George Periolat), of a rival paper, also is sent for the story. Both reporters are refused an interview with the banker, but Hal Thomas, the rich man's son, who is under obligation to Norton for suppressing an unpleasant story about himself, agrees to get the information and give it to Norton by a signal from the house. Jane overhears the conversation and later sees the signal. It is late at night and when Jane goes to the telegraph station, the operator has left. But Philip Larmon, telegraph operator of "The Herald," Jane's fiance, had taught her telegraphy and she is able to send her own message. Norton sends a report to his paper saying he cannot get the information. He intends to use his knowledge in playing the stock market. So he stops Jane from sending her story and reports a false one. But Philip is able to recognize Jane's touch on the key and believes the message false. He persuades the editor to hold the paper half an hour. By that time Larmond has released Jane and she sends the story, so "The Herald" scores a triumph and Norton and his rival paper are beaten.

Alfred Vosburgh is Larmon, George Periolat is Norton, Joseph Beaudry is the millionaire and King Clark his son.

"The Moment Before"

Famous Players-Paramount Picturization of Zangwill Story. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

FOR the acting of Pauline Frederick and the production which Robert Vignola has given the piece the latest Famous Players release is notable. "The Moment Before" presents Miss Frederick in a role that is pleasing and interesting because she makes it so, and the picture throughout its five reels holds the attention with the beauty of its settings and rich photography.

"The Moment Before" is a picturization of Israel Zangwill's story. The picture in the beginning shows Lord Maldon and his wife as an aged couple who devote themselves to charitable acts, and the poor people of the countryside have much to thank them for. Lord Maldon meets with an accident and the injuries he sustains cause his death. The Duchess shortly after this is suddenly stricken with an attack of the heart and the moment before her death she reviews her past eventful life.

Her vision first goes back to the time she was a gypsy maid. A beautiful young woman, she is fought for and forcibly won by one of the men of the tribe. Madge meets Harold, the younger son of the Duke of Maldon, and she then determines to accept the advances of this handsome and wild-living young nobleman. She deserts John and is employed in the Malden household. Harold's older brother learns their true relations and denounces him. In a fit of anger Harold strikes his brother and leaves him unconscious on the floor.

At this point the gypsy enters and is about to abduct Madge when the older Maldon, who has regained consciousness, interferes and John deals him a blow which causes his death. Harold therefore believes that he is the murderer and leaves the country. Years later Madge and Maldon meet again. She kills her gypsy husband that she may return with Harold to England, where he is to become Lord of the manor, as his father has recently died. He then learns that he is not a murderer, and from the moment of their return Madge and Lord Maldon take up the mode of living in which they were disclosed in the beginning of the picture. The scene then flashes back to Madge, who, still lying on the floor at the altar of the church, dies.

As a photoplay story "The Moment Before" has shortcomings. It is not the style of play that takes well to the screen's manner of telling a story. The production and the acting far surpass the play. Miss Frederick proves herself equal to the task of making "The Moment Before" a picture that will hold interest throughout and the settings for the action are of great support to her in doing this. Thomas Holding plays opposite Miss Frederick as Harold. J. W. Johnson gives a good account of himself as the gypsy and Frank Losee does a great deal with a part that is not large.

"Playing With Fire"

Five-Part Popular Plays—Metro Drama Released April 17. Reviewed by George W. Graves

"PLAYING WITH FIRE" constitutes what might easily be called an entertaining and satisfying picture and one that has the distinguishing marks of a feature. In the first place there is Madame Petrova in the leading role. She plays the part of Jean Servian, an unfortunate wife, with the grace and force which have characterized her former screen triumphs.

Madame Petrova has an acute perception of emotional qualities and knows how to manifest them with naturalness. Her stately and magnetic presence lends dignity to any production.

Then we have the scenario by Aaron Hoffman. The story is along conventional lines, but it has been well executed and there is no doubt as to its entertaining power. All honors of painstaking direction go to Francis J. Grandon. A pleasing part of this production and one which adds greatly to its artistic side is the unique treatment given the majority of subtitles. In the place of stationary poster effects for bearing out the spirit of the subtitle, appropriate animated backgrounds are used.

In the balance of the cast are Arthur Hoops, Evelyn Brent, Pierre Le May, Catherine Calhoun and Philip Hahn.

Jean Servian, an artist, who has been the recipient of a great kindness at the hands of the wealthy Geoffrey Vane, marries him out of gratitude, but without love. Later Jean comes to the city to visit an old artist friend, Rosa Derbley. The latter has gone away, but her brother, just returned from Paris, is at the studio. Jean and Derbley become intimate, and as the wife is staying in town for a time, they see much of each other. One night after a theater party Jean succumbs to the man's artful persuasions and then becomes aware of his true character. She returns home penitent and it is not long before she learns to really love her husband.

Some time after Lucille, Jean's step-daughter, meets and falls in love with Derbley. Vane gives his permission to their marriage. Jean, to prevent this calamity, tells her story to Lucille, only to have the girl turn upon her. This failing, she confesses to her husband, who refuses to forgive her.

Derbley, afraid that his plans will not develop, pretends to be sick and writes for Lucille to come to him. The girl goes to his studio to find that he has tricked her. The wife arrives to find Lucille getting worsted in a desperate struggle. Then Jean enters the fray and while she and Derbley wrestle for possession of the revolver, it explodes, killing Derbley.

"A Stranger in New York"

Three-Reel Selig Comedy Featuring Otis Harlan. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE stage play of this name by Charles Hoyt has been adapted for the screen by Gilson Willets and produced by T. N. Heffron. After beginning as a straight comedy, the threads of the plot are tangled recklessly as the action quickens until the farce becomes mostly slapstick. The plot deals with a book agent who persuades a wealthy Chicago millionaire to lend him his name and prestige for a short time in New York City, promising him to increase, by judicious "bluffing," the value of stock in a "prune juice" company which the millionaire owns.

Otis Harlan has the role of the book agent, A. Stranger, a jovial vagabond, who forces himself on the millionaire, I. Collier Downe, with a volume of "Success Secrets" at the moment when the slump in "prune juice" stocks threatens his ruin. Opening the volume at random, the agent persuades the millionaire to follow a text stating the value of a good "bluff." He offers to impersonate I. Collier Downe in New York and to advertise the value of "prune juice."

The rest of the play deals with his escapades in New York City. The action is swift. One complication leads to another in a breathless fashion and while the fun is of the obvious kind and there are many inconsistencies in the plot, the play will doubtless keep an audience in good humor throughout. A. Stranger's idea is to make himself notorious and at the same time advertise prune juice. He is successful in sending the market price of stock up but since he keeps all the money the real I. Collier Downe becomes suspicious and comes to New York. The masquerader has him arrested as a lunatic, but he escapes and proves his identity, with the result that "prune juice" stock at once declines.

"Soul Mates"

American-Mutual Masterpicture Released May 8. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS play is especially interesting because it introduces William Russell as a director. He also played the leading role in the drama and the character he created, Lowell Sherman, dominates the play. It is a most carefully worked out study of a man of high character and fine instincts who is deceived by the vain, deceitful woman who is his wife and by the man he thinks his best friend. His revenge and his final happiness when things are at last straightened out and he finds a woman who is more worthy of him, forms the theme of the play.

The story is developed in a leisurely fashion during the first half and then events move very swiftly. Much emphasis is laid on scenes which show Sherman's character as contrasted with his wife's. While Sherman is romping with Tommy, the son of Cyril Carr, his friend, Alice Sherman and Carr carry on a secret love affair. Incidentally Sherman comes to admire Carr's wife, who is distinctly different from Mrs. Sherman.

Sherman's secretary, Cooper, has always disliked Alice, and he arranged to have Sherman discover her and Carr together. His plans go wrong. Carr escapes and Cooper is wounded instead. Then he tells his master the whole story, including the trouble which Alice brought to Cooper's brother before she was married to Sherman.

Embittered by the faithlessness of his wife and the treachery of his friend, Sherman conceals the fact that he has discovered them and plots to ruin Carr financially. He accomplishes this, and Carr, who is cast off by Alice when his money is gone, commits suicide, leaving a note to his wife in which he declared that Sherman was justified in his course. When Alice learns that her husband knows of her disloyalty, she leaves him. Later their marriage is annulled.

A letter from Tommy calls to Sherman's attention the fact that in ruining Carr he had left his wife and child unprotected and he takes an interest in them which, some time later, leads to his marriage with Mrs. Carr.

The supporting cast is very good. Leona Hutton gives a finely drawn picture of Alice Sherman. She avoids overdrawing the type and yet brings out the hard side of her character which lies under the gaiety. Charlotte Burton is a most effective contrast, as the sincere, kind-hearted wife of Carr. Harry Keenan portrays Cyril Carr well, and Dodo

Newton, as Tommy, adds a bright note to the play. Robert Klein plays an important role as Cooper, Sherman's private secretary.

"The Quality of Faith"

A Five-Part Gaumont-Mutual Masterpicture Released May 1. Reviewed by George W. Graves

ALEXANDER GADEN and Gertrude Robinson are featured in this picture, which has to do with the experiences of a courageous minister who dares to "smite the hand that feeds him." Both of the leads do impressive work, although they have the hardship of working in a scattered story. The latter, however, presents some tense situations which are treated strongly by the director, Richard Garrick. Several labor and strike scenes especially are to be commended for realism. Alexander Gaden makes a fine type for a clergyman and does his part entire justice with virile acting.

The acting and the production of this offering keep it up to the Masterpicture standard but the multiplotted story, which does not make a compact five-reeler, is to be regretted. Besides these already mentioned, the cast includes Lucille Taft, John Reinhard and H. W. Pemberton.

Albert Richards, pastor of a wealthy church, loses his position there because of his attacks upon Alford, a member who owns a factory in which inhuman conditions exist. Alford has just caused one of his employees to be sent to prison for instigating labor trouble. The pastor has rescued a girl, Marna, from a shameful life, and this, together with strained relations with her father, cause Louise, Alford's daughter, to break her engagement with Richard.

Louise marries Carlton, a worthless fop, with whom she is soon most miserable. She still has a strong affection for Richards, made more acute perhaps by his sudden prosperity as an author. By her artful plotting, Louise almost ensnares Richards, but his strength in the hour of temptation saves him from her wiles. Richards finds that in spite of everything it is Marna he loves, and the two marry. Alford, through reaction of his sin-laden mind, dies of heart failure and when the man whom he had sent to prison comes to wreak vengeance, he, the ex-convict, finds that his work is already accomplished.

"Blazing Love"

Six-Reel William Fox Play Featuring Virginia Pearson. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

EVENTS in the life of Margaret Walsh during a period of over twenty years form the theme of this drama. The plot is not very closely woven. The play is rather a series of plots having the same leading character. Unless this character is especially interesting, there is danger of such a play growing tiresome. But in this case, Virginia Pearson is an artisan of sufficient skill to hold the attention and as Margaret Walsh she wins interest and sympathy. The role gives her an excellent opportunity to display her skill as an actress and her consistent, artistic interpretation of a woman at three stages of her life is worth close attention. She appears at the beginning of the play as a young girl. Later she is a mature woman of the world, and in the last scenes she is waging a losing fight against age. Each impersonation is true and distinct.

The first plot deals with the first love of Margaret and her engagement to Arthur Graham, an explorer who leaves on an arctic expedition with Russell Barridan. The party meets with misfortune. Barridan escapes, after he has killed Graham, and returns to civilization.

After learning of Graham's death, Margaret marries a friend of her father, Morgan Delafield, a man much her senior. They live together happily for ten years and then Barridan, a thorough villain, enters Margaret's life. When she shows her contempt for him, he tries to injure her good name. She is defended by Stephen Bond, a young man who has never met her. Later the two meet and fall in love. When her husband learns that the younger man has won Margaret's love, he commits suicide, leaving a letter for Margaret in which he gives his reason.

Margaret and young Bond are married. There is another lapse of ten years. Then the story deals with the sorrow which comes to Margaret when she finds that a young girl has won her husband's love away from her. She realizes then that her first husband had suffered as she is now. This turn of the story is rather a surprise, for we had been led to think that Margaret and Bond were near the same age. Louise Huff plays the part of the young girl, Jeanne Clark, and she is an effective contrast to Margaret. After trying in vain to right the situation Margaret follows Graham's example and kills herself.

While the story would have been more effective and satisfying in an artistic sense had the various events been more closely united, it is perhaps more true to life and less artificial as presented. Miss Pearson's excellent playing is accompanied by skillful work of her supporting cast, headed by Wilmuth Merkyl as Stephen Bond. Frank Burbeck plays Morgan Delafield, the first husband, and Frank Goldsmith is the rascal Barridan. Lew Stern and George Shelby appear as Margaret's father and first lover, respectively. Special mention should be given Mattie Ferguson, who as the colored mammy supplies in a skillful manner the needed touch of humor. She also is responsible for a most poignant bit of pathos, when in the last scene after Margaret's death, which will unite Stephen and Jeanne, Mammy, who has always been the source of merriment, is alone, weeping for her mistress.

"The Wheat and the Chaff"

Three-Reel Lubin Drama Released May 11. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS play contains an unusually interesting story, one which catches the attention in the first scene and holds it closely until the last flash. The suspense is very well built up and sustained. Not until the last scene do we know how the events are to work themselves out.

Aside from the clever story, written by Josephine McLaughlin, the spectator is held by one character, the half-witted boy Jerry, a vivid and pathetic figure excellently played by Allan Forrest. He dominates the play, although he is not pushed into the foreground. In fact, he is out of the picture much of the time, yet he is the one who holds our sympathies.

The play opens with a reception at the Torrance home. Charles, the elder brother, is a prominent lawyer and is building up a circle of influential friends, among them John Conway and his daughter, Margaret. Jerry, Charles' half brother, a stupid boy, mingles with the guests until taken to task by Mrs. Torrance, who angrily tells him that he will ruin his brother's career. Jerry is very much attached to his brilliant brother and, rather than endanger his career, he goes away, taking his dog with him.

In another part of the city Jerry meets a group of boys who try to take his dog from him. He is defended by Allan Woods, who takes him home with him. Allan's sister, Peggy, is a cabaret singer. She meets and falls in love with Charles, the other brother, but when Charles has a chance to strengthen his own political standing by marrying Margaret Conway, he breaks off his affair with Peggy. After an interview with Charles, Peggy commits suicide, leaving a note telling her reason. Charles, hearing the shot, returns and takes the note. He escapes, but Jerry has seen him. Later he reads of the accusation of a half-witted boy, Jerry, with the murder of Peggy Wood. Although he could clear his brother, Charles knows that the scandal would ruin his chances for governorship.

In the meantime, Jerry continues to shield his brother, even when the case is going against him. The highest point of suspense in the play is reached when, while the jury is arguing the case of Jerry, and Charles' friends are receiving news of favorable election returns, Charles, alone by the fire, burns the note written by Peggy which would clear his brother. Then, overcome by excitement, he drops dead of heart failure and it seems that Jerry is surely lost.

The play ends with a flash of the morning paper, telling in one column of the death of the newly elected governor, and of the acquittal of Jerry.

Cecil Van Auker is Charles Torrance, Ruth Saville plays Peggy Wood and Evelyn Page is Margaret Conway. Others in the cast are Adelaide Bronti, George Routh and Walter Spencer. The play was directed by Melvin Mayo, under the supervision of Captain Wilbert Melville.

EXHIBITORS PLAN FORUM

Associated Motion Picture Exhibitors of Brooklyn Plan Forum to Be Held at Each Meeting—Committees Appointed

Although the Associated Motion Picture Exhibitors of Brooklyn, New York State League, Local No. 3, has only been in existence about a month they have already made their influence felt in the motion picture world. It was at a meeting of this League that J. Stuart Blackton addressed the Brooklyn exhibitors in the interest of peace and succeeded in his efforts to settle the exposition differences between the exhibitors and the Motion Picture Board of Trade.

The success of this meeting opened the eyes of the League to the good that might be accomplished by affording an opportunity to discuss the different problems of the industry and having men of note address them from time to time on the different subjects under agitation. The Brooklyn exhibitors have decided, therefore, that they will hold their semi-monthly meetings in two sections. Preliminary to the business meeting there will be a forum at which a manufacturer or exchange man or some prominent official will be present by invitation and address the exhibitors. The idea of the forum is to afford opportunity for the discussion of matters of mutual interest to the various departments of the film business. John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, has been invited to address the next forum.

The association has in its membership the proprietors of seventy of the best theaters in Brooklyn. The meetings are held at the Triangle theater.

President Manheimer has appointed the following standing committees:

Executive Board—Mr. Bland, Mr. Hollander, Mr. Israel, Mr. Goodman, Mr. Foster, Mr. Sockoloff and Mr. Sanders.

Membership Committee—Mr. Israel, chairman; Mr. Schwartz, Mr. Hollander, Mr. Ensler and Mr. Christian.

Law and Legislation—Mr. Hollander, chairman; Mr. Ward, Mr. Lane, Mr. Mooney and Mr. Sanders.

Grievance Committee—Mr. Sanders, chairman; Mr. Sockoloff, Mr. Bland, Mr. Cronides and Mr. Goodman.

House Committee—Mr. Forster, chairman; Mr. Fulmer, Mr. Askin, Mr. Warshawer and Mr. Salkin.

It is intended that the law and legislation committees shall keep an eye on matters in Albany and in the New York City Hall, so that no adverse legislation shall be passed without a hearing and also to recommend legislation that will improve conditions in the film industry.

The grievance committee will take up disputes between members and arbitrate them. It is believed this committee may do much to prevent the price-cutting that has sometimes occurred heretofore as the result of neighborhood differences.

The house committee will see to the entertainment of the wives and families of members on meeting nights and if desired secure seats at the Triangle theater, which is the official meeting place of the organization.

Unique Filming Across Nation Line

It is hard to get ahead of the alert moving picture men who are always endeavoring to meet the demands of the public. Even the federal laws can be evaded at times as is demonstrated by the subterfuge by which the pictures of the Johnson-Willard fight at Havana may yet be shown to the American public. The law prohibits the pictures of fights not made in this country but the ingenious picture men overcame this difficulty by restaging the fight just across the Canadian border while the picture machine standing on American soil rephotographed the film.

A party consisting of James J. Johnson, Lawrence M. D. McGuire, Harold T. Edwards, Richard Parr and two or three camera men pitched a tent over the boundry line near Lacolle, half being on Canadian and half on American ground. A table about three feet in width was placed in the center of the tent, one side of the table standing in Canada and the other in New York. The pictures which had been brought from Toronto were placed on the table on the Canadian side, and the cameramen set up their machine on the same table in New York. The pictures were then unreeled and photographed as they passed from one reel to another by the cameramen. Federal authorities seized the films as being an unlawful importation.

War Argued Across Continent

Following out its policy of bringing home to the nation the urgent need of "Preparedness" through the visualization upon the motion picture screen of the arguments of Theodore Roosevelt, former Secretary of War Garrison, Henry Reuterdahl, Frederick Palmer, and other statesmen and military experts, the Paramount Pictures Corporation in a future release of the Pictograph will show Professor David Starr Jordan, Chancellor of Leland Stanford University, and Congressman Augustus P. Gardner, opposing poles in the controversy, debating the question of whether the United States adopt more actively defensive measures. Jordan spoke before the camera in California. Gardner was photographed in Washington. Three reasons against increase of armament are tersely stated by Jordan. Gardner replies with all of the tencentimeter guns of the preparedness vocabulary.

Famous Players - Reliance - Majestic - Keystone-Triangle Merger: If the last reports be true that $50,000,000 is the capitalization of this new company, the criticism that has already been pretty generally offered that it is overcapitalized, is entitled to respect. We have just had two instances of substantially incorporated companies that are not exactly "blossoming in our early Spring." That this combination can produce beautiful pictures, no one can deny. The Famous Players' output, and many of the releases of the Triangle, have exhibited perfect photography, excellent acting, fine characterization and interesting stories, but the Triangle's finances did not obtain a "rosy" hue when it was operating on its own feet. If the merger eliminates much of the needless "reduplication of genius" and will pay the illustrious gentlemen who are directing its destinies, just what they are worth and no more, the company should make money, but a very modest capitalization would have impressed the public at large that the film industry was beginning to take itself seriously.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company: It is reported earnings in the last quarter are more than satisfactory and the company is now doing the best business in its history.

New York Motion Picture Corporation: Stock was offered under 40 last week and we have no available information at this time to account for its weakness.

BRITISH TRADE GOSSIP

W. A. Fenning is now the general manager of the London branch of the Fox Film Corporation.

Among the exteriors which the Famous Players company will film for "The Silver King" are scenes at Charing Cross Station and Hatton Garden and a huge race course episode. The company is being sent to England especially for scenes for the play.

In Southport, a proposed insert in the seven-day licenses to be issued to local cinema managers prohibit the showing on Sunday of "films depicting crime or comedy or serial films."

"The Dop Doctor," the Pathe drama, is having very much of a success in Dublin.

A cinema recruiting campaign is planned throughout Ireland. H. Higginson, who is in charge, will give free picture shows in each city, including films dealing with war in various places and with life in the army and navy, and suitable recruiting speeches will be made.

The British Fire Prevention Committee includes in its "Fire Warnings," special attention to the danger in places of amusement of fire and panic from air-raids.

It is reported that a man recently begged exemption from military service on the ground that he did not wish to leave for the front until he had seen all the episodes of his favorite film serial.

PEARL WHITE DABBLES IN "HIGH ART"

Never in pictures, even when sailing over Manhattan in a balloon during the filming of The Perils of Pauline, did Miss Pearl White, the Pathe star, give a greater exhibition of nerve than when she dangled from the roof of the Gerard Building on April 15 and from the flimsy support of a narrow scaffolding painted her initials in huge four-foot letters.

Pearl White, the Pathe star, in painter's garb on the "swing" high above the street, "helps" paint a huge sign heralding the motion picture exposition.

P. A. Parsons, the Pathe publicity man, had framed up the stunt in conjunction with T. M. Alexander of the Motion Picture Board of Trade. The Board of Trade is having painted upon the side of the building a huge sign advertising the Exposition to be held at the Madison Square Garden from May 6-13. It was this sign which furnished the idea.

A safety belt was offered to her, but she spurned it in scorn. She was about to step from the parapet to the electric sign which offered the only means of reaching the scaffolding thirty feet below, when Edward José, her director, rushed through the crowd. Mr. José was considerably excited, and with reason. "The Iron Claw," the serial in which Peerless Pearl stars, is not yet finished, and the risk of losing his heroine was too great. Mr. José begged her to descend with him to the street, but Miss White was not to be denied. "I'll be on deck for the tank scene this afternoon, Mr. José," she said. "Don't worry." Mr. José was gently led away and with a final wave of the hand Miss White began her descent.

To properly understand the risk one would have to have stood upon the roof. The scaffolding hung by ropes some thirty or forty feet below the roof. Between it and the roof was an electric sign, the text of which, arranged in lines, furnished the only means of reaching the scaffolding. These steps in the ladder were some four feet apart, and the whole structure wabbled in the strong wind. Everyone held his or her breath while the descent was being negotiated and when the girl finally reached the scaffolding the crowd on both buildings and streets set up a cheer.

Three-quarters of an hour later as she sped down Broadway in her car a traffic cop held up his hand.

"Well, Pathe Pearl," he said, "my money's on you every time!"

'CONDUCTOR 786' RIDES AGAIN

After a well earned vacation in Florida "Conductor 786" comes back to New Rochelle to don the blue suit and brass buttons again in Falstaff Comedies. It is Riley Chamberlin, originator of the character; as emperor of the rear platform, with number 786 on his hat, Riley has won a big following.

Although he is an actor of long and honorable experience, Chamberlin's youth found him, as a college boy, holding down a conductor's job one summer in Atlanta, Georgia. His wit gave the world that famous inspection story. The inspector boarded Riley's car one day and promptly pointed out that there were sixteen passengers in the car, but the fare register showed only fifteen nickels rung up.

Riley looked at the indicator, counted his passengers, and said: "You're right! One of them's got to get off!"

Juanita Hansen, who has the role of Cleo Burke in "The Secret of the Submarine," aroused the curiosity of Director George Sargent and the members of the company during the filming of the first chapters of the forthcoming big picture.

At first it was believed that she took such an interest in the production and development of the plot that she could not wait until she received her copy of the script, to find out what was going on. Then one day, the cat popped out of the bag. The reason was that purely feminine one, clothes. In the earlier part of the serial her characterization calls for simple garb, and she was anxious to find out as far ahead as possible how she was to "dress the part" in the later installments, so she could prepare an extensive wardrobe.

When she learned she would be able to wear nifty clothes she was quite satisfied, and her many friends later on will see her in the marvelous creations.

"Split Reel" News for Theater Men

THE convention and exposition, which will be held in Minneapolis in May, is receiving wide publicity through the newspapers of the Northwest. Exhibitors everywhere will be helping to boost the big show if they will ask their local newspapers to run readers which are being furnished by the convention publicity staff.

The Mystic Theater, Petaluma, Calif., of which J. A. McNear, Jr., is manager, is issuing a very handy sized program. It would slip easily into a man's pocket or a woman's handbag and so be an ever ready reminder of what is going on at that theater. Another good idea in this program is that it announces at just what time the performances will begin. Mr. McNear is running matinees every day and uses only Triangle and Paramount releases.

Eagle, Nebr., will have motion picture shows twice a week in the opera house. Frank Gillette, Jr., has opened the house.

Jay Dundas has sold the Maynard Theater at Mitchell, S. D., to G. W. Dyckman, who will take possession at once.

The large brick building at the corner of Twenty-first street and Broadway in Council Bluffs, has been converted into an up-to-date picture house, to be known as the Gem Theater. The building has been thoroughly remodeled to meet requirements, and has raised seats and tastefully decorated walls. Four 16-inch oscillating fans are to be installed, and the theater promises to be a popular place of amusement for the West End residents.

D. C. McClellan, manager of the Garden Theater in Minneapolis, is advertising his features in a most timely fashion. Recently he presented "Live Wire and Love Sparks," and his electric flash in the lobby packed the theater throughout the day. When he exhibited "Drugged Waters" Mr. McClellan had a large lobby and street display arranged by one of the water companies. This attracted much attention to the house and its pictures. When "The Stars and Stripes in Mexico" was billed at the New Garden soldiers were pacing the walk in front of the theater and the house was decorated in patriotic colors.

That a good artist can add materially to the attractiveness of the program is demonstrated in the four-page folder issued weekly by The Princess Theater, Frankfort, Ind. The cover design is very artistic and is printed in dull shades of purple, brown and blue prettily blended. The manager overlooked a good chance for advertising though in that his name does not appear anywhere on this program.

David Stewart, manager Red Mill Theater, Hamilton, Can., planned a very unique program for his patrons in conjunction with the big war film, "The Campbells Are Coming," released by the Universal Film Company. On this occasion Mr. Stewart invited the 173rd Scotch Regiment, commanded by Col. Bruce, to be his guests. The theater was elaborately and appropriately decorated and a special musical program prepared. The men, led by Col. Bruce, marched to the theater 650 strong, including their officers. After the show the regiment was presented with a silk flag by the employes of the Red Mill Theater. The Rev. Banks Nelson delivered an address. Mr. T. J. Stewart, member of Parliament for West Hamilton, also spoke during the afternoon.

A. M. Brown has purchased the motion picture theater at Burlington, N. D. He operates a chain of houses which takes in Kenmare, Carpio and Donnybrook.

Dreamland Theater lives up to its name in the cover design of the program, which pictures a maiden in diaphanous draperies peacefully sleeping in a hammock swung among tropical verdure. One point worthy of note and imitation in this program is that a concise summary of the plot of the photoplays to be shown is given opposite each day's program. This helps the patrons to decide which plays will particularly appeal to them, and adds to their interest in the program.

Jay E. Gould, manager of the Crystal Theater at Glencoe, Minn., has the distinction of installing the first Super-Kinetoscope in the Central United States. He purchased the machine from Thomas A. Edison, Inc., for $600 and says that it is well worth the price. "This is a great machine," Mr. Gould says. "It projects a perfect picture without the slightest trace of flicker." Mr. Gould cartainly is giving his patrons a good run for their money. He has a six-piece orchestra and in April played "The Birth of a Nation" for three days. He will exhibit "The Battle Cry of Peace" in May. He also has arranged to show Selig's new de luxe edition of "The Spoilers" in May.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Roman are planning to enlarge the Rex Theater at Virginia, Minn. Increasing business in the past few months has made the change necessary.

The Palace Photoplay House Co. has been incorporated at Racine, Wis. The capital stock is $10,000 and the incorporators are: Martin J. Hueffner, Edward Collins and M. E. Walker. The new concern will conduct a movie show in the Masonic Temple building, the south end of the lower floor of that building being remodeled for the house.

Robert Kent has taken possession of the North Theater at Columbus, Nebr., having purchased the house from Oscar Baker.

The Zenith Feature Film Co. has had perhaps the most remarkable growth of any independent distributing office that has ever operated in the Northwest. Two years ago last October they started out with one copy of "Arizona," a six-reel feature, which did remarkable business in this territory. From that small beginning and in the remarkable short time of two years and a half they have grown until the Duluth office occupies the entire sixth floor of the Lyceum building, with perhaps thirty people necessary to handle the business. During this time they have handled a number of big film successes, one of the latest being the big war film, "Germany on the Firing Line," four copies of which have been kept busy every day for the last eight weeks. They are also distributors in the Northwest for the Ivan products, seven releases of which are now ready for booking. These productions are making exhibitors money and going big wherever used. Their recent purchase of "Silver Threads Among the Gold" is another big success and no doubt will prove a money-getter for exhibitors in this territory. The branch offices being established will be in charge of competent and thoroughly experienced film men, who have a big acquaintance and stand very high in their respective districts.

Novelty Theater, Malone, N. Y., also has instituted some novelties in its program. The cover bears the inscription, "Don't throw this away, shove it in your pocket—keep it handy as it gives you just the information you desire about the shows each day throughout the week." The inside front cover is devoted to a department headed "Reel Dope—devoted to the photoplay and Novelty Theater." In this department they ask for criticisms of the photoplays and suggestions for the betterment of the theater. Also they agree to publish in the program letters from their patrons telling what films they like best, pointing out errors or inconsistencies in the plot, action or costuming of the play, etc. This idea ought to prove a bond of sympathy between the patrons and manager as well as between the different patrons.

The Favorite Feature Films of Minneapolis have been fortunate in securing new prints of "The Christian" from the Vitagraph Company of America, which are being released by this concern. "The Christian" is in eight reels and is from the story of the same name by Hall Caine.

The Princess Theater and the Premier Theater in Sherbrooke have made a change, now using Universal Service, Blue Bird Films and Universal program. These two theaters represent the cream of the business in Sherbrooke.

The Janesville Amusement Co., of Janesville, Wis., has been incorporated. The capital stock is $5,000. The incorporators are: J. A. Strimble, Harry O. Newland and F. E. Sutherland.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than clsasification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

During the Round-Up—Biograph—May 8.—Featuring Lillian Gish, Fred Burns, Henry Walthall and William Carroll. Called away on a deal, the ranchero left the foreman in full charge of the round-up. That was the opportunity the stranger and his accomplice were seeking. The girl's determination to recover the money at all costs resulted in a daring rescue on the part of the young foreman, who registered another triumph at the final round-up.

Skirts and Cinders—Lubin—May 8.—Featuring Davy Don. John Windom, a comedian of the Kentucky Bells Company, is stranded and steals a suitcase belonging to Betty Greene, while she is talking to her future husband. When he opens the suitcase he finds a letter which reads that the young lady is being sent to a girl's seminary. Windom secures a wig and dresses up in the girl's clothes and proceeds to the seminary, presents the letter and is admitted. The girls make it lively for him until the girl's mother arrives and denounces him as an imposter.

A Stranger in New York—(Three Reels)—Selig—May 8.—Featuring Otis Harlan. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

Merry Mary—(Two Reels)—Biograph—May 9.—Featuring an all-star cast. Merry Mary, ward of Professor Moggs, a bookworm, is sent by him to the home of Miss Twemlow, an old friend and sweetheart of the professor's. Mary instead of going to Miss Twemlow's goes to the home of her old nurse, who keeps an inn near the town where Miss Twemlow resides. When Mary fails to arrive Miss Twemlow wires the professor to this effect and he comes to her home to investigate. Mary meets the nephew of Miss Twemlow and they are married. Paul takes Mary to his aunt's house and it is not until the professor arrives after a fruitless search, that Miss Twemlow learns that Mary is the professor's ward, and the girl she wished her nephew to marry.

A Return to Youth—and Trouble—(Two Reels)—Essanay—May 9.—Featuring Harry Dunkinson, Lillian Drew, Edward Arnold and Frances Raymond. Karl Myron, who has been a model husband for eleven years, is astounded when brought to a sudden realization that he is showing the marks of age. He dons a loud suit long discarded, a jaunty hat and a glaring tie. He does not come home to dinner that evening, but wanders about in the bright lights. He meets Mrs. Wyck, who is also "lit" up, and together they go to the theater. After the theater they went to supper to a little Italian place he used to know. The place is raided and Mrs. Wyck faints. Mrs. Wyck phones Mrs. Myron and tells her that Mr. Wyck brought Mr. Myron home with him, he had a few cocktails, and seemed rather intoxicated. Myron goes home, but he couldn't lie, so he confessed all to his wife.

The Wheat and the Chaff—(Three Reels)—Lubin—May 11.—A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

The Jester—(Three Reels)—Essanay—May 13.—Featuring John Junior, Gertrude Glover and William Burke. Bob Blair, son of a steel magnate, gets into a disgraceful brawl in a cafe and Jane Whitman is sent out by the city editor, who is trying to force the elder Blair to sell out, to interview him and in her story she makes him look ridiculous. The story stings young Blair and he goes to work in his father's factory. The girl again is assigned the story and when her story is turned in she is discharged because she praised the boy instead of writing a satire on the gilded youth in overalls. Blair gets in touch with the girl and she tells him of her being discharged and she is hired as his father's secretary. Bob and Jane later are the means of frustrating a plot to cause labor trouble, and John Blair with proof of the conspiracy is able to warn the trust to refrain from pressing him and when Bob takes charge as superintendent, his father's secretary leaves the position for a place in the family.

TRIANGLE PLAYS

Dorothy Gish in Susan Rocks the Boat

May 14th is the week for the release of The Triangle Fine Arts picture "Susan Rocks the Boat," the latest play in which Dorothy Gish appears. This popular star has an indefinable charm about her that goes straight to the heart of the most disinterested patrons.

In "Susan Rocks the Boat" she isn't satisfied just to stay home and enjoy life—to be of no benefit to the world at large. She wants to do things, to turn bad into good—to be an important figure in the community.

So dainty Dorothy sets out to open a settlement house, reform a saloon keeper, and make bad boys drink ice cream sodas instead of whiskey.

Just because she was so sweet and innocent the big burly saloon keeper thought he could take advantage of her, but he failed to take Owen Moore into consideration. It was a real fight to the finish with fists, chairs and other things—one of those swift moving affairs that make your audience sit up straight in a hurry. Out went the light and in an instant he had escaped with her in his arms.

Then Bessie Barriscale in "Not My Sister" is the title of the Triangle-Ince picture for the same week. Should a wife happily married confess to her husband a misstep made in her youth, should she risk her happiness in this way? These are the questions to be decided.

Expositions Close Their Doors

TWO SUCCESSFUL EVENTS ENDED

ALTHOUGH the doors have been closed on the two expositions, the decorations and artistic booths are a thing of the past, the committees in charge have disorganized, the exhibitors and visitors have returned to their homes, nevertheless the expositions are not things of the past in the minds of those who attended. On the contrary it will be a long time before they are forgotten, and the benefits derived and the ideas gained will be lasting. Everyone connected with the exhibitions has a feeling of work well done, of great things accomplished.

The exposition at the Palace of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League was in no way overshadowed by the exhibition which followed it at the Garden of the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America. Each was a complement to the other, and rounded out the other, making a well balanced whole.

One of the features of the Exhibitors' show which attracted a great deal of attention was the Amateur Scenario Contest conducted by the Evening World. This contest brought over 300 manuscripts. The prize was awarded to David Schooner, New York City, for his script entitled "His Daughter's Sacrifice," for which he received $100. Honorable mention for scenarios submitted was given to Benjamin Barrish, 1447 Wilkins avenue, the Bronx; Clifford A. Hahn, 1612 Avenue L, Brooklyn; Solomon Rosenzweig, 959 East 163d street, New York City; Ella L. Karikas, 237 East 163d street, New York City; Loretta Hogan, 505 West 135th street, New York City.

The committees in charge of this contest were:

Cast Committee—William Quirk, president of the Screen Club; E. T. Lincoln, Joseph W. Smiley.

Scenario Committee—Jacob Wilk, Hazen Conklin of the New York World, Stephen Bush of the Moving Picture World.

Joseph W. Smiley, late director of the Lubin Company, acted as director general, and took complete charge of staging the picture. He had as his assistant George de Carlton. The company was composed entirely of amateurs and the twelve episodes were made at the exposition. Two applicants or more were chosen for each character.

After a careful examination of the test photographs taken, Director Smiley made his final choice of the principals, and extras as well. Eight amateurs were picked to portray the leading characters, as follows: Mrs. Ida Sidley, Mrs. Maloney; Alice Ashton, Edna Maloney; Marie (maid), Elsie George; Tom Maloney, John McGraw; Bert Thompson, Lou Reimer; Hugh Casey, Raymond Marine; the minister, Walter J. Eise; the police lieutenant, George H. West.

The police force was interpreted by Irving Baker, Hugh Cooney, H. A. Steward, Alfred Aven, George Ulrich, Michael J. O'Brien. William Besterman, Frederick Lee, Edward Hamel and L. F. Umrath, while against these as gangsters were pitted E. S. Huntington, Paul Kohloff, Sidney Forsman, Charles Lawson, A. Dean, Louis Morin, Frederick Varnes, Mack Osbrin, Daniel Sear, Albery Clay and E. F. McGuire.

Two reels were shown Saturday at the exposition.

The bombardment of New York was another feature which attracted attention. Vera Pearce, the Metro star, accompanied Aviator John C. Millman, on an aerial ride circling from Mineola to New York and return. Two hundred soft cotton "bombs," to each of which was attached an envelope containing two season passes to the exposition, were used in the bombardment.

The Motion Picture Board of Trade of America opened its exposition most auspiciously with a street parade of automobiles filled with motion picture stars, and the ascension of a dirigible balloon, "Bluebird," manipulated by A. Leo Stevens, the aeronaut. The beginning of the festivities in the garden was the playing of "America" by the Rialto Symphony Orchestra. This changed to the "Board of Trade" march, composed especially for the occasion by Samuel L. Rothapfel, when the official emblem of the Motion Picture Board of Trade was unveiled. The address of welcome was delivered by Commodore J. Stuart Blackton. He was followed by Dudley Field Malone, Collector of the Port of New York, and by Rear Admiral Usher of the United States navy. Others who addressed the audience were the Rev. Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady, Dr. Clarence J. Owens, managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress, and Rev. Dr. Steven S. Wise. There was a strong anti-censorship current in all the addresses by the representative public men present.

In his address Commodore Blackton spoke feelingly on this subject:

Starting as a mere novelty, a fad, a nine days' wonder, this marvelous combination of literature, art and science, music and the drama, psychology, philosophy, history and romance has outstripped in gigantic strides all contemporaneous arts, and has resolved itself into the greatest of all the allied arts, unsurpassed and unsurpassable—the photo drama.

The greatest peril that menaces the photoplay is the attempt by professional agitators, by hypocritical reformers and office-seeking politicians to apply the muzzle of censorship to the motion picture, which under the Constitution of the United States of America should and must be as free and untrammeled as the press, the stage and the right of free speech. The attempt to apply official and political censorship to the photo drama is equally an endeavor to deprive the public of its inalienable right under the Constitution to decide for itself what it shall read, what it shall see, to what it shall listen and at what it shall look. No group of five, ten or fifty paid officials has the right to decide what pictures one hundred million American citizens shall see.

The list of men who were responsible for the exposition show one vital reason why it was so great a success.

Manufacturers—Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, chairman; Carl Laemmle, P. A. Powers, Ira Lowry, E. A. Mac-

Manus, S. S. Hutchinson, Leon Gaumont, David Horsley, George K. Spoor, Edwin Thanhouser, William Fox, Samuel Goldfish, Adolph Zukor and Felix Malitz.

Van Loan, R. M. Vandivert, Jacob Wilk.

The color scheme used in the decorations was green and white, which while it proved very effective and attractive was also restful to the eye, which is a point to be considered when you are trying to see so many things and everything at once. All the manufacturing companies were represented with elaborate and artistic displays, and the motion picture actors and actresses were very much in evidence both in portraits adorning the various booths and many were present in person.

The Universal players were Mary Fuller, Matt Moore, Jane Gail, Hobart Henley, Dorothy Phillips and King Baggot.

Among the interesting and amusing features at the exposition was the New Talent Contest Day, when a prize was given for the ugliest boy. All boys considered homely enough to enter the contest were admitted free to the show. The contest consisted of registering the different emotions on the screen. The prettiest motion picture actress showed how it should be done and then the boys tried to imitate her portrayal. This was carried on in full sight of the audience and the prizes were awarded by popular vote. The ugliest boy received a gold watch, the next ugliest a silver watch, and the third ugliest a nickel watch.

The Paragon Players ran a mock police court all during the show, and arrested everyone who looked as if they could take a joke. When led into the police court, which was presided over by Tim Cronin, the prisoners were fined twenty-five cents, but they all paid it gladly when informed that it would be used in the campaign for the veto of the Cristman-Wheeler censorship bill. Francis Mersoir, Daisy Egan and Kathleen Grace were sergeants of the policewomen, assisted by Hazel Rexroth, Pearl Braugan, Irene Karlick, Mary Winter, Pearl Broan and Mabel Connor. Jennie Bidgood, formerly with the Fox Film Company, was the chief of police.

The Raver Film Corporation who is acting as sales agent for the Ocean Film Company in the marketing of their subjects, "Life Without Soul," "The Fortunate Youth," and "Driftwood," as well as manufacturing pictures of their own brand made from the plays of Augustus Thomas is marketing the new Austrian war pictures, "Austria at War," for the Austrian government.

Every foot of the picture was said to be cinematographed under the personal supervision of one of his majesty's staff officers and contains many intimate views of the warfare which could not be secured otherwise.

Vitagraph Forms $25,000,000 Corporation

BROADENED SCOPE PROMISES GREAT FUTURE

THE Vitagraph Company is now a $25,000,000 organization. Announcement of this gigantic step in capitalization was made recently by Albert E. Smith and Commodore J. Stuart Blackton.

The stock is divided into $10,000,000 preferred and $15,000,000 common. The majority of the stock in the new company will be controlled by the three partners in the old concern, Messrs. Rock, Blackton and Smith.

Albert Smith

The stable name of the old Vitagraph Company of America, therefore, will never be connected with any promoting schemes or stock jobbing propositions. The new money in the concern merely represents a sound investment and not a desire to inflate the company's worth nor control its activities. There will be no stock put out on the market.

W. T. Rock, owner of a large block of stock in the new company, has retired from active participation in the affairs of the concern. Although one of the original organizers of the company, Mr. Smith and Commodore Blackton being the others, Mr. Rock has not taken an active part in the management for some time. Mr. Smith will take care of the executive end of the company while Commodore Blackton will take charge of production.

In an interview with a representative of MOTOGRAPHY, Commodore Blackton said: "A number of times before the reorganization of the Vitagraph Company we were approached by financiers on the subject of a combine. Being well established and fortified here, we could not see where it would be to our advantage to combine with other producing and releasing concerns, and told these men so and why.

"They had made a careful and comprehensive study of the motion picture business, and readily saw the strength of our arguments. The initiative in this reorganization was taken by them. The new stockholders in our concern are the big financiers of New York, which means that they are foremost in the financial circles of the world.

"William Randolph Hearst is positively not a member of this new company. We will soon release a serial called 'The Secret Kingdom,' which will be syndicated by the Hearst organization, but that publicity connection marks the limit of our relations. We do not at present contemplate taking in any other concern. Should such a course later on become expedient we will probably follow it, but at the present we have no such plans."

This new organization is purely an enlargement of the old Vitagraph Company. Its financial condition makes it broader and more powerful in its scope, and better fitted in every way to turn out pictures of all varieties and of unsurpassable excellence. Some time ago plans were laid for the construction of a studio in Paris. When the present war finds its terminus France will become one of Vitagraph's sources of production. It is probable that the coast studios will be enlarged soon. As the Vitagraph Company owns considerable property adjoining its Flatbush studio in Brooklyn, production there can expand naturally.

J. Stuart Blackton

Commodore Blackton stated that he had no information to give out at the present time regarding the possible enrollment of addition stars. E. H. Sothern, who is retiring from the stage, is to become a Vitagraph star. Edna May, who won international favor in "The Belle of New York" and has appeared on the screen recently in Vitagraph's "Salvation Joan," will resume picture work at the studio within a few months.

The Vitagraph roll call already contains many famous screen stars. Among them are Anita Stewart, Edith Storey, Dorothy Kelly, Earle Williams, Lillian Walker, Charles Richman, Frank Daniels, Joseph Kilgour, Harry Morey and others.

Among the prominent novelists whose works are being filmed by Vitagraph are Cyrus Townsend Brady, Anna Katherine Green, James Oliver Curwood, George Randolph Chester, Hamlin Garland, Owen Wister, Paul West, and Arthur Train. Rights have been secured to all of O. Henry's stories but two, "Alias Jimmy Valentine" and one other of his dramas to which the stage rights have been sold. The O. Henry stories are 258 in number. Of these about 100 are suitable for picture purposes. Some of them will become feature pictures of four and five-reel lengths while others will be reproduced in shorter films.

The next year will see many big productions made and released by the Vitagraph Company. "The Dawn of Tomorrow," a seven-reel subject scheduled for release in July, is now complete and on the shelf, waiting for its birthday. "The Conflict," a picture recently produced by Ralph Ince, is also waiting for release. It is either seven or eight reels in length.

Late summer will see the completion of "The Battle Cry of War," a sequel to "The Battle Cry of Peace." It will be in about nine or ten reels, and will be released in the fall. The next Vitagraph serial will be "The Scarlet Runner," by C. N. and A. N. Williamson. It is a thrilling series of automobile adventures, featuring Earle Williams. Following this will come the Louis Joseph Vance serial, "The Secret Kingdom," in which the leading parts will be taken by Charles Richman, Dorothy Kelly, Joseph Kilgour and Arline Pretty.

The Ivan Company has completed "Her Husband's Wife," upon which Director Abramson and his cast have been working four weeks.

ATTACKS BASE PICTURES

Herbert Brenon, Maker of the Fox Million Dollar Spectacle, Attacks Unclean Pictures and Upholds Censorship

While Herbert Brenon, creator and producer of the notable Fox feature, which has just been completed, is not ready yet to talk about this picture, he is willing to discuss pictures in general—as they are made and as they will be made in the future.

Mr. Brenon claims there are many pictures produced which depend for their appeal on the exploitation of the base and the unpleasant. This class includes plays of nearly every type. The trouble with them is not that they contain unpleasant incidents as some of the greatest works of art are utterly unpleasant, but that they contain nothing else. Speaking further on this subject, Mr. Brenon said:

"I believe that the screen should be free—the screen as it should be, that is. I believe that when a delicate sex situation is demanded by a play; when, by omitting that situation we should ruin the whole drama, and lose a work of art, that sex situation should be allowed; that no censor should be allowed to cut it away simply because it was delicate. But the chamber-of-horrors film which has no appeal but that of its lewdness, its agonizing death scenes; the appeal, in short, of sheer repulsiveness, I want to condemn as strongly as I can. I believe that for the good of humanity it should be banished. If no other means than censorship will serve to banish it, I believe in censorship as strict as may be necessary, supported by powers of the severest punishment. I believe in freedom for the screen—but only for a screen worthy to be free. It has been said that the public is capable of censoring its own pictures.

"The manufacturer who has no other ideal than money making can make money easily by making the appeal to the base; he can even force the better-class manufacturer—who must make his business pay—to follow reluctantly in his footsteps. So the moral standard is lowered, and the lowering of standards brings always evil results. We should not cry for a free screen but for a clean screen. A clean screen will be free."

As he advocates the free screen so also Mr. Brennon advocates freedom of production. He claims that no great work can be accomplished which is restricted as to length and date of completion. He says that producers are realizing the absurdity of forcing a story into five reels—neither more or less and the absurdity of hastening work and spoiling its effect simply so that it may go out on a certain date. He claims there can be no automatic art in picture making.

"Good pictures are the only pictures we want; and it is impossible to produce a good picture unless each subject proposed is treated on its merits, individually, as to length, time for completion and expenditure to be allowed. Today, one looks on the subjects produced—operas, poems, novels, short-stories, folk-legends, even songs; of all natures and sizes. All are accorded the same treatment. The short-story makes five reels; the novel makes five reels; the poem makes five reels; the folk-legend makes five rels. They are all made in approximately the same length of time. How absurd this is obvious.

"The slogan of the picture industry should be 'Promptly if possible—but at any cost a good picture.'"

NEW FILM SAFETY DEVICE

Film Fire Prevention Company Presents Invention to Reduce Danger From Film Fires—Endorsed by Underwriters

Exhibitors, operators, fire underwriters and the motion picture industry in general are manifesting much interest in a new "safety first" device which lessens the risk of fire in theaters to a minimum.

Crowds were always thick around the booth of the Film Fire Prevention Company, who were demonstrating their latest safe-guard against fire at the Third International Exposition of the motion picture art at Grand Central Palace, and at the Motion Picture Board of Trade Exposition at Madison Square Garden, New York.

The device consists of two knife-edged magnets, one attached to the upper film can, one to the lower, a highly inflammable piece of fuse and a controlling device. The action takes place as follows: Should the film catch fire through clogging or in any other way the fuse is instantaneously ignited, immediately both magnets are released, cutting off the film as a razor blade would, thereby limiting the loss of film to just the number of feet exposed between the upper and lower cans. At the same time the booth shutter closes the house lights are turned on and the orchestra signalled to play.

The National Board of Underwriters, The New York State Board of Underwriters and the Travelers Insurance Company experts have been unanimous in their opinion that installation of this device will reduce the insurance rate on theaters and make possible personal insurance for the machine operator who has thus far been denied insurance.

Exhibitors' Convention at Pittsburgh

The Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh has announced that the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania has decided to hold its annual convention there on June 26, 27 and 28.

This will mean 600 delegates from Pennsylvania and almost as many more visitors, operators and exhibitors from all parts of the country, will get together in the steel city for the general benefit of films and the perpendicular stage.

Federal Censorship Bill Reported

BY THOMAS O. MONK

Washington Correspondent for Motography.

THE Hughes bill providing for Federal prepublicity censorshop of motion pictures which was authorized last week by the House Committee on Education to be favorably reported has been reported to the House, and Chairman Hughes states his intention of bringing it forward for discussion and a vote on its passage at the present session of Congress.

Members of the House and Senate have stated that Congress will undoubtedly be in session until September 1 at least, and in view of this there will be afforded ample opportunity for Chairman Hughes to bring the bill forward.

The bill is a comprehensive one, but it is substantially the same as the one printed in Motography February 12, 1916. However, it has one important section inserted which may possibly meet some of the objections aimed at the original bill. This is section 13 which provides that "the commission provided in this act shall have the power to issue licenses or permits for motion picture films, for adults only, and no such film shall be exhibited to children under the age of sixteen years." It was strongly brought out during the hearings on the Hughes bill that there are many standard American books which possibly might be open to the objection that they should not be placed in the hands of children, but that this objection had never taken the form of trying to prevent their circulation. It was urged that there were a certain class of motion picture plays perhaps not suitable for children, but that this was no valid reason for the adoption of a drastic law that would prevent the pictures from being produced and seen by adults when there was every legal right for them to be produced and seen.

The bill provides for five commissioners, to be named by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the chairman to be designated by the President. The commissioners are to receive salaries of $7,500 per annum, the chairman to receive $8,000 per annum. It seems doubtful whether the government can get men at these salaries that will measure up to the caliber of men to discharge the important duty of passing on what shall or shall not be seen by millions of American citizens.

Provision is made for the commission to appoint deputy commissioners and other employes.

The principal office of the commission is to be in Washington, but it may establish branch offices wherever efficiency, economy, and the public interests require. Then provision is made that each branch established by the commission for the purpose of submission of films is to be in charge of a commissioner or a deputy who shall be vested with authority to issue licenses and permits.

It is provided that the commission shall promptly license motion picture films unless the films are obscene, indecent, immoral or inhuman, or is a reproduction of an actual bull fight or prize fight, or is of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals or incite to crime.

As exclusively stated in Motography several weeks ago, the bill exempts motion picture films now in existence or those that may be produced up to the time the act is approved, from any kind of censorship. It is provided, however, that permits for them to be transported must be applied for within sixty days after the act goes into effect. This is intended to get a complete and accurate list of films thus exempted. No fees are to be charged for permits for these exempted films.

The bill gives the commission three days in which to act on applications for permits for films.

It also provides for a court review of applications rejected, the review to be by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

Motion picture films of a strictly scientific character are exempted from the provisions of the act when it is shown that they are not to be exhibited at any private or public place of amusement.

Section 8 fixes the license fee at $2 for each one thousand feet or fraction thereof and 50 cents for each additional copy thereof, and it is provided that if it is shown that these fees produce more money than is necessary to support the work of the commission they are to be reduced.

Section 11 of the bill prohibits the exhibition of unlicensed films.

Section 12 of the act provides a penalty of a fine not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, for violations of the act.

The bill appropriates $90,000 for the purpose of establishing offices, etc.

The act is to take effect thirty days after the approval of the President.

Film Exports Continue to Climb

Exports of motion picture films continue to climb, according to the statistics of the Department of Commerce for February. In February, 1916, they amounted to 21,046,240 feet valued at $906,217, as compared with 18,929,800 feet valued at $515,703. The big gain is in motion picture plays as in February last the exports were 8,300,822 feet valued at $530,615 as against only 2,770,984 feet valued at $169,200, in February, 1915.

For the eight months of the fiscal year ended February, 1916, the total exports of motion picture films was 120,764,909 feet valued at $5,189,184 as against 58,746,835 feet valued at $2,372,012 for the eight months of the fiscal year which ended February, 1915.

The United Kingdom leads as a purchaser in February with 10,870,740 feet valued at $549,643; France is second, taking 1,441,674 feet valued at $29,384, and Canada third, 978,719 feet valued at $73,137. Brazil and other countries take the remainder of the exports.

The imports of motion picture and other films amounted in February to $98,921 as against $67,075 in February, 1915.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is planning the most extensive investigations into foreign market conditions ever undertaken at one time by the Government, the investigations to start after July 1, the beginning of the new fiscal year. The Bureau will have more money at its disposal beginning with the new fiscal year than ever before, and plans to send numerous investigators into the foreign field.

Motion picture manufacturers and distributors who desire foreign business should communicate with E. E. Pratt, chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and he will give very careful consideration to their communications on the subject of the extension of their business.

The motion picture industry has now reached proportions that entitle it to very respectful consideration at the hands of the Government, and the representative of Motography can state that if manufacturers and distributors evince interest in foreign markets in general, or any special markets abroad, Dr. Pratt will cordially cooperate with them. All the Bureau wants is information and it will do the rest and without expense to the manufacturers or distributors. So, manufacturers and distributors, start in and use the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce as Congress is appropriating money for the benefit of you and others so get the benefit of it. Other industries have done and are doing it, so why not you? If you show any interest the representative of Motography will assure you that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce will.

In this connection, the Bureau has just issued a 141-page bulletin, "Export Trade Suggestions," in compliance with a demand for information on foreign trade subjects. These suggestions are not concerned with the sale of any particular lines of goods in foreign markets but with problems which sooner or later confront exporters in every line such as questions of credit, agencies, etc.

Harry Crandall, owner of the "Movie" Theater, the Avenue Grand, and the Apollo Motion Picture House, has acquired the Savoy Theater, on 14th street, one of Washington's elite theaters. The consideration was $75,000 for a lease of eighteen years. Mr. Crandall took over the theater on May 1. Mr. Crandall will carry out the work of remodelling and enlarging decided upon by the former management, particularly with regard to the outdoor garden.

NEW NATIONAL ORGANIZATION

Big Figures in Picture Industry Getting Together on New Organization to Include Exhibitors, Manufacturers and Exchanges

Although no authorized statement has been issued there is a well founded report to the effect that the next ten days will see the formation of a national organization to be composed of exhibitors, manufacturers, and exchange men to be known as the Motion Picture Chamber of Commerce.

A great deal of interest has been manifested in this project and seven manufacturers and about fifteen exchange men have testified as to their intention to join the new organization.

One man who is vitally interested in the furthering of this new project has personally guaranteed the enrollment of 2,500 exhibitors at an annual fee of $10 as a foundation for the organization.

The purpose of this Chamber of Commerce would be to represent the members in all matters pertaining to the film industry that may arise of a legal, business or other character but there will be a complete avoidance of all personal grievances and an unselfish attention to matters of importance involving those whom it will represent.

Speaking of the matter a promiment film man said: "This is more than a mere rumor, and while I cannot now be personally quoted, I am willing to say that there is every prospect of its going through. A meeting has been held, attended by several well-known men engaged in the industry from one angle or another, who have expressed their desire to co-operate thoroughly, and who believe that the new organization will have a most salutary effect upon the motion picture business. While no formal action has as yet been taken there is little doubt that the organization will soon be effected."

The project was also discussed at the Brooklyn exhibitors' meeting recently and there was a decided sentiment in favor of it, as was there also at the Exhibitors' Exposition committee meeting where more than a hundred film men discussed the topic. It is expected that very soon the organization will crystalize and officers will be announced.

Rialto Makes First Production

The operations of the Rialto Film Corporation, whose executive officers are in the Candler Building Annex, New York, have been largely kept a secret from the trade. Jesse J. Goldburg, the general manager of the company, however, has now stated that the initial production of that company is entitled "The House of Mirrors," a play conceived by Frederick Chapin.

Frank Mills, formerly with the Triangle Film Corporation, is starred in the production and is supported by Lillian Kemble who has appeared under the management of Wm. A. Brady, John Cort and Winthrop Ames; Bliss Milford, formerly ingenue lead in the Edison Company; Harry Spingler; J. Frank Glendon; Rudolph Cameron; Runa Hodges and Master Jack Curtis.

The production has already been purchased by the Popular Pictures Corporation and will in all probability be released on the state rights basis by that concern.

Northwestern Show a Big Success

EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION TO BE CONGRATULATED

ALTHOUGH the weatherman did not do his part, he was the only "ditcher," at the second annual convention and exposition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the Northwest held in Minneapolis the first week in May. Even if the visitors were sprinkled by a lively rain on the opening day the spirits of neither the many visitors nor the companies in charge of the display booths were dampened in the least. All declared this was the best show they had ever held from the standpoint of attendance, number and quality of the displays and the real business transacted during the exhibition.

The exposition was opened by an address of welcome by Mayor Wallace D. Nye of Minneapolis. Mayor Nye's speech was brief but forceful and he urged the co-operation of the exhibitors in regard to the censorship question. All through his talk he showed his sympathy and deep feeling for the exhibitors and the success of their undertaking.

Governor J. A. A. Burnquist of Minnesota delivered an address on Tuesday evening from the platform in the center of the hall. The governor seemed to be very much interested in all the activities of the exposition and was loud in his praise of the work of the exhibitors and urged co-operation of the exhibitors and state and city officials.

Among other distinguished guests at the show were Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Corporation, who made a special trip from New York to attend the show, and President Herrington of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, who came from Pittsburgh especially to meet the exhibitors. Mr. Herrington addressed the exhibitors, extending greetings from the east, and telling of the work of the national association.

The picture stars in attendance included: Valeska Suratt, Fox star, who was at the Orpheum Theater, St. Paul; Anna Held, Morosco star, from the Orpheum in Minneapolis; C. W. Giffen of "Cowpuncher" fame; Edward Arnold, Bryant Washburn and Margaret Clayton, Essanay Company; William Coburn, wife and children; Ned Campbell and wife, and Gypsy Vernon of the new Great West Film Corporation, St. Paul.

During the noon hour on the opening day of the exposition an automobile parade in two sections went through the downtown districts. One section of the parade was led by Rossiter's band, while the other was headed by players from the Great West Film Company on horseback. All the noted visitors participated in this parade, as did also the ten prize winning girls from the Minneapolis Tribune's "twin sister" contest. The winners in this contest were:

Miss Eugenie Young of the Bainbridge players (Dorothy Bernard), Mrs. Hoople Provan (Beverly Bayne), Miss Hazel Wise (Theda Bara), Miss Mabel Byrnes (Mary Pickford), Miss Veronica Kiley (Mae Marsh), Miss Belle West (Helen Holmes), all of Minneapolis; Miss Evelyn MacDonald, St. Paul (Anita Stewart); Miss Ruth Severson, Minneapolis (Edna Purviance); Miss Violet Ellsworth, Minneapolis (Blanche Sweet), and Miss Persis Johnson, White Bear, Minn. (Lottie Pickford).

The consensus of opinion was that every exhibit was "the best," that no one stood out from the others because of its superiority for all displays were so well planned that they were "hard to beat." The displays were as varied as the different branches of the film industry for every branch was represented from tickets to novel equipment at top notch prices. One very commendable and pleasing feature of the entire exhibit was that the advertising and transacting of business was done in a very quiet and dignified manner. There were no barkers and no glaring inartistic signs or displays.

The booths devoted to the exhibits of the big film companies included the following:

V. L. S. E.

This booth was in charge of C. W. Savin, manager of the exchange, assisted by E. S. Flynn, B. E. Drumm, C. L. McVey, M. E. Maxwell and R. C. Fox. Anita Stewart, Grace Darmond and Edith Storey were present in portraits hung in the booth, and Evelyn MacDonald as Anita Stewart, in the Tribune contest was present in person.

FOX

The Fox booth also displayed a collection of portraits of the company's stars. The slogan of this company was "get acquainted," and the representatives, Manager Westcott, Harry Leonhardt, Harry Hollander and T. A. Burke, did their best to live up to it. Valeska Suratt was a visitor at this booth.

GREAT WEST FILM CORPORATION

The booth of the Great West Film Corporation was decorated with ancient Indian and western relics, and was notable because all the stars of the company were at the show. To be met at this display were Mr. and Mrs. Wallace D. Coburn and family, Mr. and Mrs. Ned Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Cooper of Chicago, C. W. Hitchcock, Chicago, Gypsy Vernon of Mobile, Ala., and William F. Tobin of St. Paul.

PATHE

S. B. Sampson, manager, H. E. Pierce and G. W. Malone, in the Pathe exhibit were busy demonstrating the advantages of the Pathe program, telling of the new features to be forthcoming, and exploiting "Who's Guilty."

PARAMOUNT

One of the most artistic booths at the exposition was that of the Paramount company. The method of decoration was very simple but at the same time most effective. Pictures of Mary Pickford, Pauline Frederick and Marguerite Clark aided in the decorative scheme. Those in charge were B. Barnett and son and L. Eckstein, manager of the Milwaukee Paramount Exchange.

METRO

This booth had a large display of pictures of Metro stars, showing Bushman, Petrova, Barrymore and others. The representatives, A. Hixon, manager, John Kuhn, John May and E. H. Hoyt, were busy exploiting the Metro program, and especially "The Comeback."

MUTUAL

Manager W. H. Safford was in charge of the Mutual exhibit, assisted by Ire Mantzke, L. E. Davis, Theodore Quandall, William Cutter, F. J. Sherrick, H. Chapman, J. H. Ellinger, R. O. Johnson and Miss Persis Johnson. This display was varied and Charlie Chaplin, the serials "Secret of the Submarine" and "Girl in the Game," were the subjects of conversation.

TRIANGLE

The Triangle Corporation's booth was triangular in shape and elaborately decorated in bright colored triangles. Added attractions were the portraits of William S. Hart and Bessie Barriscale. Manager R. C. Bradford was in charge.

KLEINE-EDISON

All that could be talked about in this booth was Billie Burke and "Gloria's Romance," the $960,000 serial.

Another very interesting exhibit was that of the W. J. Dyer & Brother Company, of St. Paul, who were displaying a big Fotoplayer. This machine is a theater orchestra easily operated and bringing out marvelous effects. Those at the booth were G. J. Griebler, E. H. Clark, H. R. Kyle, Miss Arver, Mrs. Woods, Margarette Woods.

Meet Miss Vanity and Her Wardrobe

An honest-to-goodness fashion show which takes you into all the exclusive Fifth Avenue shops and shows you the creations of the most noted modiste will be shown on the screen in "Ventures of Vanity," produced by Fashion Film, Inc. The May release shows Miss Vanity just fresh from college and about to be presented to society at her debutante ball. All the gowns and wearing apparel which Miss Vanity selected from the elite shops for her first season in society will be shown. You can see just how the gown fits on a real person, not an artist's conception of the figure that should go with the gown, and judge how millinery blends with the personal appearance of the woman.

Miss Vanity has arranged with Mignonette, the foremost gown designer of America, to design new models and new fashions for her, and Fashion Films will be the first to present these to the public. In addition Miss Vanity will show the women how to shop so that when they return in the evening they will not feel tired and their nerves will be just as lively as when they went out. She will save many footsteps for she will suggest places where the patrons of the theater will get the best value without running from store to store to look at the different models.

Something new in exchange methods—The "New York Metro car." Manager C. A. Taylor of the Buffalo Metro office doesn't wait for trains. He invades all the big and small towns, via gasoline, and makes a careful study of their picture needs.

Actress After Fake Picture Schools

On the theory that a large majority of motion picture schools, although fraudulent, manage to keep within the letter of present laws, Beatriz Michelena, the California star, is endeavoring to have a law passed which will adequately eliminate these objectionable schools.

Miss Michelena has gone straight to Governor Hiram Johnson of California on this question and is trying to interest the leading legislators of the state in a bill which will be brought before the assembly and senate in their next session.

The plan which she herself devised in detail calls for the regulation of all schools of motion picture acting in the state by a commission appointative by the Governor and composed of recognized authorities in motion picture producing circles. Any school to operate must be sanctioned by a commission license, which may at any time be summarially revoked. The commission, after licensing a school will be expected to keep it under closest scrutiny.

Three of the outstanding considerations that should govern the deliberations of this commission, according to Miss Michelena, are whether or not a school offers adequate instruction, whether its promises of employment and salary to its pupils are within reason and whether or not it accepts pupils who are patently unqualified for film work and consequently can never hope to benefit from the instruction received. An offense in any one of these directions should mean immediate revocation of a license.

Miss Michelena is calling attention to the fact that these so-called schools operate mostly among the ignorant classes and take money from those who can ill afford to spend it, and they encourage people to leave sure employment to enter a field that is already crowded and offers almost unsurmountable difficulties to the average aspirant.

It is believed that this fight against the fake schools will not be only a state affair but will spread over the whole country.

A number of campaigns against disreputable schools of motion picture acting have been waged from various sources but Miss Michelena's methods give promise of real results.

EARLY ESTIMATES PLACE ATTENDANCE AT 7,000

EARLY estimates made by George M. Laing, chairman of the reception committee of the national exposition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, declare that approximately seven thousand motion picture showmen of the middle west and west will be in attendance at the convention and exposition to be held at the Coliseum in Chicago, July 12 to 18, inclusive.

Not only have the exhibitors of the great middle west and west signified their intention of being present, but large delegations from Brooklyn and Philadelphia have written regarding hotel reservations. The showmen of Brooklyn and Philadelphia are intent upon mixing business with pleasure and the baseball fans among them are busy getting parties together to accompany the Dodgers and Phillies who will meet the Cubs in Chicago during convention week.

The committee of the league which went to New York to attend the eastern shows has reported that the showmen and the film world of the east in general is enthusiastic over the Chicago show. The manufacturers acknowledge that they expect the Chicago show to outrank all eastern efforts, basing their belief on the fact that Chicago is the center of the film industry and is the natural hub of the country to which all showmen will flock.

William J. Sweeney, chairman of the convention committee and one of the committee which went to the New York shows, has wired that the manufacturers are begging for more space than is available in the Coliseum and that many of them will have to be restricted to less space than they desire. The other members of the committee which went east make similar reports. Other than Mr. Sweeney, the men who are causing the eastern enthusiasm are Louis H. Frank, Fred W. Hartmann and Fred Schaefer. They expect to be back at Chicago headquarters on Tuesday, May 16.

The contracts for space in the Chicago show were not mailed out until this week and before a contract had been mailed manufacturers had reserved 12,000 square feet of floor space notwithstanding that they could receive no assurance of what space they might receive. The committee as yet is somewhat at sea regarding the space allotment, which will be made according to the priority of agreement or by drawing lot. Many of the committee members seem to feel that the space renters should draw lots and take their chances on obtaining the most desirable space while some members believe that it should be a case of "first come first served."

There are approximately 31,000 feet of floor space on the main floor of the Coliseum and 14,000 feet in the balcony. The space is so arranged that practically every renter has an equal chance for displaying his goods.

The conditions, rules and regulations to govern the 1916 show are as follows:

DECORATIONS.—The price of exhibit space includes the use of such decorations and signs as will be provided for exhibitors by the management. These decorations and fixtures must not be taken from the building by the exhibitor at the end of the show. All sign work, etc., must be executed by the official decorator as determined by the management, and must conform to the uniform idea of color and size. Exhibitors must have copy for their signs, one line only, without descriptive matter, in the hands of the manager, on or before June 27, 1916. No extra signs of any description will be permitted to be placed in exhibit spaces, except by written consent of the management. All spaces will be provided with suitable floor covering.

RECEIPT OF EXHIBITS.—Exhibits will be received at the shipping entrance of the Coliseum, through a receiving clerk there on duty, any time after 9 a. m., Monday, July 10, 1916. All goods should be plainly marked, and all charges prepaid. The receiving clerk will have in charge a corps of men to assist exhibitors to place exhibits for their respective spaces. All exhibits must be in place and ready for the reception to be given to the press at 1 p. m., on Wednesday, July 12, 1916. The show will be officially opened to the public at 7 p. m. on the same day.

HOURS OF THE SHOW.—The show will open at 7 p. m., Wednesday, July 12, 1916, and continue on to 11 p. m. that day. From Thursday, July 13 to 18 inclusive, 1916, the doors will be open from 11 a. m. to 11 p. m. daily.

REMOVAL OF GOODS DURING THE SHOW.—No exhibit or portion thereof may be removed from the building during the show without the consent of the management thereto in writing. Removal of goods from the building must be made through the rear entrance. This rule does not apply to small articles which make up cash sales.

CHARACTER OF EXHIBITS.—The management will prohibit the installation of any exhibit not approved of by it. Distribution by the exhibitors of any printed matter, souvenirs or other articles shall be restricted to within the space occupied by their exhibits.

INSURANCE AND LIABILITY.—Insurance of any and all kinds, if desired by exhibitors, must be obtained at their own cost and expense. The Motion-Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Illinois Branch, Inc., and its agents, assume no risk, and by the acceptance of this agreement the exhibitor expressly releases said management and its agents, of and from any and all liability, for any damage, injury or loss to any person or goods from any cause whatsoever.

BUREAU OF INFORMATION.—Will open Monday, July 12, 1916, at 9 a. m., and will be located in the main lobby of the Coliseum. All mail will be received here and will be distributed to exhibitors as quickly as possible.

Smoking will positively be prohibited in any part of the building, except in the smoking-room.

GASOLINE, ETC.—No explosives, such as naphtha, gasoline, calcium carbide, kerosene or alcohol, will be allowed in the building without the written consent of the management.

TICKETS AND PASSES.—Exhibitors hereby agree to abide by such rules, regulations, plans and systems, in regard to passes and tickets, as are adopted by the management.

FURNITURE, ETC.—Desks, chairs, couches and tables must be furnished by the exhibitor, at his own expense.

EXHIBITOR'S REPRESENTATIVE.—During the show any business between the exhibitor and manager shall be conducted through one authorized agent, and through no other person. Each exhibitor in signing a contract must fill in the name of his representative in the blank space provided. No orders will be attended to for any exhibitor except on the written or personal request of said authorized representative.

ADMISSION.—Admission to the show for the public will be 50 cents. No person will be allowed to remain in the building after the closing hour.

REGARDING JOBBERS.—Every jobber, agent, retailer or any person other than a manufacturer to whom space is alloted must designate in the contract for space, a complete list of names and addresses of all manufacturers whose goods he will exhibit. No other goods will be permitted to be exhibited in said jobber's space.

Showmen in attendance at the Chicago convention and Motion Picture Industry exhibit to be held July 12 to 18, inclusive, may keep in close touch with home by having their mail and telegraph messages addressed in care of MOTOGRAPHY, Monadnock Block, Chicago. Every effort will be made by MOTOGRAPHY to make immediate delivery of mail and telegrams from its exhibit in the Coliseum.

Electric Power, Etc.—Any extra electric power or special lighting of exhibits shall be subject to the approval of the management, and if so approved, will be furnished by the management to the exhibitor free of charge.

All goods must be removed from Coliseum by the exhibitor not later than Wednesday midnight, July 19, 1916.

The Chicago show will follow the National Republican Convention into the Coliseum and by so doing will go into an already decorated auditorium. The show committee has made arrangements with the Republican National Committee to leave intact its magnificent decorations which will be added to and made more attractive by the show managers.

In order to take the show out of the ordinary rut of a merry-go-round of exhibits, the Chicago committee is making plans for many side lines. It purposes awarding a prize of $100 in cash and has made arrangements with one of the large producing companies for a long time contract for the most beautiful woman to enter the Exposition "Beauty Contest."

This award is to be made by photograph which will be submitted to a committee to pass upon. Announcement of the award will be made during the show. Entrants in this contest may send their photographs to Motography and they will be sent to the chairman of the "Beauty Contest." The name of the subject should be plainly written on the back of each photograph submitted and it should be clearly designated that the photograph is for entry in the "Beauty Contest."

Nor is the Chicago committee overlooking the strictly business end of the convention and show. It is planned to appoint a committee of recognized showmen-exhibitors who will be on hand continually for the purpose of answering all business questions and many of whom will deliver lectures on projection, advertising, method of selecting a program and many other subjects of vital interest to the showmen of the country.

The committee now is in communication with the railroads of the country, through the Chicago Board of Trade, seeking to obtain reduced railroad rates to and from Chicago for the convention visitors. The present plan is to have these cut rates applicable to members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America who will be given advantage of the lower rate upon presentation of their membership card.

Arrangements also are being made with some of the larger Chicago hotels for a cut rate on a reservation of three days or more.

Thanhouser Twinklers Shine Apart

Although it is impossible to tell which of the Fairbanks Twins is Marion and which is Madeline, as they exactly resemble each other in height, weight, color of hair, eyes, complexion and even mannerisms, nevertheless they wish to have individuality upon the motion picture screen and ask that their names be given separately and not simply be listed as "The Fairbanks Twins."

These young stars have now reached their fifteenth birthday and feel that they are now young ladies and should be shown consideration as such. They have, therefore, modestly requested that in forthcoming releases their names appear in the cast as Marion and Madeline Fairbanks.

Telling these two young twinklers apart has long been a matter of conjecture at the Thanhouser-Mutual studios. On one occasion during the staging of a feature Director Sullivan, perturbed in his inability to pick the right one, hit upon the happy idea of fastening a ribbon to their arms. Marion was assigned a blue one and Madeline a red one. Thereafter little difficulty has encountered as far as identification was concerned. The same scheme has been resorted to frequently in the staging of releases in which both young ladies appeared.

"The Answer," shortly to be released by Mutual, will be the first production in which the Fairbanks Twins will be listed separately in the cast.

Rialto Theater Entertains Actors

The Friars, a New York actors' club, attended a special Friars' night at the Rialto theater to honor the son of one of their number, Willie Collier, whose adopted boy, "Buster," made his screen debut as the star of "The Bugle Call." Director S. L. Rothapfel, who conducts Motography's "First Aid to Theater Men" department, arranged a surprise for the Friars by having a welcome flashed on the screen and also by having their song, "Here's to the Friars," sung by the Rialto quartette, accompanied by the orchestra.

An extensive program was presented, composed of an overture by the orchestra, the Rialto educational series, duet from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Rialto topical digest, song by William Cook, "The Bugle Call," presenting Willie ("Buster") Collier, Jr., excerpt from "The Fortune Teller," "Bucking Society," featuring Chester Conklin.

The Friars extended a vote of thanks for the fine program rendered, to the executive staff of the theater, composed of:

Musical Director, Hugo Riesenfeld; Personal assistant to Mr. Rothapfel, Alfred de Manby; Director of Publicity, Ben H. Atwell; Treasurer, Edwin Moscary; Manager, Chas. G. Stewart; Secretary to Mr. Rothapfel, Belle Louise Siegel; House Physician, Dr. O. C. Thum; Consulting Electrical Engineer, J. H. Hallberg; Chief Operator, Lester Bowen; Chief Electrician, George Larbig; 1st Assistant Electrician, William Fox; Master of Properties, Ira B. Scribner; Master of Effects, Joseph La Rose; Head Usher, Herman F. Innecken.

First Aid to Theater Men

IT WAS a live theater man with his fingers on the pulse of the public in general as well as the patrons of his house who sent in the clipping from the newspaper which I have discussed below. He is evidently always on the alert for anything which will help or harm his business, and is a good example of a broad-minded, all-around exhibitor.

His example leads me to offer a plea for a varied education on the part of the exhibitor. It is all well enough—and I will admit very necessary to your success—to concentrate on all subjects pertaining to the management of your theater and the choosing of programs to please your audience—but at the same time how much better able are you to choose interesting, live programs which will appeal to all classes of theatergoers if you are up-to-date on all topics of the hour. Let me urge you to read the newspapers not only for information on your own business, but also to have a general knowledge of what is happening in the world today. Read magazines so that you will know what topics are being discussed in science and art. You will find that you will conceive many ideas which are worth while for your own advertising, original ideas for your program, and everything around your theater will give the impression of an alive, up-to-the-minute management. The principal reason why one man makes a success of the motion picture business and another does not is that the former is always looking for new ideas, for more information on all subjects, and is training his mind along all lines.

27–I wonder if you saw the article by Dr. William De Kleine, head of the anti-tuberculosis movement in Michigan, which was published in the newspapers. It seems to me that this article will hurt moving picture theaters a great deal and I would like to have you express your opinion on it. Do you think what he says is true? I enclose a clipping which I wish you would publish so that all the exhibitors can see it.

Dr. De Kleine's article is on filmland vs. the automobile. The doctor has been paying a good deal of attention to the ventilating systems in the motion picture houses in the towns where the anti-tuberculosis surveys are held, and is comparing the relative benefits of the moving picture theater and the automobile, which he believes is its antithesis. Dr. De Kleine claims:

"While motion picture theaters are constantly improving, and while many are perfectly safe, there are still numerous film houses in which the patrons are starved for air and which are unsafe for persons of weak constitution.

"The automobile, on the other hand, does perhaps more than any other agency to get people out of doors, and because of that is a powerful ally of the public health worker in maintaining the health of the people. The automobile is one of the best doctors we have today; it is worth more than barrels of medicine.

"But to some extent the motion picture houses offset this benefit. Like the automobile, the film is the product of the present generation, something our fathers and grandfathers knew nothing of. It is a new element in present-day life, and has created new problems. And one of these problems has to do with public health. An amazing large proportion of the population spends one, two or three evenings a week in a crowded motion picture theater, some of them not by any means well ventilated—evenings that otherwise would be spent on the front porch or round the home fire. This evening confinement after a day's work in closed rooms, cannot help but have its effect on the health of the less robust, even where the film houses are at their best."

I am glad that this article was called to our attention, for it should serve as a warning to every motion theater manager—a warning which a great many managers still have not heeded—the proper ventilation of their theaters. Most towns and cities have an ordinance covering this question, but too many of the exhibitors are trying to dodge it, and do only as much as they are forced to do by the inspectors. The result is an attack like this, which hurts all motion picture houses, which is another example of the innocent suffering with the guilty. Although Dr. De Kleine's arguments are not all logical, there is truth in them, enough truth to influence a great many motion theater patrons. If it affects them to an extent that will lead them to force the manager of the theater they attend to give the best ventilation possible, then the article has done us more good than harm, but if it simply causes the general public to condemn all theaters because of the few poorly ventilated ones, then it is to be deplored.

On the other hand, the doctor did not go far enough into his subject to study the conditions of the general percentage of people attending the motion picture theaters. In the first place, how large a percent of the people making up the audience of a picture house possess automobiles? This is especially true of the houses charging five and ten cents admission—the houses which are catering to the poorer and middle class. Perhaps these people would be better off in automobiles, if they had them—the difficulty is they haven't them, nor are they liable to have them for some time to come. It would have been more logical if Dr. De Kleine had compared the benefits or menace of the motion picture theater with the benefits or menace of street car rides, for these two amusements are more on a parallel basis when the pocket books of most of the patrons of motion pictures are to be considered. How does he think the ventilation of the modern street car and the modern picture theater compares? What does he think of the comparative liability of contracting contagious diseases in these two?

The article says the worker after a day's work might better be sitting around his home fire than going to see the pictures, because "this evening confinement after a day's work in closed rooms cannot help but have its effect on the health." Without casting any slurs on the modern housekeeper, I wonder in how many homes the air is any purer and better and the ventilating system more closely watched than at the picture theaters. Also is the confinement any "closer" in the theaters than in the home? It seems to me the evening at the theater is less confining, because the worker at least has to get the fresh air in his walk to and from the theater.

We are free to admit that it might be more healthful to spend an evening on the front porch in the open air in summer than inside a picture house, as Dr. De Kleine advocates, but the difficulty is that the front porch offers no entertainment. After a hard day's work a man wants something to take his mind off his worries and the petty irritations of the day which, if thought over, may grow into real grievances. And this entertainment is offered by the pictures in a normal, healthy, moral and economical way.

This might also bring up the question as to whether an evening devoted to automobile riding is always normal, healthy, moral and economical. Too many people are not contented simply to take a ride in the air, but they also want entertainment, and so stop at the different summer gardens where a cabaret show is offered and drinks sold. Is not an evening spent in this way more detrimental to the health than one spent in a picture theater?

Perhaps my ideas on this subject are biased too much by my viewpoint as a theater manager, but to counteract this I believe Dr. De Kleine has not gone into this subject thoroughly enough to give it an all-around fair treatment, and his arguments also appear to be rather one-sided.

Personally, I think it would be very interesting to hear what a number of the exhibitors think about this article, whether they agree with the statements made, and I will be glad to open these columns to any one who cares to express an opinion. This does not mean only exhibitors, either, but any one who would like to tell what they think in the matter.

28–I will be ready to open my new theater in about two weeks and would like to institute some system whereby the tickets sold could be used to check up on the number of people attending each performance and also the number of paid admissions. Can you help me out?

Regular motion picture tickets which are supplied in rolls may be obtained from the film exchange at a reasonable price. The cashier tears off a ticket for each patron, and this is collected by the ticket-taker in the theater. The tickets are a check on the paid admissions, and if carefully used will prevent many leaks in the financial end of the show.

The number of tickets in the ticket-taker's possession represents the amount of money received by the cashier, and should therefore be equal to the number of the end ticket on the roll before the show, subtracted from the number on the end ticket after the show.

There are devices now on the market that in a way resemble a cash register, that afford an absolute check on the number of tickets sold. These are metallic boxes containing one roll of tickets that can only be unlocked by the manager's key. The ticket is issued to the patron by pressing a lever that cuts off the ticket and at the same time registers the transaction on a counting mechanism on the inside of the machine.

If the color of the ticket is changed from day to day, it is almost impossible for any one to enter without paying, or by discarded tickets from the day before. To prevent the tickets from being used a second time a "ticket chopper" may be used that mutilates the ticket in such a way that it is impossible to present it without detection. As these machines are quite expensive, their use is usually confined to the larger shows. In any case, the manager should burn the tickets taken from the ticket box at the end of the day's performance to prevent a second admission on one ticket. As a further check on the ticket system, the manager should occasionally count the house during one or more performances and compare the results with the ticket numbers in the ticket-taker's box.

Frederick Warde of Thanhouser

Since the release of "Silas Marner" on the Mutual program, the star of the production has been the subject of an avalanche of correspondence between New Rochelle and fandom. So successful is the eminent tragedian's film debut, that Edwin Thanhouser got Frederick Warde's signature to a long-term contract. The contract means that Mr. Warde will be seen in eight great classic productions every year, and it is expected that his plays will be selected for screen adaptation from the great and famous repertoire of material in which he has been seen. For the past later years Mr. Warde has been touring the country in Shakespearean recitals and lectures; he is an authority on Shakespeare.

Yielding to the combined efforts of his son Ernest, and Mr. Thanhouser, Mr. Warde first consented to appear on the screen a few months ago. He then had the unique experience of working under the direction of his son, who as a director is also one of Mr. Thanhouser's acquisitions from the legitimate. Warde, pere, took his alphabet lessons from sonny, and that the school was thorough is proven by the excellent standard attained by "Silas Marner." Mr. Warde now feels more familiar with screen business, and it is planned that his son continue to direct him.

Frederick Warde will be featured in what will be known as Thanhouser Classics. These will be in not less than five reels each, and will feature stars of the first Thanhouser magnitude. He will take his place, then, with Florence La Badie, and Mr. Thanhouser will later announce more stars on whose work in classics the publicity campaign of the "wizard of New Rochelle" will be focused.

The Man Who Butts Into the Game

AN Exhibitor and the officer of an exhibitors' association, a man whose name is known throughout the trade, says this to us in a letter about some other matters:

"The game is not what it used to be. In fact, I have got to the point where I think this is not a real business, but more like a poker game. Here I am with $50,000 invested in a beautiful building and beautiful theater, and when I built it four years ago it was supposed to take care of the business of three shows. A cement contractor, who knows nothing about the business, goes me one better and builds an equally beautiful house, and now the business is so cut up that neither he nor I can make a dollar. Can you imagine any other business that can be cut up as quickly as this business? Can you imagine any other business where you lose your clientele over night? There must be some regulation, and it must come from the exhibitor. The business has no stability at all. It has no future. In short, the film manufacturer and the exhibitor are both the rottenest bookkeepers in the world. I can prove it."

Since it contains some question marks, we might have handed this letter to Mr. Rothapfel for an answer, and so sidestepped the obligation. But we know the question marks are really exclamation points. The exhibitor did not expect and maybe did not wish them to be answered.

Yet there is bound to be an answer. Of course in this case the cement contractor would not have built his house if he knew he could not make a dollar out of it—for that was his purpose in building it. He should have advised with the local association before rushing in where experts feared to tread. But probably he did not even know there was an association. Very likely he mentioned his project to nobody until he had engaged his architect and taken his building permit. Yet, on the contrary, it is entirely possible that he asked some exchange about it and was advised to go ahead and become another customer. All of these conditions are wrong, but it is hard to get at a man who knows nothing about the business and just butts into it. And such a man can do a lot of damage to established houses without gaining anything himself thereby.

You cannot keep any man from going into any business he desires if he has the price. Fifty men can put up fifty theaters at fifty thousand dollars apiece in a town of ten thousand if they are foolish enough and have the money.

Theoretically this condition is just as true of the grocery or jewelry or sporting goods or any other business as it is of the motion picture theater business. Practically, though, people seem to exercise more moderation and more conservatism in entering other lines. They never dream of rushing into a business of which they know nothing—especially if they have to invest a lot of money. Yet in the motion picture business they do exactly that. The bars are down. Anybody can run a picture theater, apparently.

As our correspondent says, the regulation must come from the exhibitor. Even when the manufacturer and distributor are willing to protect a customer in a certain territory, his new and eager competitor can always get service from a rival house.

It is all very well to tell a man to give the best he can, and quit worrying about his competition. But everybody knows that even a green competitor, with the aid and advice of a competing exchange, can work a lot of havoc in a place where there really isn't room for him, and where he would never have entered had he known his business.

This regulation is exhibitors' work, and that means work for the exhibitors' association and its branches.

It is an important function of the organization, and yet one that apparently has never been seriously pursued. Every local of the league could very well maintain a committee for advising with prospective exhibitors, and helping them select locations that would be most profitable to them and create the least disturbance in established exhibiting circles.

Most of these new exhibitors would listen to reason, especially if they were warned of the probable financial loss which would result from locating a new house in a saturated neighborhood. In a majority of cases, if not in all, the new man could be made a member of the association at once, and would be grateful for the assistance that saved him money.

This sort of thing may not be necessary in other kinds of business, but it seems to be in this. We are confident that the present league, if it will undertake the work in a systematic and comprehensive way, can do a great deal to ease the troubles of the experienced and established exhibitor who finds himself greatly embarrassed by the attacks of raw novices with more money than sense. And incidentally the league would gain a good many new members by virtue of its valuable service.

A Safety Valve in the Censor Bill

THE Federal Censorship Bill as reported to the House by its committee shows no amendments to the original bill that call for extended comment. Section 13 is new, however, and important. It provides for permits for showing to adults only, in the frequent case of films manifestly unsuited to immature audiences, yet entirely proper for grown-up observers.

This provision, if the bill passes and gets the President's signature, may prove even more important than it seems at first. It may act as a safety valve for the pent-up energies of a censoring body whose opportunities for censorship are bound to grow less and less as time goes on.

It is obvious that a censor is bound to do something positive to earn his money and feel that he is accomplishing. To approve a film is merely negative; the approver does nothing.

The only positive action a censor can take is to order a cut-out or kill a film entirely. No matter how kindly or good humored or easy going he may be, he is practically forced by the nature of his job to kill something, at least occasionally. Otherwise why have him there at all?

Anybody can approve a film, without even looking at it; but to cut it shows the censor is on the job. Obviously, the censor must censor whether his heart is in it or not. He must earn a living and have something on his report.

Now here, in Section 13, is a happy way out. The censor has before him a film of real life; none of your Sunday school productions, but an honest portrayal of human beings in action. It is all right; he could O. K. it just as well as not. But he reflects that he has not killed a film for a week, and pretty soon somebody will be asking uncomplimentary questions, and intimating that he has some motive for protecting the vicious and predatory producer. He must protect his reputation as a censor. Eureka! Section 13. He scowls at the film and issues a Special Permit, for adults only, children under sixteen barred. He has vindicated himself. The censor is on the job. Everybody is happy.

So we figure this section of the Pink Slip, as the Chicago police board would call it, may save a lot of perfectly innocent films from utter annihilation by giving the hardworking and harassed censor a way out. It lets him show work done and positive action and high efficiency without the necessity of destroying a thousand or ten thousand dollars' worth of property and labor to do it.

Really, we think Section 13 may prove to be quite useful—if the bill passes, which is not yet assured by any means.

V. L. S. E. Increases Efficiency

NEW PLANS FOR DEALING WITH EXHIBITORS

EVER on the alert for something new, and always looking for better ways of handling the old, the V. L. S. E. is constantly adding to its efficiency.

A meeting attended by the executives of the various departments and members of the sales forces of the New York and Syracuse exchanges and presided over by the general manager, Walter W, Irwin, was recently held at the office of the organization for the discussion of the trade conditions in general and the outlining in detail of timely suggestions looking toward increased efficiency in dealings with the Big Four exhibitors.

The reports of the representatives furnished conclusive evidence that the open booking system and the box office value method of renting features are daily increasing in favor with exhibitors.

It was brought out in the discussions that as there occurred the evolution from the nickelodeon, showing short reel subjects, to the more representative theaters, showing five-reel features; so the trend is today toward increased artistic beauty and dramatic strength and toward multiple features elaborately presented.

It was pointed out there must of course be the same adjustment in rental and admission prices for these pictures as there was in the rental and admission prices of the five-reel features as compared with the scale of charges which prevailed for the old time subjects. In this way will the standard of the screen be raised and the producer and exhibitor mutually benefitted. This is proved by the pictures, rented according to the V. L. S. E. policy at a price commensurate with the investment which they represent and presented in a way which adds to their appeal, are establishing records of remarkable business throughout the country.

Another innovation of the Big Four is the publication of a book entitled "Who's Who in the V. L. S. E. Plays." This is a forty-eight page book with a two color cover and duotone illustrations. It contains pictures of all the Big Four players with interesting facts concerning them. Many previously unpublished details in the lives of these players are divulged in this book for the first time. It also contains a complete list of this company's releases since its inception, with a brief description of each one. Besides being a book of interest and information it has been designed to be of especial service to exhibitors as a reference guide and an aid in compiling press notices and other publicity suitable for newspaper or program use, the biographies being written from a human interest angle to appeal to the editor and public alike.

In line with its unvarying policy of promotion from the ranks, the V. L. S. E. has appointed R. B. Simonson, assistant to A. C. Wyckoff, the auditor of that organization, to the position of traveling auditor. This promotion was made necessary because of the increasing volume of business at the various exchanges which was proving too great a strain on the present staff. Mr. Simonson has been acting as assistant to Mr. Wyckoff since the formation of the Big Four.

Orchestra Hall, Chicago, Ill., has been transformed into a motion picture theater and has chosen Big Four productions for its program. The "cinema concerts" given in this house will be made up of V. L. S. E. photoplays, selections by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Dunbar, and solos by distinguished singers. The picture chosen for the opening was Vitagraph's "The Law Decides," starring Dorothy Kelly. This will be followed by "Salvation Joan," with Edna May, which in turn will give place to William Gilette in Essanay's film production of "Sherlock Holmes."

S. E. Abel, Chicago manager of the V. L. S. E., has carried out the policy of the company of establishing friendly relations between the exchange and the exhibitor and showing the latter more than ordinary attention in the line of everyday work, by installing a system of telephone inquiries regarding service received. He instructed his telephone operator to make a list each day of all the motion picture theaters in the city in which the company's releases had been shown on the previous day.

Every theater then is called up by telephone and inquiries made as to the success attained with the picture, whether the delivery and exchange have been satisfactory, and if there are any complaints to be made regarding any matters. The replies to these inquiries have proved valuable not only to the exchange but to the exhibitor, as trivial annoyances, easily corrected, but which under ordinary circumstances the exhibitor would not have gone to the trouble of reporting to the exchange, although mentally charging the service up with a deficiency, are in this way easily remedied.

A heated debate on censorship of films in general, and in the state of Pennsylvania in particular, was carried on at the meeting of the Drama League of Philadelphia, attended by the leading lights of the theatrical, motion picture and literary worlds. Walter W. Irwin, the general manager of the V. L. S. E., led the attack on censorship with the following remark: "The Pennsylvania censors of motion pictures are competing with the Ohio censors for a crown of asses' ears." In the discussion the points were brought out that the Pennsylvania censors are condemning perfectly harmless films and are attempting to cut out all parts with a "punch." The debaters claimed that it is not possible to accentuate good without contrasting it with evil. They claimed the American public never has gone wrong on moral issues, and it is not believed it will go wrong if allowed to use its judgment in the censorship of motion pictures. The freedom of the press and the freedom of the films was compared. "The analogy between the printed page and the motion picture as mediums of expression is perfect in every detail. If our forefathers through it wise to write the freedom of the press into the organic law of the state, why should we hesitate to allow the same franchise and liberties to the motion picture? The spirit of fanaticism knows no bounds in its ambition, and that spirit is rampant today in the ranks of the censor brigade."

Dr. Crenstone Brenton of the National Board of Review, presented voluntary censorship as embodied in that organization as a fair method. "The voluntary censor," said Doctor Brenton, "has no political axe to grind. If it becomes necessary to censor all pictures down to what may be seen by children only, we will have an insipid screen of no possible value."

It was stated by other film representatives that the moral pictures brought the largest financial returns. They denied the accusation that boys went to prison because of the influence of motion pictures. Investigation of numerous cases where the law had been broken by juveniles, failed to reveal one authentic case where the downfall could be traced to motion pictures.

PARAMOUNT'S NEW PLASTIQUES

Ashley Miller Creates Film Novelty for Pictographs—Other Interesting Announcements of the "Magazine of the Screen"

The table of contents of Paramount Pictographs for the week of May 21, shows under "Better Babies," correct methods of breathing, sitting, standing and walking to be used in the training of children. "The Making of a Cop," depicts how the well trained blue-coats are fitted to become guardians of the law. "The Aerial Pocket Camera," is a continuation of the "Preparedness" series, "Arms or Surrender." "The House That Jack Built" illustrates how a railroad instills the principles of "safety first" in its employes and shows the Grand Central car equipped with a motion picture machine which is sent all over the country to instruct its employes.

"Colonel Heeza Liar Captures Villa," is the title of the twenty-first release of the Paramount-Bray animated cartoons. In this picture Colonel Heeza Liar becomes dissatisfied with the attitude shown toward "Preparedness" throughout the United States, and starting out to clear up the situation, interviews first Colonel Roosevelt and then William Jennings Bryan.

In the sixteenth release of the Paramount-Burton Holmes Travel Pictures we are taken on a trip through the islands of the Philippine Archipelago to visit Cebu, Uloila and Zamboangu. The journey is made in the coast guard cutter "Scout," with Uncle Sam as host.

A novelty for the screen has been created by Ashley Miller in "Plastiques." This feature bears the same relation to the cartoon that sculpture does to pen and ink drawing. Carved on a background in high relief his figures and scenes produce effects that are beautiful, fascinating or comic. For nearly a year Mr. Miller and C. H. Ranson, the comedy director, have been working to perfect this novelty for the motion picture public.

"Miss Nanny Goat Goes on a Rampage," the animated cartoon for the Paramount-Bray release which was to have been issued May 11, was not shown until May 18 because of a static, the camera-man's hoodoo. The entire release of the cartoon, which was the work of Clarence Rigby, was ruined. "The Police Dog in the Park," by C. T. Anderson, was transferred to May 11.

Reserve Photoplays Company Formed

Those popular stars of the comedy world, Johnny and Emma Ray, have entered the field of motion pictures.

These exponents of rip-roaring comedy have been continually importuned with offers from motion picture concerns. Had it been a matter of money they would have capitulated long ago. But as popular comedy stars, the Rays acquired sufficient fortune to well afford to hold off until they had made an investigation of this wonderful new industry from every viewpoint. This they did with the result that together with a few friends they have launched, in their home city of Johnny and Emma Ray—Reserve.

Cleveland, the Reserve Photoplays Company, to be devoted solely to exploiting the same effervescent and infectious brand of humor on the screen as that for which they have been nationally known on the "legitimate" stage.

Nature has been singularly kind to those fertile fun makers, the Rays. Gifted with a natural fund of humor, a keen wit, a faculty for creating side-splitting situations and a remarkable facility of facial expression together with distinct and rare mannerisms, they have for many years been in a class by themselves.

The new organization which they have formed—the Reserve Photoplays Company,—has completed a studio in Cleveland, and has already begun turning out the Ray comedies. Its officers are: President, Robert H. McLaughlin, author of the "Eternal Magdalene" and one thoroughly versed in stage requirements; vice-president, Johnny Ray; treasurer, Samuel Doerfler, assistant prosecuting attorney of Cleveland, and Lang Cobb, Jr., manager sales and publicity.

Every member of the executive staff has been chosen by Mr. Ray with an eye single to his fitness in his position. That the Ray comedies are to be comedies de luxe is evidenced by the further fact that all developing and printing will be done in the new million dollar plant of the Paragon Film Corporation.

At the eastern offices of the company in the Columbia Theater building, New York City, it is reported that the bare announcement of the Rays have entered the world of filmdom, has been prolific in requests for early Reserve Photoplay releases.

With Lang Cobb, Jr., at the helm, it is a foregone conclusion that this company will be a permanent success.

When "The Dumb Girl of Portici," the elaborate Universal feature, was given its premiere in the Globe theater in New York Mme. Anna Pavlowa, the celebrated Russian dancer who stars in the play, was dancing with the Ballet Russe in Salt Lake City. She had a special telephone wire connected up between her hotel in the Mormon City and the Globe stage in New York so she could learn of the metropolitan reception of her debut in the films.

What Theater Men Are Doing

AN OPEN FORUM

Kill the "Nickelette" Idea

By John Meily

Treasurer, Penn Counties Amusement Company, Allentown, Pa.

IT has never been the policy of our managements to bring entertainment offerings down to popular taste. It has rather been our object to bring up popular taste to the point where it appreciated our offerings. The method we have used and are now using can be summed up in one word—advertising. We believe that any kind of advertisement which will bring into our house people who have not previously attended moving pictures, is good publicity and most of our advertising is done with this one end in mind.

We believe in moving pictures. We think that they are destined to become the greatest educational factor of the future; we know intelligently chosen picture programs make for culture; we know that moving pictures have done more toward solving the drink evil than all prohibition propaganda; moving pictures are doing for the masses what the spoken drama has done for the classes—throwing light upon all phases of economic and social problems and while doing all this they satisfy, in a wholesome manner, the craving for entertainment that exists in every community.

By advertising we are trying to make every possible patron of our theaters think of moving pictures as we think of them—feel and appreciate them as we do. We are striving hard to kill the idea that moving pictures are a cheap amusement—the "nickelette" idea. We are preaching, and we hope teaching, that moving pictures are Picture-Plays, Silent Drama, fully worthy of the same appreciation as the spoken drama. In this we think we are succeeding—our houses are making money and our patronage is growing.

Look! Here's One Not Running for Profit

By J. W. Brighton,

Director, Morenci Club, Morenci, Arizona.

Our picture theater is not run as a money-making proposition but as a source of pleasure and amusement for the employees of the Morenci mining camp. Whatever profit we make is spent in providing better pictures.

Part of our success is due to constant advertising by a mailing list. I mail 1,000 programs a week, addressed to "Boxholder No. So and So," at the post office.

I use the list furnished me by the postmaster. I don't know the occupant of the P. O. box, but the number answers the purpose and I know that all the programs reach someone and there is no duplicating. I also give the general delivery clerks all the surplus programs in blank one-cent envelopes and as a person asks for mail he hands out a program.

This plan works better, of course, in a small place of about 6,000 than it would in a larger town, but it brings good results here. We show pictures that the whole family can see and when they all come it is not hard to make a success of the picture business. It lies with the exhibitor as to whether he will keep up with the procession or let the other fellow walk away with the trade.

Used to Run 'em Through Backward

By Jack F. Truitt,

Grand Amusement and Advertising Co., Sedalia, Mo.

We continually and carefully study people's exact wants. Details around our theaters receive the most of our attention. Our music is a feature of each performance and our prices are always the same. Our shows begin at the same time always. We are close buyers of the best productions but do not use inferior productions at any price. The words, "Thank you," are the only premiums we give away; we have lots of them around here, from the front of the house to the back, and they keep the people coming to our theater.

The writer has been in the show business for the last fifteen years. I remember when I ran about five hundred feet of films of fast moving trains, etc., then ran them through the machine backwards as the comedy end of the program.

Gaining the confidence of patrons by advertising only facts, and not "cheating" our patrons in any way is largely responsible for our success. When a patron sees a production here I am practically sure that he can not see it elsewhere with better advantages. We do not stay in a rut but keep up, or try to keep up, to the rapid strides of the motion picture industry as a whole.

The Value of Simplicity in Decoration

J. E. Calvin, manager of the Calvin Theater, Washington, Mo., has chosen a simple and pleasing style of architecture for the front of his theater, as the illustration shows. He is one of the few who realize that as the great Ruskin said: Simplicity is sublimity." Patrons tire of seeing an over-ornamented theater, even though it may seem attractive at first glance. This house has a very dignified appearance and at the same time the white front makes it noticeable and attractive. It is a pleasant relief after the overdone ornamentation which is used by some theater owners. Simplicity and good taste have a decided value because they make it easier to reach the better class of people who can afford to pay a good scale of prices.

Calvin Theater, Washington, Missouri.

Mr. Calvin made an investment of $28,000 in his house, which seats 800. He runs two shows a day and changes his program daily.

New Wisconsin Theater

Work has just been begun on the New Palace Theater, of Antigo, Wisconsin, which will represent an investment of $40,000. H. E. Hanson will manage the new house.

Plans for the New Palace were drawn by H. T. Liebert of Wausau and embody the newest and best ideas in motion picture theater construction. Manager Hanson made numerous trips to cities in this and other states to obtain suggestions which could be embodied to advantage. In accordance with the state laws the plans were sent to Madison for the inspection of the Wisconsin Industrial Commission and received its approval. The state building code is now very rigid, especially as it applies to theaters.

The front of the theater will be entirely doors, which will open automatically from the control inside the house. The front of the building will be of terra cotta and ornamental brick and a large canopy will overhang the sidewalk.

There will be one balcony and box seats on either side. Seats will be roomy and the space between them will be exceptionally liberal. There will be a "garage" for baby carriages. Heating and ventilation will be by a forced hot air system and two furnaces will be used, one at each end of the building. Provision will be made for the installation of a pipe organ at some future time.

The seating capacity of the new theater will be 1,200 people.

Brings Success Out of Failure

By Francis Frosio,
Manager, Sonora Happy Hour, Sonora, Texas.

I have been engaged in the motion picture business about eleven years in New York City, as manager in most places and pianist in others.

I came to Western Texas about a year ago, and found the theater in the town of Sonora, Sutton county, in very bad shape and not paying expenses. After a few days' observation I readily saw what I thought was the trouble and had an interview with the manager. His opinion of the reason for the bad business was as follows:

> You see this town has only about one thousand population. There are four or five factions and most of them believe our pictures have a bad effect on children. Then remember this town is seventy-four miles from a railroad and that means no transient trade to draw from, and when you consider all these things you will clearly see that a man is foolish to start a show in such a place as this.

After listening to the above tale of woe I said that I thought I could point out his mistakes and not refer to anything he had told me; and proceeded:

> I am not acquainted with conditions governing the Sonora business in Texas, but it appears to me that this town ought to support a properly managed theater. To begin with, you have the poorest films on the market, and while they seem cheap to you they are the most expensive because nobody will pay out good money to sit and look at such junk so your efforts are worthless and your money wasted.

He said he had as good a show as he was able to secure and would not pay the prices the exchanges asked for better material because he knew he could not get a better attendance with better films.

Being unable to convince him that junk would not draw flies or anything else I set to work to try to get the place, as I was confident I could make it pay, but I did not have much capital. Finally he said he would rent the building and all equipment for a reasonable sum and lease it for a term of five years, and I immediately seized the opportunity of getting what I called as good a theater business as could be found anywhere in a town twice the size of this.

I closed the place for a week and negotiated with the leading film exchanges in Dallas, secured a good program and let the people know that at this theater they could see some of the latest subjects, made every day, and made it my business to do as I advertised. Occasionally I would get some old films which I thought would not exactly suit my patrons, and when I did I would throw them aside and refuse to pay for them, as my contract called for first class films, and I demanded them. It was not long before the exchange manager wrote me that he heartily approved of my action in the matter and my troubles were at an end as far as the class of service was concerned. The exchanges keep me posted on everything that comes out because they know I want only the best, and they fully realize that the old junk in the exchange is no drawing card to them or anybody else. It doesn't pay to try and hand the twentieth century public discarded goods in any line and think you can get by with it, because they are bound to revolt.

After two weeks of proper management I had a full house daily and strived to better my show each week, and chose for my slogan, "No film is too good for the Sonora public," and backed this by securing the best that is made. Of course I have a monopoly on the show business here, and the man before me has had it proved to his satisfaction that it was simply a question of quality that got the people interested in the show.

A big canning factory near Cordoba, Alaska, has been leased by the Lubin Company as one of the advance steps in the plans to put Rex Beach's novel, "The Silver Horde," into a multiple reel photoplay feature that will set a new record in every detail of screen production. "The Silver Horde" deals with the struggles of an independent operator against the efforts of the salmon canning trust to wipe him out.

Circus Parade Advertises Film

INTERNATIONAL COLLECTS ANTI-CENSORSHIP VOTES AT EXPOSITION

WORKING on the theory that nothing is quite so fascinating to the public—both young and old—as a circus parade, the Boston American adopted this method of advertising "The Mysteries of Myra" series, produced by the International Film Service.

The Boston American is one of the chain of Hearst newspapers, and this is only the first of a series of newspaper campaigns which will be waged in introducing this series. With Hearst behind the newspapers, and Hearst behind the International, this advertising propaganda will no doubt be very successful.

Certain it is that the big parade of delivery wagons and trucks tightly covered and displaying weird posters showing the head of a wild looking creature looking through a crystal, others suggesting black magic, sorcery, devil worshippers, etc., caused a good deal of excitement as it went through the streets of Boston.

Nothing caused more interest at the booth of the International Film Service at the Grand Central Palace than the gigantic ballot box for the receipt of votes against the Christman-Wheeler censorship bill.

This bill killing idea has done more to establish the feeling of good fellowship and bring the different manufacturers and exhibitors together than any other motion picture propaganda started in a long time. Competitive manufacturers stepped into the International booth, shook hands, congratulated the promoters upon the idea, and cast their ballots to protest against the common enemy. The widespread interest in this movement was shown in the fact that people of all nationalities and color, all ages, women and children, came to drop their ballot against the bill. Probably the oldest voter was Mother Maurice of the Vitagraph Company, and the youngest was Charles Giegrich of Brooklyn, aged four. Another young voter was Bobbie Connoly, the young motion picture star.

Every known star from every company came to add their vote to the thousands cast. Among those noticed were Howard Estabrook, Jean Sothern, Virginia Pearson, Sheldon Lewis, Grace Darling, Creighton Hale, Mother Maurice, Kate Price, Alice Brady, Bart Hanley and Mary Anderson.

Among the exhibitors who cast their ballots against censorship were Sam Trigger, Lee Ochs, S. L. Rothapfel, B. F. Ralph and others.

Frank Nagel, marine on the battleship Arkansas, address Brooklyn Navy Yard, also came to cast a vote on behalf of the ship's entire company.

Besides this anti-censorship campaign waged at the exposition members of the International company called at the principal clubs of New York and left ten thousand ballots of protest to be signed by the club members. The addition of these ballots it is estimated will bring the sum total up to something like one hundred sixty thousand.

On the closing night of the show all these votes were stuffed into a big piano box. The huge Garford truck containing the piano box of votes left the Grand Central Palace, and halted at the principal picture theaters in towns enroute to Albany. These theaters had been polling votes which were added to the thousands in the box. This avalanche of votes cannot help but influence Governor Whitman in his action on the bill.

Lawrence S. Bologino, owner and manager of nine New York picture theaters, called at the International booth and naturally signed his protest against the censorship bill with much gusto and flourish. Mr. Bologino is building two more theaters, which will be among the handsomest in New York, and consequently is very much interested in the bill. He voiced his opinion that the bill could not possibly go over, and said he was doing all in his power to defeat the measure.

J. K. Burger, in charge of the Hearst exchange, recently returned from Philadelphia with bookings of $8,000 for "The Mysteries of Myra." Mr. Burger entertained the executives and employes of the International Film Service at a special luncheon while in Philadelphia.

Fashion Films to Be Produced

A new corporation has been formed to be known as Fashion Films, Inc. The officers of this company are Edward F. Wheaton, president and treasurer; Jno. J. Mitchell, publisher of style publications, vice president; Maurice M. Berger, managing partner of the firm of "Mignonette" fashion designers, secretary; and B. F. Porter and G. Walter Lindsey, directors. George Le Soir will have chairge of the production of the fashion films, Clarence Schottenfels is in charge of service to theaters, and Myles F. Laskar is the advertising manager.

The company will release weekly a thousand foot feature portraying the latest styles in women's wear to be shown in an attractive narrative called "The Ventures of Vanity." In addition it will produce commercial films and furnish a Portoscope service to manufacturers for use of traveling salesmen and demonstrators.

Cinema Camera Club Moves

The Cinema Camera Club of New York City, an organization of the leading camera men of the country, has again moved its quarters in order to accommodate its steadily growing membership. The club has removed from the White Rats building to the Times building.

A recent innovation of the Cinema Camera Club is the establishment of a bureau to furnish to applicants camera men of the highest standing on short notice. "Manufacturers desiring men will make no mistake in getting in touch with the C. C. C.," says Phil. Rosen, the president of the club. "It's our intention to make the C. C. C. emblem stand for the highest and most efficient type of men in the business."

The membership, at a recent meeting of the club, voted unanimously to raise the initiation fee to $25.

Becomes Actor to Aid Defectives

Dr. H. J. Haiselden, the physician who leaped into notoriety by refusing to perform an operation to save the life of Baby Bollinger, has signed a contract by which he will receive $25,000 to appear in a five-reel motion picture and fill a large number of lecture engagements. Dr. Haiselden is planning to use this money toward building a hospital for defective children.

Vitagraph Annexes McDermott

Marc McDermott, who is well known to movie fans the country over for his work in Edison photoplays, has severed his connections with that company and in the future will be seen in pictures bearing the trade mark of the Vitagraph company.

Marc McDermott, Vitagraph.

Mr. McDermott was one of the first actors of the legitimate stage to enter the motion picture field, which was over seven years ago. He was born in Knights Bridge, London, England, but spent most of his early life in Australia, where he was taken at the age of four years. His father, Patrick McDermott, was born in Ireland, and is a descendant of the McDermott who was King of Munster. His mother, before her marriage, was Annie Massey, granddaughter of Sir James Masse of Limerick. McDermott received his education at the Jesuit College in Sydney, Australia.

He made his first appearance on the stage at Sydney, with George Rignold, of "Henry V" fame. After remaining with Rignold's company for seven years he joined Mrs. Patrick Campbell, and was her leading man for the five years that followed, two of which were spent in the United States and three touring England. Later, while in England, he appeared with Marie Dainton at Wyndham's theater, London. Returning to the United States, he joined Richard Mansfield's company.

About this time Mr. McDermott became interested in motion pictures and at the instigation of a friend visited the Edison studio, where he was induced to sign a contract. He has appeared in practically all of that company's successes produced during the past seven years. McDermott was the featured member in "The Passer By," the first multitple reel release produced by the big "E."

Arrangements are being made at the Vitagraph plant in Flatbush for the first McDermott picture. To date the title is not known, but we are told it will be a five-part Vitagraph Blue Ribbon feature, and that he will be supported by an all-star cast of Vitagraphers. When completed it will be released through the V. L. S. E.

Norma Talmadge watching co-producers, C. M. and S. A. Franklin "stage" a scene in "Going Straight," her new Fine Arts play.

Pauline Frederick in White Hair

Pauline Frederick has a splendid opportunity to display her versatility and make use of her many talents in one play in the Famous Players' adaptation of Israel Zangwill's "The Moment Before," in which she is starring. In the first part of this photoplay Miss Frederick appears as a white-haired woman of fifty-five, then afterward in a vision of her youth she enacts the part of a splendid young creature, the gypsy for whom men are found in desperate combat.

Peggy Hyland, the noted British star, will be introduced to the American public through "Saints and Sinners," the celebrated drama by Henry Arthur Jones. Miss Hyland will make her initial appearance in American photoplay theaters on the Paramount program in May.

Sidney Olcott, who has been in Bermuda for some time acquiring the local coloring and atmosphere for the forthcoming Famous Players' production, "The Innocent Lie," is very enthusiastic about the islands. Mr. Olcott says the trip is well worth taking and he found the islands extremely picturesque and enjoyable. Hamilton especially appealed to him because it is so beautifully clean and well kept, and its roofs covered with lime to purify the rain water as it falls proved an interesting innovation.

Talmadge Play Dons New Title

It has been decided to name the new Norma Talmadge play, "Going Straight," instead of "Playmates," which was a studio title, originally selected on account of the prominent parts played by the talented Fine Arts children.

"Going Straight" is a big drama, with big, psychological, human interest situations. It suggests a solution of the problem of the criminal who has his past to live down. In the handling of the theme, the author, Bernard McConville, and the co-directors, C. H. and S. A. Franklin, have closely adhered to true-to-life characterizations, and fortunately have a cast which in its entirety were capable of interpreting accurately the principal parts. Norma Talmadge, as the girl with a past, her husband, Ralph Lewis, a reformed criminal, and Eugene Ballette, a dyed-in-the-wool crook, appear to excellent advantage in "Going Straight," together with the Fine Arts "kiddies."

Gilbert M. Anderson, "Broncho Billy," bought the Longacre theater, New York, last week. He will operate it in conjunction with H. H. Frazee, the former owner of the house. It is understood that Anderson, who recently sold his Essanay stock holdings to George Spoor, will shortly embark again in the production of motion pictures.

Edward H. Robins, formerly leading man with Mrs. Fiske in "Erstwhile Susan," is to take over the motion picture section of the Toronto World on May first. Mr. Robins is a part owner of the Canadian Film Company and has been an editor before.

Mutual Program Brimming

FEATURES. SHORT REELS AND COMEDIES COMPLETED

THE Mutual releases for the week of May 15 included two masterpictures de luxe edition, one three-reel feature, four two-reel subjects and ten single-reel releases, including seven comedies.

"The Isle of Love," from the Gaumont studios, is one of the masterpictures. In this picture Gertrude McCoy makes her initial bow as Mutual star. This story was adapted for screen production by Paul M. Bryan from the well-known song of the same name, and the production was directed by Edwin Middleton. Miss McCoy enacts the role of a petted, spoiled and successful prima donna, who is forced into marriage with a man she has never seen, but afterward quits civilization and returns to "The Isle of Love," and the man she loves. Earl O. Schenck plays opposite Miss McCoy, and Iva Shepard and Robert Clugston also appear in the cast.

The three-part feature for the week is "Four Months," which was released on May 18. Vivian Rich and Alfred Vosburg are the principals in this play, Karl Coolidge is the author, and Carl Le Viness the director.

"The Answer," from the Thanhouser studios, with George Marlo and the Fairbanks Twins, Madeline and Marion, in the principal roles, released May 16; "The Pretender," an American feature, with Lizette Thorne and Edward Coxen, for release May 15; "The Blindness," a Mustang drama, featuring Rhea Mitchell and William Stowell, released May 19, and "High Lights and Shadows," third of the new Centaur dramas featuring Margaret Gibson and the Bostock animals, released May 20, make up the two-reel subjects on this program.

Mutual comedies for the week include under the Falstaff brand, "Detecters," released May 15, with Claude Cooper and Frank McNish in the principal roles, and "Steven's Sweet Sisters," in which Jay C. Yorke, Doris Grey, Gladys Leslie and Isolde Illian are the funmakers, released May 20. Beauty offers "Billy Van Duesen's Fiancee," on May 17, featuring John Steppling and Carol Halloway, and on May 21 Orral Humphrey in "Twenty Minutes in Magic." The Vogue release for May 16 has not been announced, but that for May 21 will go out under the title of "Chinatown Billians." Paddy MacQuire and Rena Rodgers are the stars. Billy Armstrong substitutes for George Ovey in "The Piano Tuner," the Cub comedy released May 19.

Mutual Weekly No. 72, and "See America First," were released May 17. The former contains a number of pictures just received from Mexico, as well as interesting news pictures gathered from all sections of the universe.

The third release of the new single-reel feature, "Reel Life," the Mutual Film Magazine, is scheduled for Sunday, May 21.

Two five-reel subjects, a three-reel feature and five two-reel releases are in the last stages of completion in the American-Mutual studios in Santa Barbara.

"The Guide" and "A Man's Soul" comprise the longer length features in which William Russell, Charlotte Burton, Winnifred Greenwood, Franklin Ritchie and Roy Stewart are the principal players.

The scenario of "The Guide" was prepared by J. Edward Hungerford from a story by Russell Smith. William Russell is directing the feature as well as starring in it. Action is one of the dominant features of the pictures, which revolves about the love of a poet and dreamer, who has taken up his abode in the mountains, for the daughter of a wealthy publisher whose summer residence is located not far distant.

"A Man's Soul" is being produced under the direction of Edward Sloman with Winnifred Greenwood and Franklin Ritchie in the leading roles. Many of the scenes are laid in a leper colony, and human interest runs through the five reels, particularly that part depicting the lepers as they eke out their lives in the isolated colony.

"Madonna of the Night," the three-reel feature, was adapted for the screen by Karl Collidge from a story written by Constance Crawley, who has starred in a number of masterpictures. Nita Davis appears in the title role under the direction of Director Bertram.

Included in the two-reel subjects are "Circumstantial Evidence," with Edward Coxen, Lizette Thorne and George Field; "The Flickering Light," with Harry von Meter and Miss Davis; "Jealousy's First Wife," featuring Vivian Rich, Alfred Vosburg and George Periolat; "Jack," with Anna Little and Dick La Reno; and "The Blindness," with Rhea Mitchell, William Stowell and Roy Stewart.

Richard Bennett will leave New York for the coast just as soon as his engagement in "Rio Grande" is completed. It is not known just what productions Mr. Bennett is to star in, but he is to have his own company of players.

Mary Miles Minter will soon depart for Santa Barbara accompanied by her mother, Charlotte Shelby. Miss Minter will also have an especially selected company of players.

Audrey Munson, the celebrated artists' model and another recent addition to American's forces, is now at work on her first release, which as yet has received no title.

Helen Holmes has all but completed her work in Interesting spot in Gaumont-Mutual's "The Isle of Love," featuring Gertrude McCoy.

We have made a preliminary investigation of the circulation of "Motography" for the issue dated May 13th, 1916, and submit herewith our report, showing the scope and results of our examination.

We found that 12,373 copies were printed; 1,500 copies were delivered to the Western News Company for news stand circulation; 250 copies were expressed to the New York office of your company; and 138 copies filed in your Chicago office. The remaining 10,485 copies were sent through the post office department. None of those mailed were either sample or marked copies.

We analyzed those sent through the mails and foum that 9,382 copies were sent to theatres, theatre owners and managers; 673 copies were sent without charge to advertisers, correspondents, and branch exchanges throughout the country, and 430 copies were unclassified.

CERTIFIED PUBLIC ACCOUNTANTS (O.) ERNST AND ERNST CHICAGO.

Very truly yours,

Ernst & Ernst

Certified Public Accountants.

"Whispering Smith," and will begin immediately upon another production, not yet named.

Thelma Salter, the latest acquisition of the Horsley-Mutual studios, is only six years old. This young star has been in the films ever since she was a two-year-old toddler. Her first appearance on the Mutual program will be with Crane Wilbur in "The Wasted Years."

The first of the Vogue-Mutual comedies featuring Ben Turpin, late of Essanay, will be released shortly.

Harold Hoadley, who recently became a member of the Beauty-Mutual scenario department, has completed his first scenario. It will be released under the title of "Pekin's Mystic Manor," and will feature Orral Humphrey, supported by Josephine Phillips.

"Bill" Russell is selecting his company of players for his next feature production, which will be released in five reels. Charlotte Burton will support Russell.

Frederick Warde has begun work on his first subject under the title of Thanhouser Classics. In this five-part fetature Mr. Warde will be supported by a company of well-known players.

A furious struggle between a man and a lion is but one of the many thrills in "The Butterfly's Wing," a two-part Centaur feature to be released shortly by Mutual. Charles Gay, a noted animal trainer, now with the Horsley Mutual studios, staged the fight with "Appolo," one of the Bostock lions, which appears frequently in Mutual releases, and himself, as the principals.

Eight of the fifteen chapters of "The Secret of the Submarine," the new American-Mutual photo-novel, starring Thomas Chatterton and Juanita Hansen, have been completed. Forthcoming releases of this serial will present some exceptionally novel scenes in which a submarine plays an important part. The scenes in which the submarine is used are being filmed from a technical standpoint, under the supervision of several underwater boat officers now stationed at the San Pedro naval base in California.

TWO REELERS FOR TRIANGLE

Short Dramas Will Hereafter Form Part of the Triangle Program—New Fine Arts Plays Completed

Five new Triangle plays have been completed at the California Fine Arts studio for release on the Triangle program. These are featuring De Wolf Hopper in a picturization of "Casey at the Bat," supported by Marguerite Marsh, Frank Bennett, Kate Toncray, William H. Brown, Carl Stockdale and Loyola O'Connor.

Lillian Gish will appear in a Granville Warwick Kentucky story, with a supporting cast that is composed of Sam de Grasse, Mary Alden, Spottiswoode Aitken, Jennie Lee, and William De Vaull.

Douglas Fairbanks will star in "The Assassin," and his associates in the cast embrace A. D. Sears, Jewel Carman, Wilbur Higby, Margie Wilson, and W. E. Lawrence.

Norma Talmadge will appear in "Going Straight," supported by Ralph Lewis, Eugene Pallette and Kate Toncray.

Mae Marsh, Robert Harron and Wilfred Lucas will be presented in a different sort of a Triangle production.

An innovation in the Triangle program is the announcement of two-reel photoplays to be issued at regular intervals as part of this program. The same directors will have charge of these as produce the features and the same cast will be used. Light comedy will serve as the basis of these shorter features and each one will present one of the Fine Arts stars.

Douglas Fairbanks will be one of the first actors to appear in one of these two-reel plays. Mr. Fairbanks willingly consented to play in a series of two-reel subjects to be produced between the making of the regular features. In the first of this series Mr. Fairbanks will take the part of a secret service man of a different sort than is generally seen in pictures.

Chester Withey, for the past two years a member of the Griffith Hollywood studio, has been promoted to the directing ranks in reward of his talent and loyalty. His first production will be "The Dope Fiend," of which he and Ray Somerville are co-authors. Norma Talmadge and Tully Marshall will appear in this play.

Three Stars in "The Clown"

It takes a pretty strong play to be able to uphold three stars but "The Clown," which is nearing completion at the Lasky studios under the direction of William C. deMille, carries off this honor.

In addition to Thomas Meighan, who is featured in this production in support of Victor Moore, the leading feminine role will be played by Florence Dagmar.

"Maria Rosa," the Lasky production featuring Geraldine Farrar, which was released May 8, was given most systematic and unusual publicity. Articles about the play accompanied by cuts were sent out to over one hundred and fifty newspapers, and in order to be of the utmost assistance to exhibitors who were showing the picture, the feature article was released in the respective cities coincident with the release in the theater.

Anita King is kept very busy addressing meetings on the topic of better conditions of photoplayers, particularly of young women who are brought to Los Angeles through misrepresentation of great success to be obtained before the camera. In her role of City Mother, Miss King has spoken before the Ad Club of Los Angeles, the Rotary Club and Women's Club of San Diego, and has been invited to visit San Francisco to speak before the women's clubs and address the girls of the University of California, at Berkeley.

The Passing of Keystone Mabel

A POPULAR JOYMAKER'S GRADUATION

NEVER again will "Keystone" Mabel Normand go riding on a motorcycle with Charlie Chaplin, who didn't know how to manage the thing.

Never again will she roll down hill in a barrel; be dragged through a muddy lake containing rubbish and broken glass; walk along the skyline of a hill with a goat following her; be tied to a rock in the ocean with the surf pounding over her; ride a wild horse part way over a cliff before deciding to turn back.

Worshipers before the perpendicular stage will not again see Miss Normand leap from the roof of one house to another before a net is placed in the alley between, or fall from the window of a blazing building.

In brief, Mabel Normand, the dark-eyed, slender little comedienne who, in Keystone comedies, has been responsible for millions of laughs in theaters all over the world, is through risking her neck in the noble cause of motion picture art.

The charm of personality, the spirit of fun and mischief, the gayety of manner which won for "Keystone Mabel" so many enthusiastic friends, is to have a new setting, in a new sort of comedies which will delight her old admirers and win her many new ones.

Incidentally, the new pictures will not be so dangerous to work in. The leading lady will be fairly certain, when she begins one, that she will not be carried to a hospital before the play is completed.

Queen bee of her own fun factory.

"Keystone comedies are fun to watch," said Miss Normand, who, about to begin her new work, felt in a reminiscent mood, "but, believe me, making them is a serious affair. It was no laughing matter for me. I was always thinking of my role, even in the funniest play. It was hard work, too. running at top speed in the hot sunshine, falling flat, rolling down hill in a barrel, even dragging goats around by the horns!" Mabel looked quite sorry for herself for just one minute; then she laughed. "I played with a goat once who was temperamental, I think.

"He was supposed to follow me, but he simply refused. They whipped him, but he still balked. They shoved him with poles, but the poles showed in the picture. Then I thought of a wire, and they wired the goat and me together, tied one end around the goat's horns, the other around my waist. And four times I dragged that stubborn animal along the skyline of a hill, before the picture was just right. I felt sorry for myself, working so hard.

"Then there was the time they dragged me through a lake. It was really a sort of mud hole, which the city was to fill, but it gave the director an idea for a comedy. We went and made it, and it was a funny picture, but I was sick for several weeks after, because I swallowed some of the lake water."

However, the life of a Keystoner is not without its compensations in fun. Miss Normand couldn't tell which comedy she thought most humorous on the screen, but she was not for a moment in doubt about the "most fun she ever had in pictures."

"Working with Raymond Hitchcock in 'My Valet' made up for all the hardships. I think I laughed straight through the 'water stuff.' Fred Mace was the villain. He took me out to a rock in the sea and tied me there. But he was so afraid of the water that he was in terror the whole time, I believe. And at last the current was so strong it swept him away, and we all had to turn in and rescue the frightened 'villyan.'"

Like many other adventurers, Miss Normand has a pet superstition to which she has clung through all her hazards and which she is bringing into her new work. It concerns the number thirteen.

"I always like to have the number thirteen prominent in some way when I begin new things. I signed my new contract on the thirteenth of the month, and that is a good beginning for me."

Miss Normand is to be an "extra special" player under the Kay-Bee label. A special studio is being built for her on a four-acre tract between Hollywood and Los Angeles, and she will have her own company of stock players as regular support.

She will have her own director, but each of her pictures will be made under the close supervision of Thomas H. Ince. Her first play has been written for her by J. G. Hawks. The title of the story has not been made public as yet, but it will afford Miss Normand a light comedy role. In her new plays the star will have an opportunity for acting and character drawing.

And one thing is certain: there will be plenty of fun and "pep" in Mabel Normand's plays.

Changes in General Film

The General Film Company announces several transfers and promotions of their employes as follows:

T. Y. Henry of the Salt Lake City office assigned to management of Denver branch.

W. H. Cree, formerly manager at Denver. has been transferred to Los Angeles in the same capacity.

W. H. Hepburn, formerly an assistant in the Los Angeles office, will take charge of the Salt Lake City office.

"The Light of Dusk" is the title of the important feature photoplay undertaking announced by the Lubin company on which work has been started in the Philadelphia studios. This original scenario will represent another departure by the Lubin Company from the field of novels and stage dramas as subjects for screen plays.

WELL-BALANCED PROGRAM

Vitagraph Presents Variety in Subjects and Length of Films—Lillian Walker and Anita Stewart Featured Personages

Under its schedule for release for the week of May 15 Vitagraph offered a well-balanced and well planned program. At the head of the list was "The Ordeal of Elizabeth," featuring Lillian Walker.

In "Kernel Nutt Wins a Wife," Frank Daniels conducts a matrimonial agency and gets into some very humorous situations. This play was written by Reginald Wright Kaufman and was directed by C. Jay Williams. Playing with Mr. Daniels are Alice Washburn and Adele de Garde.

A split reel features William Dangman in "A Lucky Tumble," under the direction of Frank Currier. Lucille Crane, Florence Natol, George O'Donnell and William Lytell, Jr., also do some good work. On this same reel are shown some wonderful scenes of Iceland.

In "More Money Than Manners," we are shown the experiences of the Oodles family and their attempt to break through society's upper crust. This was written by C. Graham Baker and Lawrence Semon. John T. Kelly, Jewell Hunt, Kate Price and Hugie Mack are the chief funmakers under the direction of Semon.

The Broadway Star Feature of the week is "Miss Adventure," in which Mary Anderson plays the leading role. This comedy was filmed by William Wolbert. Webster Campbell plays opposite Miss Anderson.

A Blue Ribbon Feature listed for release the latter part of May is "The Suspect," featuring Anita Stewart. This is a five-reel adaptation of H. J. W. Dam's book entitled, "The Silver Shell." S. Rankin Drew is responsible for the picturization of this play as well as its direction. The play is laid in Russia and Russian conditions as they existed a few years ago are presented in lifelike fashion. Miss Stewart appears as the leader of a society of nihilists. Mr. Drew plays opposite Miss Stewart. This play also introduces Frank Wupperman, a recent addition to the Vitagraph players. The cast included Anders Randolf, Julia Swayne Gordon, Bobby Connelly and Edward Elkas.

The villain no longer pursues her. This new version of the beauty and the beast act is a part of a new Triangle-Keystone soon to slip over the country's screens. It is Claire Anderson who is receiving King Leo's fond attentions.

Rollin S. Sturgeon's eight-reel feature, "God's Country and the Woman," which was released as a Blue Ribbon picture, bids fair to be one of the most popular pictures of this company. Sturgeon put much careful thought on this picture and it is good from every angle—acting, photography, locations and story.

Evart Overton, who is a great student of the film industry as well as an actor, has just returned from Jacksonville where he has been playing in "The Ordeal of Elizabeth." Mr. Overton is full of praise for Florida as a film producing center, and especially lauds Jacksonville. He says almost anything can be obtained down there, including the hearty co-operation of the Jacksonville Board of Trade.

Rollin S. Sturgeon, the director-general of the Vitagraph company's western studio, is wearing a smile that won't come off. The cause is a son and heir. The potential Vitagraph leading man and Mrs. Sturgeon are doing well, and father and mother will have to hire a special secretary to answer all the notes of congratulation being sent.

George D. Baker, who is producing a Blue Ribbon feature, says he believes in safety first, and demonstrated it by deciding to take in the studio some pictures for which he had planned to go to Mexico. So he dug up some Mexicans in New York and is getting very realistic scenes without too much realism in the way of border warfare. Mr. Baker is author as well as producer of this five-reel feature. Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno will be seen in the principal roles.

News of the Vitagraph Hollywood Studios

William Wolbert has just finished a three-reel drama with Corinne Griffith, Jack Mower and Anne Schaefer, and is about to start work on another of the same length, with no delay between pictures. His cast will include Mary Anderson, Corinne Griffith, Jack Mower, and Otto Lederer. The novelty picture produced by Edgar Keller has been shipped East for release at an early date. Mr. Keller has succeeded in getting a finished product that is artistic in every detail and unique in both subject and handling.

A prominent San Francisco society girl has started a club of Anne Schaefer's admirers in her immediate circle. When the plans of organization are perfected they will be submitted to Miss Schaefer for approval. As Miss Schaefer is planning soon to visit the Bay City on a short vacation, the girls have made arrangements for an enthusiastic welcome and reception in her honor.

Le Saint and Razeto Resign

Ed J. Le Saint, the widely known director, has resigned from the Universal company and is taking a rest. Mr. Le Saint is regarded as one of the most capable producers in the business.

Stella Raezto, who in private life is Mrs. Le Saint, left the company at the same time and is at present enjoying the beauties of the new home which recently was completed for them. Miss Razeto has played leads for the Universal under the direction of Mr. Le Saint for a long time.

Director S. L. Rothapfel of the Rialto has selected "The Bugle Call" for the first change in program at his new theater, to take place Sunday. It is a Triangle production, staged by Thomas H. Ince, and introduces William ("Buster") Collier, son of the star comedian, as a film star.

World's History Mirrored in Films

"FALL OF A NATION" HUGE SPECTACLE

WITH the production of "The Birth of a Nation," it was thought that no greater play could be filmed. But the author of "The Clansman," from which "The Birth" adaptation was made, claims that in "The Fall of a Nation" he has even a stronger and more wonderful play.

This play is designed to show the history of the formation of Americans—that is to show the polyglot nationalities of which we are composed and through a survey of nearly four hundred years of history to bring us to the story of "The Fall of a Nation," which tells what these polyglot peoples did when threatened by the extinction of the national life. In the prologue of this film, which consumes a thousand feet, Mr. Dixon has undertaken the gigantic historical task of tracing the progress of the world's struggle between liberty and tyranny from 1550 A. D. down to the present time. This prologue shows the human aspirations toward freedom culminating in the American republic. Neither race, nor creed, nor form of servitude is omitted from this delineation.

The church of England persecution of the Nonconformists; Catholic persecution of the Huguenots by revoking the edict of Nantes; Russian Greek church persecution of Jews and Catholics in Poland; the English Catholics' winning of freedom by founding the colony in Maryland; the landing of the Pilgrim fathers in Massachusetts; the exile of Roger Williams by the Congregationalists to Rhode Island and his friendly welcome by the Indians; the reading of President Monroe's historic message to Congress whereby he made both the Americas nurseries of freedom; these are the links of a strongly welded chain of historic events working up to the big aim. For America is the new home of all the oppressed nationalities and sects, the realization of their dream, and the heritage for which they must fight should the old world, swollen by the arrogance of recent military conquest, strike to impose its ideals upon us.

Considering the fact that "all the world loves a lover," Mr. Dixon has woven a love story all through the play. This is said to turn at the end on the heroism of American women in coming to the rescue of their country when in the hands of a foreign emperor leagued with traitors within our gates, and in particular with a modern Benedict Arnold whose love of gold and power and whose foreign financial affiliations have caused him to espouse the imperial side and have made him the viceroy or governor-general of "the province of the United States."

A synopsis of the story of this production has not yet been given, but it promises big things. Arthur Shirley and Lorraine Huling take the leading parts in this production, with Percy Standing as the Benedict Arnold and C. E. Geldert as the imperial commander. In all twenty thousand people took part in the battle arrays, mob and conspiracy scenes. A battery of sixteen cameras was employed. The military costumes were all executed from designs of the uniforms now used in Europe and America, and new 40-centimeter guns were invented and patented for use in the scenes. As formerly announced, Victor Herbert has composed the musical score for this production.

The first exhibition of this film will be made at a Broadway theater in New York in June, and simultaneously another production will be put on at Clune's Auditorium in Los Angeles.

Rental Record Busted

A new record in the motion picture world was established when the Strand Theater of New York contracted for the Goldberg animated cartoons at $1,500 for seven and a half minutes of film. This is twenty times the previous high record for the sale of motion picture film.

It took exactly eight minutes to put through the deal. The picture was run off in the special projection room of the Strand Theater in the presence of Mitchell Mark, president of the Mark Strand Theater Corporation; B. A. Rolfe, managing director, and J. A. Berst, vice president and general manager of Pathe Exchange, Inc., which is releasing the Goldberg cartoons.

BILLIE BURKE GOING STRONG

Studebaker Theater in Chicago, the Arcadia in Philadelphia, and Other Big Houses, Filled by Kleine Film

A lot of mighty good past records in the way of box office receipts went smash on Monday, May 8, when the theaters which had wisely arranged for a preservice showing on the new George Kleine motion picture novel "Gloria's Romance," closed for the day and the house managers sat down to count up their receipts.

As a result of the big patronage at the houses where Billie Burke was the featured attraction, May 8 will be chalked up as a red letter day. And the best part of it all is, in the opinion of the managers, that this event is liable to be duplicated on twenty or more other days, for the big new serial is to run through twenty feature chapters and each week the thousands who saw Billie Burke the week before are certain to come back to behold the latest development of her romance.

The lobbies of the theaters above which the magic name of Billie Burke appeared, were crowded from the opening hour in the morning until long past the regular closing hour at night. For example, Jones, Linick & Schaefer's Studebaker Theater on Michigan boulevard, Chicago, was fairly mobbed by a throng of early-rising picture fans at ten o'clock, although the regular performance at that house is not scheduled to start until 11 o'clock. All day long the seating capacity was taxed to the utmost and the final count-up at night showed that more than double the normal business had been done.

In Philadelphia, the Arcadia did a tremendous business all day long and similar reports were received from the New Palace in Minneapolis, the Isis in Denver, the American in Salt Lake City, and the Tivoli in San Francisco. In Washington, D. C., the Garden played to top-heavy patronage from the hour of opening until late at night, and in St. Louis both Kings and the Columbia had a waiting line, while the Willis Wood in Kansas City came dangerously close to smashing all previous records for a single day attendance at this theater.

Despite the fact that the manufacturer had long proclaimed "Gloria's Romance" would differ from all previous novels in being sane and rational in every scene, with no dependence on the spectacular or sensational to draw the crowds, happy satisfied audiences went away from every theater, sincere in their praise of the picture as a whole, undoubtedly interested in the adventure that had already befallen Billie Burke as Gloria, and anxious to see how she would escape from the Everglades. The same fascinating little mannerisms that made her famous on the speaking stage have all been imprisoned in the celluloid version of her latest vehicle, and to use the words of the famous film critic and reviewer, Kitty Kelly of the Chicago Tribune:—"Gloria's Romance is a little bit of real human nature, lit up by the radient personality of Billie Burke. It is the human kind of a story that will find echo in hearts in every city street and village home."

Mutual Film Magazine Shows Indian

Reel Life, the Mutual Film Magazine, had its second release on May 14. The first reel was accorded an enthusiastic welcome by the trade reviewers who saw in it visible and tangible evidence of the care and attention the Mutual is giving each individual unit of the Mutual program.

To be in line with the other producing companies of the Mutual family, Gaumont announced its scoop, which is an exclusive agreement with the United States Government to release the official films of the Department of the Interior. And it so happens that the first of these unique Blackfeet Indian films is the feature number of Reel Life of May 14. As subsidiary numbers of the same reel are views of cuttlefish and a colony of ants. The cuttle-fish has ten arms with which it envelopes its prey and then eats the animals caught in its toils. For protection the animal has an ink bag, which squirts india ink, a dense, black fluid, and which hides it from sight. Naturally, whenever the cameraman attempted to "sheet" the beast, the pesky thing started squirting and it was only after many efforts and many spoiled feet of negative before the picture was satisfactorily taken.

The views secured show all the instructive things that can be seen about a cuttle-fish.

The Scenario Makes the Picture

BY WILLIAM FOX

President Fox Film Corporation.

IN MANY directions I encounter the seeming feud that exists between the writers of moving picture feature scenarios and those who are employed to produce pictures, the directors. I am also asked at frequent intervals to give my personal opinion of the relative importance of the author and the director in the making of pictures. I have determined to do this because I would like the authors of America, both screen and literary writers included, to know my views.

William Fox.

The scenario is the basis of all good pictures.

The creative brain that first conceives a story knows more about that story than anyone else can possibly know.

The director who is to take the creative idea of another person and make it into a picture is, for a moment, secondary except where the director is also the author of the script and is going to place his own creation in the film.

The man or woman who both originates and then produces novel ideas in a picture is a capable and big figure in our picture industry, if the original ideas themselves have sufficient worth to commend them to the attention of people.

I have almost no patience with the squabbles that arise between author and director. I have seen scores, almost hundreds, of great works ruined or badly mutilated by poor direction, or by direction that seemed incapable of understanding what broad minds had conceived and written.

In my own case I employ and pay directors liberally and I expect them to possess sufficient imagination to go even beyond what an author has written down for their guidance. If they lacked this capacity and were incapable of projecting their vision and imagination on ahead of the scenario writer I would wonder, as any producer would, whether the directors were even necessary. If they lacked these capacities they would have no place in our industry and authors would be engaged as directors of their own scenarios.

I have a word or so that I would like to say to the directors of pictures; I have said this many times to my own directors:

"Brain is going to rule in motion picture authorship and motion picture production. The brains that have made the literature of the past in all languages and the brains that are making the literature of this day in all lands are not to be flouted or treated with contempt by those of us who have engaged in the task of translating the world's best thought into the pictures that the rest of the world will see for years to come.

"Certainly I shall never be the one to say, or think, that those of us who are now making pictures, and the men we hire to produce them, are superior in insight or vision to the authors who place the thought and imagination of the world between the covers of books.

"We need in motion pictures the biggest brains in the world. I would like to be able to say and I hope to be able to say before long that I have the twenty or thirty, or fifty biggest brains in the world on my pay-roll. I have some of them now and I shall meet still more men and women such as I have described. When I do I shall engage them on a satisfactory and remunerative basis.

"When I get them I have one assurance to offer all of them and that is: I will not let their work be mutilated. I will see that the very best that is in them finds expression in the pictorial reproductions of their thoughts and I shall hope and expect then to contribute to the permanent history of the screen things that will make my name entitled to the respect and attention of educated, well-bred people for generations to come.

"I want to be judged sometime in the future, perhaps after I have gone, not by any of the work that is being done today by any producers but as a producer who found and gave visual opportunity via the screen to people as worth while in a literary sense as the Galsworthys, the Maeterlincks, the D'Annunzies, the Robert Herricks, the Dreisers, the Edith Whartons, the Gertrude Athertons, the Hauptmanns and the Sudermanns and the Gorkis of our present day.

"Opportunity lies ahead for some producers and I, for one, am going to take advantage of it. All over America there are new brains, new ideas, new men and women desiring to be and worthy of being heard and I, for one, intend to hear them and give them introduction via motion pictures to the people of all civilized lands."

Universal to Entertain Templars

"Knights Templar Day" is to be celebrated at Universal City on June 23. Thousands of Sir Knights and their ladies, who will attend the thirty-third triennial conclave of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templar of the United States, and who will be the guests of President Carl Laemmle and Vice-President H. O. Davis of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, at the motion picture municipality, are looking forward with much pleasure to their visit to the city of make-believe.

One of the features of the program will be a rodeo, consisting of wild west performances by the Universal cowboys, under the direction of Wallace Kerrigan, superintendent of the Universal ranch.

From ten to twenty of the Universal companies will be engaged during the day in making scenes for comedies, dramas and tragedies upon the main stage, the feature stage and the three other stages.

METRO ADDS TWO STARS

Irene Fenwick and Ralph Herz Join Metro Family and Begin Plays—Several Important New Productions

Metro's fast growing family has been increased by the coming of Irene Fenwick and Ralph Herz.

The first production in which Miss Fenwick will star on the Metro program is "The Purple Lady," a five-part feature written by Sydney Rosenfeld. Edwin Carewe will direct all the plays in which Miss Fenwick appears. Miss Fenwick will not give up the speaking stage entirely for the screen, but will find time away from the studio to appear in the theaters. At present she is starring in "The Co-respondent."

Mabel Taliaferro has signed a long-time contract with the Metro which insures her appearance in at least eleven big productions on that program. Work on the first of these, "The Good Little Bad Girl," will begin immediately. Miss Taliaferro was the first recognized American star to go into motion pictures. At that time her friends declared she was ruining her career. Later, however, events have demonstrated to the contrary in no uncertain fashion. Edwin Carewe will also direct all the plays in which Miss Taliaferro appears.

Another important addition to the Metro stars who has begun work on her first production is Viola Dana. She will appear in "The Flower of No Man's Land," written by John Collins, and also to be produced by him.

Harold Lockwood and May Allison have begun work on "The Masked Rider," formerly announced as "The Night Rider." Lester Cuneo is also appearing in this play, which is being produced in the hills of North Carolina under the direction of Fred J. Balshofer.

Lionel Barrymore, whose next production, "Dorian's Divorce," is scheduled for release on June 5, is also engaged in a new production, "The Quitter." This five-part feature is being directed by Charles Horan.

Other features scheduled for early release on the Metro program are a five-part production which will probably be called "Dress," in which Mme. Petrova will appear; "Notorious Gallagher," starring Marguerite Snow and Director William Nigh; another five-part feature based upon a poem by Robert W. Service, "The Kipling of the North," in which Edmund Breese will appear; and elaborate picturizations of Ella Wheeler Wilcox's poems, to which Metro has exclusive rights, and which will be adapted by Charles A. Taylor.

The scenario department, under the direction of Arthur James, has been enlarged considerably. The staff includes Harry O. Hoyt, Charles W. Taylor, Howard Irving Young, L. R. Stark and Leander de Cordova. Difficulty has been experienced in obtaining manuscripts for one-reel comedies for Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew. They are always in the market for good, live, clever and wholesome comedies, and top prices are being asked for them.

Harold Lockwood and May Allison ask that it be distinctly stated that they are not married. False rumors to this effect have been circulated and the two stars have been very much annoyed in consequence. Mr. Lockwood and Miss Allison appear opposite each other because their types and talent make a very strong combination. They are not married, however, and have no intention of being.

The Metro booth at the exposition proved very popular, not only because of its artistic design but because of the presence of so many of the stars. The public thronged to shake hands with the actors and actresses and thousands of autographs were sought. Harold Lockwood and May Allison came up from North Carolina just to attend the exposition and they signed more than a thousand photographs. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew were also very busy with their pens in the interest of their admirers. Little Viola Dana was another favorite, but she was so small it was hard to see her in the crowd and it was requested she stand on a chair where she could be seen. Marguerite Snow was another favorite and attracted thousands of admirers. Mabel Taliaferro was presented to the visitors by her husband, Thomas J. Carrigan, also a Metro player. Evelyn Bent, who played with Mme. Petrova in "Playing With Fire," although not a full-fledged star, was voted one of the prettiest girls present.

Among the Metro directors who stood on the receiving line, without giving orders, were Edwin Carewe, William Nigh, John W. Noble, Charles Horan, Burton King, Edward Lawrence, John Collins and David Thompson. Arthur James, director of publicity, William E. Atkinson, business manager, and Harry Cohen of the lithograph department were also in evidence.

Another feature of the Metro exhibit was the department under Henry James devoted to advertising The Pictures Magazine, published in the interest of Metro wonderplays. Pretty girls in evening gowns passed out the magazines to the visitors.

Janet Priest, magazine writer, dramatic critic, actress and singer, has accepted a position with The Pictures Magazine, and will write special articles on Metro stars and productions for that publication. In addition to these special stories Miss Priest will write each week a fiction story adapted from a five-reel screen feature.

Films Burned on Battleship

While the United States battleship Kansas was in Guantanamo Bay at Spring target practice, April 5, motion picture films valued at $10,000, leased by the blue-jackets, were destroyed by fire.

While the crew were engaged in target practice there was an explosion and smoke and flames burst from the storeroom. About thirty feet away there were 300 rounds of fixed ammunition. The flames could be seen easily by the other ships. It is believed the fire was due to spontaneous combustion.

"Hand Picked" Southern Beauties for Pathe

SEELYE HAS STRONG ARTICLE ON CO-OPERATION

DIRECTORS HANSEL AND McGILL of the Arrow studios in Yonkers, where the new Pathe series, "Who's Guilty?" is being produced, were not satisfied with the "beauties" sent them by theatrical agencies.

Disgusted with the array, one of the men from the studio (name deleted by the censors) offered to procure what they wanted by the "hand picked" method.

His methods were decidedly original, but he made good.

One girl he saw riding in a taxi and he braved the possible wrath of her escort by flagging the car, introducing himself and his purpose, and then hiring her on the spot. Another sat with her mother at the table next to him in a restaurant. Another was hired on a railroad train, and so on. There was one distinction common to all, however, besides their beauty, and that was that they were all southern girls. But then—Director McGill is himself from Mississippi. These southern peaches were all on exhibit at the Pathe booth at the Grand Central Palace during the exposition, and were well worth a stroll in that direction.

C. R. Seelye of the Pathe exchange has written a very strong article on the co-operation of the public, the exhibitor and the exchangemen. When first sent out to the sales forces of the company as their working instructions it was considered rather revolutionary, but on more deliberate thoughts, not only the sales force but manufacturers, exchangemen and even directors have sent in for copies. The article is given below:

The public is more progressive than the exhibitors.

The exhibitors are more progressive than the exchangemen.

The exchangemen are more progressive than the manufacturers.

Heretofore there has been a lot of costly lost motion, between the makers of pictures and the public who pay for them.

This lost motion can be eliminated, if every manufacturer will act on the knowledge that he is working for the public; if every manager and salesman will be instructed that he is working for the exhibitor to increase the exhibitor's profits and so, the profits of the company; if every one will realize that the distributing organization and the studio are of equal importance; neither can be ultimately successful without the other.

National merchants—like the great automobile and clothing manufacturers—employ advertising agencies not only to supply them art and copy, but also to keep them informed of all the newest and best ways originated for creating business in every line. Salesmen should call on the exhibitor not only to sell him film and advertising, but to tell him of the best ways devised by the manufacturers and other exhibitors for presenting and advertising each feature. Then when the exhibitor is shown how he can make money he will gladly ask to buy the film and advertising. In short, our sales force should practically act as advertising agents for the exhibitors.

The managers and salesmen who work for the exhibitors to help them serve the public just as honestly, conscientiously and intelligently as if the exhibitors were paying their salaries, are the men who will earn the most money for and from their employers.

The public knows what it wants. The public is always right. The public pays. Therefore, the public demands and must receive. But a satisfied public pays well.

The public has a telephone, newspapers, billboards, moving picture screens and rapid transit. The public therefore can be quickly educated—it cannot be fooled.

The jury of one hundred million returns its supreme verdict to the exhibitor. He knows first the wishes of the the people, so he is ahead of the exchangemen and manufacturers.

Only by working as partners for and with the exhibitor, can we best serve him, so he can serve his people best. Only by giving us gladly our proper share of the business we help create in each town, can the exhibitor receive from us the best there is in us. We shall—manufacturers, exhibitors, and exchangemen—be rewarded as we serve—and this is the Religion of Service and the elimination of waste through co-operation. It pays!

Other New Pathes

"The Girl With the Green Eyes" was released on the Pathe Gold Rooster program for May 15. This adaptation of Clyde Fitch's play was produced by the Popular Plays and Players company and features Katherine Kaelred and Julian L'Estrange. The story has been sumptuously produced with careful attention to the big "little things."

The first of the "Who's Guilty?" series, entitled "Puppets of Fate," was released May 8. This is the first of fourteen released on this series, which will be issued in two reels each. Mrs. Wilson Woodrow wrote the stories from which the plays are being made, and these stories have been syndicated in hundreds of newspapers. This series will feature Anna Q. Nilsson and Tom Moore.

In this same week was released the "Boob Weekly," the first of the animated cartoon comedies that Rube Goldberg is creating for the Pathe program. "The Boob Weekly" is a travesty on current news films and treats fictitious subjects in a way that suggests a real news film the while it burlesques it. The topics, "Harvesting Wild Umbrella Handles in Brazil" and "Hunting the Wild Collar Button on the Haberdashery Fields of Umpslopagus," suggest the droll humor of these subjects.

Fourteen thousand one hundred and twenty-six dollars' worth of business contracted for in four showings of one photo-novel alone out of the eight "Who's Guilty?" pictures which the Arrow Film Corporation have already turned over to Pathe is a record to be proud of. This represents the volume of business done by the Pathe company in the two days of the Exhibitors' Palace show. This is actual film bookings backed up with advance cash payments against collections.

Arthur S. Abeles, manager of Pathe's New York branch, assisted by A. W. Smith, C. Stennerman, H. Kronacker, J. Haspel, H. Weisfield, H. Morgan, S. Rubenstein, A. N. Barney and H. Fuld, gave two showings a day in the projection room at the Palace show for the benefit of the exhibitors attending the exposition. The first of the "Who's Guilty?" series, entitled "Puppets of Fate," was shown. The projection room was filled at every showing, with the resultant numerous bookings. The men in charge attributed this great success to the play, their own efforts and the spirit of the Palace show.

In producing "Puppets of Fate," Director McGill has used every means to make the scenes as realistic as possible. One especially good scene, which is generally faked in most photoplays, is in the hospital. This scene was actually taken in the operating rooms of St. John's Hospital in Yonkers, N. Y., and Dr. Carr, the head surgeon, assisted by three operating-room nurses, are seen in a real operation, and the public will be given an opportunity to see what a real operating room looks like in the course of an operation.

Jack Sherrill in California

The mountain has been coming to Jack Sherrill right from the outset, saving this popular young leading man the perplexities of the ancient philosopher Mohammed. The mountain of success has been hunching right up close to him.

Jack Sherrill.

In the very first production in which he took a small part, his expressive acting and clean - cut "screening" were noticeable, and caused a steady climb to success through a succession of well handled parts in "The Builder of Bridges" with C. Aubrey Smith, "Just Out of College" by George Ade, "John Glayde's Honour" again in an important part supporting Smith, "The Woman in 47" with Alice Brady, and finally as Steve O'Mara, the woodsman lover in "Then I'll Come Back to You," the lead opposite Miss Brady.

This last part has culminated a consistent series of successes, bringing Mr. Sherrill prominently before the public in a gripping and original leading part.

Not audiences alone, but exhibitors and producers, have noticed with uncommon interest the career of Jack Sherrill, and now several offers from California are taking him to the sunny climate to investigate its possibilities and continue his work out there.

THE FEARLESS "LEE KIDS"

"Stamp Out All Fear," Is the Slogan of the Wise Mother Who Has Brought Up These Two Children

Jane and Katherine Lee—respectively four and six years of age—the children who have never known fear.

This does not mean that they were not born just like other children with a natural fear of the dark and all things supernatural and not understood, but their training has been such that they have unconsciously been led to eliminate "fear" from their vocabulary or knowledge.

Mrs. Irene Lee, the mother of these two star participants in the William Fox million dollar picture, gives her rule for bringing up children. She says her basic principal for the training of children is "stamp out all fear, first of all, the rest is easy." Mrs. Lee divides fear into physical, spiritual and imaginative, and these again into many subdivisions. The first to be met with was the fear of the dark, but this was overcome by the children being put to bed in the dark and becoming used to it.

Next came the fear of strange goblins and fairies heightened by the wierd stories told about them by other children. To meet this Mrs. Lee bought books profusely illustrated with goblins and insisted upon the children reading them and becoming acquainted with all these mysteries of fairyland.

In all their work for the motion pictures this lack of fear has been clearly demonstrated. These babies do not hesitate to do anything the director tells them because they are not afraid of anything. In the recent Fox production Herbert Brenon, the director, was always careful, however, to pass a note to the mother when there was the slightest element of risk so that she could be near the children at the time.

A tangible case that proved this fearlessness of Jane and Katherine was when they were unexpectedly washed from a huge rock and sucked down into the surf by a comber. There was no real danger, of course, because there were enough able-bodied men standing around to rescue them. But when they were brought up from the waves, instead of a whimpering, frightened pair of kiddies, they were both laughing at what they considered was a joke that the ocean had played upon them.

Thomas Bedding Joins Novelty Slide

Thomas Bedding has been appointed publicity director of the Novelty Slide Company, of New York, the largest slide manufacturing concern in the world. The two publications of this company, "Novelty Slides" and "Rays of Light," will be issued under the editorship of Mr. Bedding. Mr. Bedding's diversified experience in law, architecture, art, reporting, dramatic criticizing, short story writing and the editing of many popular publications, makes him well fitted for this position.

Hopper to Hop to Vaudeville

De Wolf Hopper, one of the present big guns of the Fine Arts studios, will be a vaudeville star next season. Mr. Hopper's motion picture contract with the Triangle company will expire, it is stated, in August and the comedian expects immediately to begin a tour of the Orpheum circuit. He will offer a humorous monologue about his motion picture experiences and the talk will be called "Mishaps in the Movies."

Two hundred and twenty thousand feet of film were exposed in the making of the big million dollar Fox production made in Jamaica by Director Brenon.

Constructive Organization in a Film Plant

BY WATTERSON R. ROTHACKER

MY FRIEND who said, "I have my business so systematized that all I find on my desk in the morning is a comprehensive report and fresh flowers," and followed that statement by adding, "and I am independent of the vagaries of genius and am not dependent upon any individual or group of individuals, regardless of their actual or fancied importance," was not in the moving picture business. But his policy, when properly pursued, solves the problem of consistent efficiency in moving picture production.

This man operated on the theory that the individual, regardless of station or reputation, is only important and valuable as an operating cog in the smooth running machine with interchangeable parts—each part easily replaced.

We have all, at times, been beguiled by made-to-order reputations. We have had to pay for the explosion of elaborate theories which offered more sound than service. We have all paid high for experience which is worth every cent it costs, provided it is properly applied.

My experience—and I have been in active touch with the moving picture industry for about twelve years, and have been a moving picture manufacturer for more than six years—has caused me to believe that the organization so far exceeds, in importance, the individual that the individual is merely incidental.

It has always been my policy to give freely to the trade publicity pertaining to individuals in my employ. I have done so with my eyes wide open to the fact that such publicity is usually followed by offers from people who find it easier, and more convenient, to buy reputation than to earn it. Such people have the false idea that organization fortification is built from the top and let the bottom take care of itself. Where this is done, we have another case of building a home upon the shifting sands.

I contend that individuals and their reputations may come and they may go, but an organization, properly built and maintained, will go on forever; and will forge on ahead, sufficient in its own strength, if its members are given fullest opportunity to grow with the company.

By this I mean not a headless organization, but an organization capably officered in full, and so officered that displacements by death, dismissal or otherwise are filled automatically by subordinates whose ability and training have qualified them to step up from the ranks.

Reputations are usually built by achievement plus good advertising. Sometimes reputations come unsolicited, through worthy recognition of sheer achievement. And sometimes—too often—reputations are acquired by a grain of achievement and a pound of advertising.

It is my opinion, based on actual observation, that manufacturing reputations of individuals in the film business are reflected more largely from their association as an employee with some reliable organization, whose prestige they purloin, than on the worth and personal achievement of the individual.

I am particularly proud of the rank and file of our organization. Applicants are considered carefully and investigated thoroughly. We know who the applicant is, what he has done. We attempt to substantiate his claims. We must be satisfied that he or she is of the right calibre and is ambitious. We make it our business to know something about the applicant's habits and associates—home environment. And this observation and personal interest is continued during the entire term of employment.

The new employe, before being accepted as a permanent acquisition, is merely on probation. To become one of the regulars, he or she must measure up to standard, must show application and industry, must prove worthy of the opportunity to qualify and grow with us.

Our employes are made to understand the "why," as well as the "how," of what they are to do. They have an intelligent understanding of what their particular work means to the general production. They are educated to reason—to be ready to step smoothly into the department just ahead.

We attempt, by a series of lectures and educational talks, and by close personal contact, to imbue each employe with the true spirit of the organization; to develop the individual power to its utmost. The result has been eminently satisfactory, for a definite and high degree of efficiency is established, and secured, and a general feeling of confidence is instilled and prevails, and the individual is happy in his work. one spent in a picture theater?

Welfare work among our employes is not confined entirely to the theory and practice of education and business training. We have made every material provision for every creature comfort and health. All of our work rooms are large and airy, and scrupulously sanitary. Pure air and lots of it, cheerful surroundings, wholesome atmosphere, and the knowledge that the opportunity is limited only by the grasp and worthiness of the individual, tends to foster ambition and to promote the feeling of active co-operation which is so vitally essential to the success of any business enterprise.

An example of the practicability of our scheme and method of concentrating upon the training and development of the rank and file and encouraging their ambitions may be seen at our new plant. The spirit which prevails there will be appreciated by the exponents of sane preparedness who seek relief from the inconvenience of having the trade believe that when any employe transfers his allegiance to any other concern, the wheels of progress have been clogged, even for a moment.

It is the men and women who are behind the cameras, perforators, printers, tanks, drums and inspection tables who constitute the major strength of any factory force constructively organized. This strength should be governed and directed, of course, by owners whose business reputations are staked on the result. Such a combination means scientific management, and dominates and gives protection against migratory experts who really are merely episodes.

The Cleveland Leader gave a grand ball recently, at which Dorothy Bernard, the Fox star, known to thousands of photoplay goers, was the guest of honor.

JUDGE HOLDS UP SERIAL

American Mutual, "The Secret of the Submarine," Possesses Unique Locations and Any Number of Thrill Scenes

A United States judge in New York has temporarily held up the release date of "The Secret of the Submarine" so that the big picture will not now have its first public showing until May 22.

The theme around which the story has been written is an invention by which the owner nation could control the seas and make its coast line impregnable as Gibraltar. The first chapter shows plainly the technical workings of a submarine never before displayed upon the screen. Although the producing company had the co-operation of U. S. naval officers in the making of the picture there apparently are some secrets not supposed to become public.

The federal jurist ordered that the first release be postponed to May 22 upon an information filed by a man named Barry. The action in the U. S. court is of especial interest, because of the general theme of the picture, carrying as it does, the thought of nation-wide defense and showing in strikingly sensational scenes the manner in which the secret, for the obtaining of which naval officers have experimented for years, is enabled to become a nation's bulwark.

To be in a launch when it is blown up is not exactly to the liking of Hylda Hollis, who plays Olga Ivanoff in "The Secret of the Submarine." However, when she was called upon to participate in such a thrill she never flinched.

The scene is remarkably thrilling as can readily be imagined. The launch with Miss Hollis, Lamar Johnstone and George Clancy aboard is being driven at a high rate of speed when the explosion occurs. Johnstone is hurled into the air with a little more force than had been intended but he lands safely, except for the possibility of drowning, in the ocean.

Miss Hollis is also thrown overboard and she and Johnstone offer an intensely dramatic scene when, after breasting the waves together, they clamber up on a whistling buoy which marks the entrance to Santa Barbara channel. In the accompanying picture they are shown clinging to the buoy for dear life.

Director Sargent has developed a realism into the staging of the big photoplay that is quite remarkable, the members of the company being asked to take risks for the sake of this realism, such as is rarely seen in photoplay production. In no instance have the actors declined, or intimated that the element of personal danger was too great.

They all have implicit confidence in Director Sargent who always takes precautions for the safety of the actors commensurate with the risk they are to take. The first release of "The Secret of the Submarine" will be May 22.

An unusual and wonderfully spectacular scene is shown in "The Secret of the Submarine" when the keeper of Point Sierra Light is set upon by Mahlin and Satsuma, foreign spies searching for the great secret. The Point Sierra Light is one of the most picturesque spots on the Pacific coast, towering as it does way above the sea on a little mass of rocks, that makes one feel dubious as to the safety of the lonely men marooned for shipping protection, on it.

The action of the big Mutual-American picture novel calls for the spies attacking and overpowering the keeper so that they may shut off the light, which is serving as a guide to Lieut. Hope and Cleo in their launch bound for Santa Cruz Island. The men struggle perilously near the railing and several times Satsuma is almost tossed over it and into the ocean, far below.

His brother spy, however, rescues him in the nick of time and the brave keeper battling against terrific odds is finally overcome. The light is shut off and somewhere out on the ocean, Cleo and her officer-hero drift helplessly toward the rocks of Santa Cruz.

Big Orchestra for Rochester House

That music in photoplay theaters has advanced in character to an extent almost as remarkable as that attained by the films themselves is evidenced in a particularly impressive way by the engagement of Susan Tompkins, the noted Rochester violinist, to organize and direct a sixteen-piece symphony orchestra for the new $250,000 Piccadilly photoplay theater that is building in Rochester, N. Y. Five years ago it would have been impossible to have induced an artist of Miss Tompkins' unusual talent and wide reputation to play in a motion picture house. As in many cases of picture house music, her orchestra will promote general community appreciation of better music.

Adaptations and Picturizations

BY EDWARD J. MONTAGNE, OF THE VITAGRAPH COMPANY

(A paper read before the Photodramatists' Club of New York)

WHEN a book or play is turned over to a writer to put in scenario form, the first thing he does, or tries to do, is to find the plot. Sometimes this is a mighty hard job. But, admitting there is a plot concealed in some part of the story, it is generally a difficult task to get at it—in fact, a very delicate surgical operation is often necessary, for the plot is often hidden by numerous tentacular growths which must first be severed with a sharp pruning knife. These tentacles, which cling so tenaciously to our plot, invariably consist of chapters of meaningless dialogue; chapters of incidental by-play; chapters of tiresome repetitions; chapters of interesting but superfluous description, description of houses, parks, the tilt of my lady's nose, the slant of her eyes, the sheen of her hair, etc. After we have extricated out plot, we must now apply the test of consistency. Do the situations ring true? Do the characters act consistently? For we all know that with the aid of this story-telling gift, an able writer can put over a situation in a book that would get a big laugh on the screen, if it was done in the same way. And characters can do the most unreasonable things in books, which get over with six pages of explanation, but which would not get over on the screen, no matter how well the actors performed. After the scenario writer has overcome these obstacles, he is a very tired individual, but there is still work to be done. His work thus far has been difficult, but it has been purely constructive, skillful carpentering. He must now turn to his own imagination and see how he can help his plot. What can he add himself to help strengthen the story, to heighten his situations, to develop and emphasize character?

Perhaps I can better illustrate what I have just said by taking a concrete case. A few weeks ago Ralph Ince, the director with whom I work, rang me up from Bay Shore and asked me to get the November number of the Red Book and adapt a short story for him, called "Peter God." As Mr. Ince produces features, exclusively, I knew I had to get at least five reels out of the story. "Peter God," as most of you probably know, is a very powerful story of the northwest, written by James Oliver Curwood, in his best vein. The plot, briefly, is as follows: In the remote wilderness of the northwest lives a mysterious fox-trapper. Every three months he comes to the post, turns in his skins, and before nightfall he is off again. On the books of the Hudson Bay Company he is registered simply as Peter God, single, Brant River. After this introductory paragraph, Mr. Curwood takes up his story at a new point. His next scene is an elaborate drinking place in a city of the far north. Here we are introduced to Phillip Curtis, a young prospector. Near him are seated a beautiful young lady and her father. Curtis is telling his companion of Peter God, and at the mention of his name the lady faints. Later Curtis is summoned to the home of these strangers. They tell him they are interested in Peter God and want to know more about him. Curtis tells them all that he knows, and then, very properly, falls in love with the beautiful lady. Some time later he proposes to her and she tells him she likes him, but he must first go to Peter God with a message from her, and his answer will decide Curtis' fate. Curtis eventually delivers the message to Peter God, who is down with smallpox. At this point Peter God tells his story. Years ago the lady was his wife, and both were very happy. He went into politics, incurred the enmity of a politician, whom he exposed, and who vowed to be revenged. With the aid of a clever woman, a trap was set, and when it was sprung, Peter God found himself utterly disgraced in the eyes of the world. Even Josephine, his devoted wife, believed him guilty, and divorced him. Then his brain went bad; he sought out the politician and killed him. On the desk of this politician was a Bible, open at the Book of Peter, so our hero signed his letter Peter God—the letter he wrote his wife, reiterating his innocence and telling her that he was about to flee to some remote corner of the globe.

After finishing his story, Peter God tells Curtis that his wife has learned of his innocence and begs his forgiveness. But he cannot ask her to come and share his exile, the exile of a hunted murderer. Curtis must go back and marry her and make her happy. Joyous in the knowledge that Josephine is to be his wife, Curtis nurses Peter God loyally. But his hopes are momentarily crushed when Josephine turns up, determined to spend the rest of her days with her husband. Peter God, however, dies, and the reader is permitted to imagine the rest of the story.

This was Mr. Curwood's story, and I thought it was a mighty good one. But the first thing I decided was that the finish was wrong—that is, wrong for pictures. Peter God should live. It meant a happier ending, and I think we should all strive to bring about happy endings in our stories, providing we do not force them, or make them appear illogical. Throughout the picture, as I visualized it, Peter God would have the warm sympathy of his audience. He had tried to do right—he exposed a grafter—and for a reward he was framed up, he lost his friends, he lost his wife, and for many years was forced to live the life of a hunted rat. Then Fate, apparently not yet satisfied, gave him smallpox. It certainly looked like rubbing it in to kill him, when he could just as easily live and spend his remaining years with the wife he loved so dearly. So I decided to end the story with the reunited couple in that little room of pestilence, now transformed into a paradise, and fade out on Curtis outside the cabin looking in the window, the nobility of his soul rising in his face, as the shadows of disappointment pass away. So you see, before I thought of anything else, I wrote my final scenes. Then I sat down and coolly analyzed my story. I was looking for inconsistencies, the bane of so many picture stories. The first one, it seemed to me, was the fact that Peter God seemed to be so well known at the post; he was entered on the books of the Hudson Bay Company; people were talking about him in drinking places; and yet his wife, who had been searching for him for six years, could not locate his whereabouts. It seemed to me that if she had a hunch that he was in the northwest, a line to any of the posts up there would eventually reveal his hiding place. Why must she conveniently go to a drinking place, and conveniently hear some one sitting at a nearby table, very conveniently talking about her husband?

Inconsistency Number Two seemed even worse. We have a woman who is anxiously seeking her husband. She suddenly learns where he is. Does she go to him immediately, or try to get in touch with him? No. She just tarries long enough to let another man fall in love with her, and propose. Then her interest is suddenly and magically reawakened in her husband, and she begs her suitor to go to him at once with a letter.

Inconsistency Number Three was, why should a woman who apparently loved her husband so devotedly permit another man to make love to her at all? She must have known, and yet she permitted it to go on.

Inconsistency Number Four was the presence of a Bible on the desk of a grafting politician, and very conveniently opened at the Book of Peter. This incident, I knew, would get a big laugh if thrown on the screen.

I had to iron out these creases before I could do anything else. After some thought, I felt that perhaps I could overcome Inconsistency No. 1 if I made Peter God a sort of half-wild hermit, who lived miles away from civilization and far from the trails. He made no visits to the post. He visited no one. He just shot and killed enough to live on. Naturally, in this way, he was known to very few people, and it would be hard to locate him from a distance.

Inconsistency No. 2 could only be overcome by developing some condition that would render it absolutely impossible for anyone to reach Peter God for some time after his wife first met Curtis. This would give him a chance to fall in love with her while the search was being held up. By covering the trails, by making Peter God's cabin impossible to reach until the thaw set in and the trails were uncovered, I overcame this obstacle.

Inconsistency No. 3 was the most difficult of all, and I don't feel even now that I have done much with it. But I argued that if I could have Curtis perform some great service for the lady at the very beginning, rescue her from death, say, she would naturally be inclined to view his visits with kindly interest, and this interest might be misinterpreted by him for receptiveness to his suit.

Inconsistency No. 4, the Bible incident, was easily disposed of by having Peter God write his letter at some other place.

Having disposed of these inconsistencies as well as I could, I next turned to footage. As I mentally visualized my story, I could see two good reels, but never five. Where would I get my other three reels? I read it again and stopped at the point where Peter God tells his story to Curtis, of the frame-up. Why couldn't I tell this part of the narrative in action instead of titles? I could elaborate it as much as I pleased, and it would get over if it was interesting. Why couldn't I show my audience the honest reformer, his devoted wife, the grafting politician, the beautiful adventuress, on the screen? The exposure of the politician, the baiting of the trap, the progress of the conspiracy, would all be interesting, if it was done cleverly and in some novel and unhackneyed way. The springing of the trap would develop other situations, thrills, pathos, and more thrills. All of this material I would have to write in myself, because Curwood only hinted at it.

There was one more obstacle before I could start on the scenario. How did Curtis come to meet Peter God, the half-wild hermit? Why couldn't the men meet in some novel way near Peter God's cabin? I recalled having read at some time or other of a trapper who, deserted by his guide, was lost in the wilderness and was later caught in a bear trap. As he fainted he had sufficient presence of mind to draw his pistol and fire it three times, in a sort of desperate effort to attract attention. A lone trapper heard the shots, rescued him and nursed him back to health. This incident would fit into my story very nicely, so I used it.

Having smoothed out the inconsistencies, having built up my footage, I was now ready to go to work and assemble my material. There were two or three ways of telling the story, but I was looking for the most effective method, and I do not think anyone will dispute the statement that the most effective way of handling any melodrama is the one which employs the greatest suspense. Once your audience is permitted to scent the development of your story, it loses interest, no matter how entertaining your story may be. I argued that if I started my story with the honest reformer and his wife it would be interesting, but I wanted more mystery, more suspense. So I decided to start my picture with a thrilling rescue of a beautiful, mysterious woman by Curtis, a trapper. This gave me a punch right at the beginning. After the rescue, Curtis and the stranger become friends. A limp prompts him to tell the story of the bear trap and a half-wild hermit, Peter God. The lady grows agitated and excited at the mention of Peter God, and tells Curtis she is seeking the man, she wants to get a message to him at once. She is downcast when told that this is impossible until the thaw sets in. Curtis thinks Peter God a black-sheep brother. He falls in love with the lady, but when he proposes, she tells him he must take a message to Peter God, and that his answer will decide Curtis' fate. Then follows his long trip into the wilderness, his temptation to destroy the letter, his arrival at the cabin, Peter God's story, told in interposes, his illness, Josephine's arrival at the cabin, and the finish as I have already told it to you.

Of course every story does not present the same difficulties, nor involve the same work as this one did. Some stories seem to lend themselves beautifully to screen adaptation.

A rumor along Broadway says that Edwin Thanhouser has induced pretty little Gladys Hulette to sign a contract for a series of Thanhouser Classics, which means that the clever ingenue will now appear in five-reel productions exclusively.

Fame Presented to Seventeen-Year-Old

William Fox has discovered a new young beauty, with the laughingest eyes and the sunniest smile ever filmed, has "tested" her carefully before the camera and deliberately told this little her that he will make her more famous than any girl has ever been made before in the film world. She is little Miss June Caprice, seventeen years old.

June Caprice, the star whom Fox will make famous.

Mr. Fox commissioned six representatives to go forth into the highways of American life and find him the most typical smiling, happy little beauty without experience.

"See that you find for me a natural, graceful, pretty girl without affectations or mannerisms; a girl who is winsome, happy, who lives with her parents or is off studying somewhere in a girls' school. When you think you have found the most remarkable girl you ever saw bring her to me. We will give a long and adequate test to the theory that prevails throughout America that youth, beauty and grace backed by good plays can make a star of the first magnitude out of a girl of whom the public has never heard."

June Caprice is the girl who answered all the requirements.

Her home is in Boston, she was born in Arlington. She is young, beautiful, has the beauty and loveliness of the Mary Pickford who first attracted screen attention throughout the world and has been mistaken for Miss Pickford wherever she went in her native Bostonian habitat.

Here is a girl of whom you have never heard before.

This is the first photograph of her ever printed. Behind this little beauty William Fox intends to place all of the mechanism and all of the facilities of his many-million-dollar corporation. She will be made known to you through famous artists, she will sit for great painters, she will be the toast of the studios and of admirers of beauty in every city and town where people are to be found who know and appreciate the beautiful when they see it.

Paramount Made Unusual Display

Among the most attractive booths at the exposition of the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America was that of the Paramount Company. This booth was designed by Professor Hoffman of Vienna, who was the teacher of Joseph Urban.

The booth was divided into three distinct sections, the center section being finished in solid black, relieved with white and gold, and the two end sections being in white and black, with trimmings of gold and green. The center section was used for the distribution of souvenirs and literature pertaining to Paramount productions, including the Famous Players Film Company, the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, Morosco and Pallas Pictures, together with the South American Travel Pictures, Burton Holmes Travel Pictures, Pictographs and Bray Cartoons.

One of the end booths served as a reception room, where the various stars held receptions, while the other was luxuriously furnished with comfortable chairs and divans and served as a lounging room. The Paramount planned special events for every day. On Monday, which was Cartoon Day, J. R. Bray, originator of the famous Col. Heeza Liar, was present, as was C. Allan Gilbert, L. M. Glackens, C. T. Anderson, Paul Terry, Clarence Higby and Earl Hurd. These artists demonstrated the marvelous technique required to give to the public pen and ink drawings which live on the screen.

The Paramount Pictograph Department was represented at the booth on Tuesday and many of the contributors to this animated magazine were present. Wednesday was Better Babies Day at the Paramount Booth. A special reel, consisting of the Better Babies section of the Paramount Pictographs, was shown and many of the tiny actors and actresses themselves attended.

Thursday was set aside as Paramount-Day and the stars of the Western Paramount studios held forth at the Paramount Booth. Friday, the stars of the Eastern and Western studios met and Saturday was devoted to school children and souvenirs of Col. Heeza Liar, Miss Nanny Goat and other screen caricatures were distributed.

Exhibitor Cole Active at Expositions

Mr. Cole reports the state organization in good condition, Greater New York being solidly organized and locals recruiting members in numerous localities throughout the state.

Mr. Cole is also vice-president of the Cinema Exhibitors' Association of Bronx County, Greater New York Local No. 2, M. P. E. L. of A. Thomas H. Ince in New York

Thomas H. Ince and a staff of his aides left Los Angeles on May 10 for a trip to New York City. A short stop was made in Chicago on Sunday.

The nature of the business upon which the noted Kay Bee-Triangle producer is engaged has not been announced, but it is easy to hazard the guess that the coming New York presentation of his big spectacle, "Civilization," and the new Triangle-Famous Players-Lasky merger has something to do with the trip.

In addition to his consular duties, Mr. Lawton has been attempting to persuade Honduras exhibitors to use American-made films instead of those manufactured in France, which have in the past been used almost exclusively.

"BRADY-MADE" PRODUCTIONS

World Film Corporation Offers Eight Stars in Five New Productions Personally Supervised by William A. Brady

William A. Brady of the World Film Corporation has personally supervised the production of five features to be released in May.

Chief among these is "The Feast of Life," a Chautard production starring Clara Kimball Young. This play, which was staged in the interior of Cuba, was released May 1.

Kitty Gordon appears in "Her Maternal Right," which was staged by John Ince under Mr. Brady's supervision. This play, which was written by Willard Mack, is replete with tense and picturesque situations, and was released on May 8.

On May 15 was offered Robert Warwick in "Sudden Riches," based on a story by E. Richard Schayer. This play affords Mr. Warwick ample opportunity to display both his talent and attire, as it calls for versatility and a varied wardrobe.

"Tangled Fates," to be released May 22, is featuring Alice Brady. This is a very strong story and gives Miss Brady a good opportunity to display her dramatic talents.

On May 29 Millie King will make her second appearance on the World program in "Fate's Boomerang," which was staged in the mountain country about North Carolina and Tennessee.

The list of forthcoming releases following the last week in May includes among other noted stars, Carlyle Blackwell, Gerda Holmes, Holbrook Blinn, Ethel Clayton, Robert Warwick, Clara Whipple, Muriel Ostriche, Frank Sheridan, Edna Wallace Hopper and House Peters. Mr. Peters, now permanently with World Film, will characterize that program about seven times a year, while Gail Kane will be seen at equal periods.

Many of the stars of the World corporation were legitimate stage stars and are constantly receiving offers to return to the stage.

Robert Warwick formerly played with Grace George and she is trying to persuade him to sign for the 1916-17 season, but as yet nothing definite has been decided, because Mr. Warwick feels he cannot appear on the stage and screen and do both of them justice, and he leans strongly toward the screen. Five productions have been arranged for Mr. Warwick, the first of which will be "Friday, the 13th," work on which will be started at once.

Holbrook Blinn will divide his time between the stage and the studio. A theater is now being erected in New York to be called the Holbrook Blinn theater, where Mr. Blinn will not only be the principal player, but will stage and direct the productions. Besides his stage appearance, Mr. Blinn will appear about eight times a year on the World program.

Alice Brady has had several offers to star in stage productions, but has refused all offers calling for her possible absence from the studio, having definitely decided to remain in the motion picture field.

Gail Kane, who came from the legitimate stage to the pictures, has also refused all offers calling for a division of her time, as she has decided to stick to pictures for at least three years.

William A. Brady of the World Film Corporation does not seem opposed to the World stars appearing at the same time on the stage, providing it does not interfere with their studio engagements.

Theater Monopoly Upheld

The right of motion picture distribution firms to refuse to sell to more than one theater in a city has been upheld by the Federal Trade Commission.

The question was raised in the application of a theater manager against a distributing house, which, he charged, had sold exclusive rights in a film to his competitor in the same city. The commission held that in the absence of intent to accomplish an unlawful purpose, neither the Trade Commission act nor the Clayton act had been violated.

Edwin August Finishes Play

Edwin August has just completed for the World Film Corporation the motion picture production, "The Perils of Divorce," with Edna Wallace Hopper, Frank Sheridan and an all-star supporting cast, including Alec. B. Francis, Macey Harlan, Frank Beamish and Ruby Hoffman. The picture is scheduled for early release.

Circumstances alter contracts in the motion picture business but it is seldom that the President of the United States takes a hand in upsetting picture plans. Here is one case, however, in which the Lubin company must wait until Uncle Sam gets through with a star before producing a photoplay already contracted for. The star is one Villa who, some time ago, signed to appear in a Lubin feature, the work on which was to have been started last March. Since that time, however, Villa has been too busy dodging news cameramen to settle down in a selected location for any one company.

The complete process of manufacturing newsprint paper from the cutting and hauling of spruce logs, through the process of grinding into pulp and then the manufacture into half-ton rolls of newspaper and finally showing the finished product, the daily newspaper, in the hands of the consumer constitutes an interesting picture by the Rothaker Film Company.

"The Eternal Sapho"

Five-Reel Fox Drama Featuring Theda Bara. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE excellent fashion of telling the story is one of the noteworthy phases of this William Fox release of May 8. The attention is captured and the imagination stirred by the first picture on the screen, a beautiful, poetic photograph of city streets, traffic filled. Through this is presented a picture of the heroine, who is a child of the slums. These effects and the manner of covering a large number of events by means of short scenes which dissolve into one another may be credited to the director, Bertram Bracken. Instead of being confusing, these scenes are pleasant and give the effect of swift, clear action.

Theda Bara has a following sufficiently loyal to be interested in a picture principally for her sake; while there are other people who avoid the type of play in which she usually appears. In this play, in which Miss Bara appears first as a ragged urchin, a sullen, hateful sort of a girl, and later as an adventuress, her work is consistent and interesting throughout and she wins sympathy rather than dislike, although, true to form, she breaks up a happy home before the story is finished. However, in this case she does it unwittingly and later repairs the damage.

The story itself, while it becomes melodramatic and has a number of conventional elements, and while it is tragic, is not offensive and avoids suggestive scenes. The early part of the play, the scenes of life in the slums, the drunken father, the invalid mother and the ragged girl, are the most interesting and unusual.

Laura, the girl, is given by her father to an artist and she wins fame as the model for his best known statue, of Sapho. She attracts the attention of two men, one of them married, unknown to her. She wins his love, but when she discovers that he has a wife and child, she visits his home, with the other man. There she falls in love with the little daughter of the house, and for her sake severs connections with the father. Kittens Reichert as the little girl is remarkably good. She is more than a pretty child, for she shows talent and that quality vaguely referred to as "personality." Her role in the play is certain to attract favorable attention.

The other man really loves Laura and wishes to marry her, but this is prevented when he learns that she was implicated in the murder of his father, although as this scene was shown, she had been nothing more than an onlooker. She returns to the artist, to find him a suicide because of jealousy.

While the story is marred by so many of these sensational events and coincidences, the picture holds attention in spite of them, largely because, as stated before, the direction and the acting are good.

The cast includes Frank Norcross, Warner Oland, George MacQuarrie, Walter Lewis, Hattie Delaro, John Drummond, Einar Linden and Mary Martin.

"The Girl with the Green Eyes"

Pathe Gold Rooster Play Released May 15. Reviewed by George W. Graves

FOR a genuine feature picture that is elaborately produced and exceptionally well acted, one has to go no further than "The Girl with the Green Eyes." Clyde Fitch's play is followed closely throughout and the big scenes and big situations are handled with the utmost skill. A most pleasing thing about this play is that it is consistent and a clear depiction of what happens in actual life. The fast and clear action carries with it excitement and "punch" in every new development and tense situation.

In all this the convincing acting of Katharine Kaelred and Julian L'Estrange have an enormous part. It is enough to say that each acts exactly the way one of his sex and one of like temperament would under the circumstances. Such admirable portrayals as these co-stars afford are not to be encountered any too often on the screen. In support of Katharine Kaelred and Julian L'Estrange a very strong cast has been provided. The picture was produced by Popular Plays and Players.

To be sure, this is a sociological drama, as so many of the present-day releases are, but its intelligent treatment of the more subtle phases of the human mind raises it above the commonplace. It is a real study of human nature—not a mere display of the blind acts inculcated by headlong animal nature.

The story starts with the petty, jealous regard a wife has for her husband, who is a popular actor, and comes to its climax when this same jealousy, fanned by continual misunderstanding, almost leads the unenlightened husband to commit murder. The wife, believing she has evidence of her husband's faithlessness, encourages the attentions of "the other man," while "the other woman" is in reality only the husband's sister. Her child is fatherless—and thus the secrecy. It finally develops that "the other man" is the cur who has turned deserter and things end with justice to all, both wife and husband experiencing a much needed transformation.

"The End of the World"

Great Northern's Spectacular Offering. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

NICELY connected with a story containing interesting incidents and characters, the huge fire and flood scenes, which make "The End of the World" a spectacular production of exceptional appeal, certainly were not staged, and they are used to depict the fanciful idea on which this picture is based. The flood and conflagration are the outcome of disturbances caused by the proximity of a comet to the Earth. Experience will only tell just what would happen if a comet came in contact with the earth, but we are perfectly willing to listen to the speculations of astronomers and see them depicted on the motion picture screen. Our curiosity is not great enough to make us long to see the real thing.

"The End of the World" is a Great Northern Film production and, quite like the majority of high class European pictures, there is excellence in taste and technique in the matters of settings and photography. The production has that finished quality which comes with care and thoroughness in the studio. This six reel offering should prove popular in this country.

The story which leads up to the spectacular scenes concerns itself with a mine owner who later becomes a power in the stock exchange. He is attracted by a girl who lives in the mining town and though she is engaged to one of the miners, he induces her to elope with him. The deserted lover is bitter and swears he will be avenged. Anna and her husband are happy and his ability as a banker enables him to give her every luxury. Harper's cousin is an astronomer. He discovers a comet in the heavens and calculates that it will soon come within the earth's orbit. This discovery and Whitmark's calculations as to the disturbances which will result are published and cause the people grave concern.

The stock market slumps and Harper, confident that all will be well, buys to the full extent of his credit. He consults his cousin and learning that true conditions are to be withheld from the public, has an article published which reassures the people and booms the market. On the eve of the predicted calamity Harper entertains lavishly. When disaster comes he and Anna perish in the underground passage in which they sought safety. Anna's sister is one of the few who were within the danger zone to survive the destructive elements.

The romance is interesting and gives more strength to the scenes of fire and flood. The players are well suited to their roles and each carries the spectator's sympathy. Emma Thomson is the featured player. The exterior scenes showing the comet in the sky are indeed remarkable.

"The Snow Cure"

Ford Sterling in Triangle-Keystone Comedy. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

DIRECTED by Arvid E. Gillstrom, "The Snow Cure" is a Keystone comedy which goes to the top of this company's high mark in procuring laughs with tricks of the camera. "The Snow Cure" is not more than averagely good until Ford Sterling, as the born flirt, enters the establishment of a doctor who guarantees to cure any ailment. The mainstay of the cure is a lively bear and just a short distance in front of his lumbering but rather fleet form all the patients, sufferers of obesity, gout and old age, find themselves suddenly gifted with the power to run, climb telegraph poles and swim in icy waters.

The bear is easily one of the best actors in the picture. Were it not for him the inmates of the sanatorium would never have climbed the telegraph pole or started a race in mid-air along a path of tightly strung wires, and then "The Snow Cure" would have been without one of its funniest moments.

Another typical Keystone feature of this picture is the collection of patients discovered in the cure resort. They are the most amusing lot of fat and lean ailing people we ever saw in a picture. Ford Sterling is the flirt who makes things interesting for himself and the couple living across the hall. They meet again in the mountains, so the jealous husband becomes more than ever suspicious. Marie Manley is the wife, Fritz Shade the husband and Alice Davenport and James Donnelly complete the cast. It takes "The Snow Cure" some time to get started but once under way it is surely diverting.

"Sudden Riches"

A New World-Peerless Photo-Drama in Six Parts Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman

THERE is a new note sounded in this six-part drama, even though it is largely conventional in its working out. It is not often that one thinks of satisfying hate for another person by giving that other person money. The logic of such a thing, however, is shown in this production, even though it be the logic of a vindictive mind.

It is a case where an old multi-millionaire died and left his nephew a million dollars because he hated the nephew. The uncle's object was revenge. He knew that such sudden wealth would be the ruination of his nephew, and his calculation was very nearly correct. In this younger days the old miser uncle and his brother had been in love with the same girl. She chose his brother and was never forgiven by the man she disappointed.

When the son grew up he made a success as an architect, and the old uncle tried to tempt him into crooked paths by the lure of money. The young nephew did not fall for this bait, so when the old man died he willed him a million dollars, expressing the hope that it would be his ruination.

It nearly was the young man's ruination, and it came near breaking up his family. In the end he saw where he and his family were far happier when they were in moderate circumstances than they ever were after they inherited money. The picture closes with their decision to return to their former happy home. Robert Warwick appears in the prologue as the brother who won the girl, and later he appears as the son. His part inclines largely to that of a heavy, and he plays it with the usual Warwick skill.

Gerda Holmes played opposite Mr. Warwick as the son's wife, and her rendition of the part of a self-indulgent society woman is one of the best things she has done of late.

Both Mr. Warwick and Miss Holmes, however, took the short end of the honors from little Miss Madge Evans, a child actress of unusual cleverness. The little girl played a prominent part and one that required considerable talent. She was the little daughter of the two newly rich parents. Her work was really an element of brightness all through the picture and it is certain to be admired by everyone who sees it.

The stage settings are unusually elegant and bear out the idea of wealth. It may be that they are almost too elegant for newly rich people, but that is a case where the benefit of the doubt must go in their favor, because it can be presumed that they were of sufficient good breeding to know what was required in a high-class establishment.

Aside from the curious idea of obtaining revenge by showering a man with wealth, the story is quite conventional and the principal pleasure in it is to be found in the way in which it is done. The actors are all more than ordinarily competent, and the direction of Mr. Emile Chautard is so well and favorably known that it is almost a guarantee of a good production.

As usual in conventional plays, the stock market is instrumental in bringing disaster where disaster seems to be the remotest thing in the world. It seemed to the self-centered parents of the little girl that money was verything that could be desired in this world. It was not until the careless nursemaid gave the little girl an overdose of paregoric that the parents really began to see how far they had gone astray in their mad quest for happiness. The dangerous illness of the little daughter opened their eyes to the fact that Wall street and society are empty things in comparison with the contentment and the joy of simple living.

The photography and light effects have a distinctly beneficial influence upon the production, imparting to it the class that the Peerless pictures have come to possess. It comes from the studio a finished piece of work in all departments, and is a feature for all classes, teaching a lesson in happiness both to the rich and to the poor.

"Into the Primitive"

Selig Red Seal Play Released Through V. L. S. E. May 29. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

PERHAPS as long as there are picture plays or narratives of any sort, stories in which the actors are placed on desert islands will be popular, not because the incident occurs very frequently in real life, but because it furnishes a situation in which the real character of the people may be revealed, unsupported and unhampered by the trappings of civilization. We have become so accustomed to this method of "showing up" real goodness and badness that when, in this play, directed by T. N. Heffron from a story by Robert Ames Bennet, the leading characters are, without much explanation, washed onto a deserted shore, we merely say, "Well, what about it?" and watch with interest the result.

The three characters in the play are Jenny Leslie, a society woman, played by Kathlyn Williams; Thomas Blake, a civil engineer, Guy Oliver; and the Honorable Cecil Winthrope, Harry Lonsdale. The play sets about to show that at heart the engineer, introduced as a drunkard, called in a subtitle a "caveman," is superior to the "gentleman." In the end, however, the so-called gentleman confesses that he is an imposter and is really the valet of the man whose title he assumed.

There are a number of very beautiful scenic effects introduced in the telling of the story. Several scenes of a tropical storm are realistic and interesting, while many of the jungle and seacoast pictures are of remarkable beauty. The wild animals of the tropical forest which constantly endanger the lives of the explorers add to the suspense of the story.

However, the story itself is not as interesting as the theme would warrant. For one thing, the characters do not win sympathy, partly because, in the case of the two men, they seem overdrawn, partly because we know little of their lives before they were placed in the strange surroundings. Our interest would have been quickened had we known them as well as we knew the characters placed in a rather similar position in the photoplay "Thou Shalt Not Covet."

The three survivors of the wreck, led by the engineer, Blake, explore the island, and although the girl believes that Winthrope is her real protector, it is through the skill of the engineer that the three manage to exist among the dangers of wild life. Blake saves himself and companions from various perils and gradually the girl realizes his worth and the treachery of Winthrope. For a long time she fears the wrong man, and at one point in the play plots with Winthrope to kill Blake. This is the turning point of the narrative and an important scene. Unfortunately, the suspense here is destroyed by a poorly placed subtitle, for before Winthrope creeps, weapon in hand, upon his sleeping rival, we have been told that he is to lose his nerve.

Finally Winthrope is killed in a storm, and before death confesses that he was an impostor. Blake then tells his story, of the events which led to his becoming a drunkard. The girl is led to admire and sympathize with him, and by the time a rescuing ship arrives at the island she has fallen in love with him.

"Who's Guilty?"

First Episode of Arrow-Pathe Series. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

MARKING as it does the beginning of a series of fourteen episodes devoted to the depiction of certain phases of our social scheme on the motion picture screen, "Puppets of Fate" is a two-reel picture drama that will undoubtedly win a vast following for the future releases in the "Who's Guilty?" series. Now, when photoplay fans are clamoring for good dramatic offerings in two reels or three reels, instead of two or three subjects padded out to make up the overworked five, the time seems opportune for just such pictures as the "Who's Guilty?" series will present. We say it will present, because the first episode gives every assurance that such will be the case.

The first episode of a series permits one to calculate and see into the future with much more accuracy than the serial. The author of this story, which concerns itself with a not commonplace idea and develops it dramatically, is the same as the one who will or has prepared the stories for the other thirteen episodes. The director who has shown himself in the "Puppets of Fate" to be able in every particular to the intelligent, forceful and artistic visualization of a play for the screen, will be responsible for the later releases. The acting comes next. Anna Nilsson and Tom Moore were a judicious choice. They are both admirably suited to the requirements of such roles as plays of this kind will present them with; so there is every good reason to believe that the following episodes in the "Who's Guilty?" series will measure up to the first, and nothing more is necessary to the attainment of brilliant success for this Pathe offering.

Produced by the Arrow Film Corporation for the Pathe Exchange, this series aims to depict dramatically and realistically the true-to-life consequences arising from the weaknesses in our social organization, both laws and customs, and the flaws in our characters. "Puppets of Fate" tells of a physician who disregards the ethics of his profession when his wife asks him to perform the operation her condition necessitates. His infatuation for a woman who deliberately sets out to win his affection is directly the cause of the falter of his hand at the critical moment and its fatal outcome to the patient. At the end the spectator finds it difficult to place more blame for the tragedy on one character than another. One can ponder long over the words which fade into the final scene.

The settings in this picture, all of them, take their place with the most appropriate we have ever come across in photoplay offerings. They are convincing. As the director of "Puppets of Fate," Howell Hansel deserves no end of praise. It is an excellent piece of motion picture production. Anna Nilsson is the wife, and Tom Moore plays Dr. Bullard. Both please greatly and head a cast of consistent strength. Mrs. Wilson Woodrow is the author of the story, and whoever put it in scenario form also deserves honorable mention.

"The Innocent Lie"

Five-Part Famous Players-Paramount Offering. Reviewed by George W. Graves

"THE Innocent Lie" is a mighty interesting photodramatic tale told amidst appropriate and artistic settings. Some of the latter, by way of interest, were furnished by Bermudian scenery. The greatest attraction of the picture, though, is Valentine Grant, who plays an Irish character to perfection. Her acting is done with great spontaneity and she proves her talents in the way of exciting laughter as well as sympathy.

The only drawback to the story seems to be a little unnecessary detail at the outset concerning the fortunes of Nora's brother, with which action the story has little to do. The story has the needed interest-holding qualities and it makes very good all round entertainment. It was written by Lois Zellner and produced under the direction of Sidney Olcott.

Nora O'Brien's brother, Pat, in America, sends for her to come to him, and she leaves her old home and sets out for America after bidding farewell to her other brother, who has enlisted in the army. Nora Owen, left alone in the world, is sent for by her rich aunt in America, but her lover persuades her to remain with him and accept his heart and home. Nora Owen meets her friend, Nora O'Brien on the way to the steamer and gives her the address of her wealthy aunt, Mrs. Watson, and asks her to see the lady at once on her arrival and inform her of her niece's decision to remain in Ireland and marry.

Once in America, Nora O'Brien meets with an injury which results in a slight concussion of the brain. The address of Mrs. Watson is found upon her and at this point fate changes her whole life. Mrs. Watson takes the girl for her niece and showers luxuries upon her. Meanwhile Nora's conscience is put to silence by the happiness and love that is forced upon her. Mrs. Watson's son, Jack, returns from college and he takes a great interest in his Irish cousin.

Fate now brings about a meeting between Nora and Pat and Nora decides to go and live with her brother. Jack follows her to Pat's lodgings and saves her from the brutal attacks of Pat's room-mate. The truth at last comes out concerning Nora's true identity, but she has become so beloved of the Watson family that they cannot let her go. Relations between Jack and Nora indicate a happy wedding in the future.

"Alien Souls"

Lasky-Paramount Offering Presents Sessue Hayakawa. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

AS the Japanese merchant, who, with his betrothed, would become American in customs and ideals, in "Alien Souls." Sessue Hayakawa lives up to the faith the Lasky Company put in him when it was decided to star him in a photoplay following his much remarked performance in "The Cheat." Hayakawa is a colorful actor and his playing in "Alien Souls" is extremely satisfying. There is vigor and zest to his acting but none of it is forced. He gives strength to the dramatic scenes in which he figures without going to extremes in gesture or facial expression.

The cast in support of Sessue Hayakawa is a consistently good one. Tsuru Aoki has the leading feminine role and plays it acceptably, while Earl Foxe is wholly commendable as the society idler and Grace Benham does splendidly. Hayakawa, however, stands well out from this good cast. His only rival for feature honors in this picture is the production of the story.

Unlike the acting and the production, the story has little that warrants praise. Hector Turnbull wrote the story especially for Sessue Hayakawa and Margaret Turnbull scenarioized it. The opening scenes give high hopes but gradually a theme of imposing dimensions, that of East is East and West is West, etc., is lost in a melodrama which deals with an American villain's attempt to get the Japanese girl's reported fortune. Through the first four reels the story is an aid to the players in making the picture strongly interesting but thereafter it is all up to the cast to keep one entertained.

The interiors of Sakata's place of business as well as those of his home are remarkably good and so too are the scenes taking place at the country club. In production, acting and photography "Alien Souls" is an exceptional offering.

"The Saving of Dan O'Mara"

Episode 11 of "The Iron Claw" Released May 8. Reviewed by George W. Graves

DAN O'MARA, a woodworker in the Applewaithe factories, is engaged in a dishonest enterprise, and Legar, or The Iron Claw, uses this man's daughter as his tool to get Margery Golden into his power. The girl, to save her father from being exposed by Legar, complies with the latter's wishes by luring Margery to the factories.

A true horror is provided in this episode when Legar gets Margery Golden into the sluice room of the factory and tells the cowering girl that presently even her own father will not be able to recognize her. Then he pushes Margery into the log-mangling sluiceway and she is impelled by a swift current towards the merciless machinery. But—the saving hand of The Laughing Mask is as active as ever, and he snatches the girl from the very jaws of death.

This particular episode is handled in a very melodramatic manner and the action is quite convincing and plausible. The members of the cast are at their best in this episode and it is very evident that Pearl White has lost none of her charms. Neither could one wish for a more villainous villain than is incorporated in the part Sheldon Lewis plays, as the vengeful Iron Claw. The other featured player in this series is Creighton Hale, who plays the part of the resourceful secretary. The fact that "The Iron Claw" is making an unqualified success with the public is shown by the clamor that it be extended to twenty episodes.

"The Floorwalker"

First Mutual-Chaplin Comedy Released May 15. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

UNLIKE the athlete who requires training to reach the top of his form after a rest, Charlie Chaplin returned to the studio following a vacation during which he had nothing to do but listen to salary offers, and in good time completed a two-reel comedy which, when screened, showed him to be in the pink of his fun making condition.

Using all the available material for comedy business a department store boasts, and it is considerable, and adding a few of his own deft strokes, Chaplin succeeded in producing a comedy that will come up to the expectations of his host of followers, as high as those expectations are.

The slapstick comedian's material has great limitations, but Chaplin can do things that have been done time and time again and still be funny while doing them. When "The Floorwalker" is shown at the various theaters it will be found that he will get his biggest laugh while performing on the escalator, and yet it is probable that the majority in the audience have seen comedians on escalators in many other screen comedies.

The amount of comic business he goes through on the escalator is remarkable; the episode is highly diverting even if the idea is now somewhat old. Those who insist on novelty will find it in certain parts of this Mutual-Chaplin release.

In this picture Chaplin has an opportunity to become a "Czar of the Aisles," in other words he accepts a job as floorwalker in a department store. The manager attempts to rob the safe and there is much ado about the bag containing the reams of engraved paper. Just what "The Floorwalker" is all about does not make much difference, its two reels are punctuated with laughs of number and quality to suit the fans. Edna Purviance is the most attractive of the supporting cast and the others are good.

"The Oath of Hate"

Knickerbocker Feature Released on General Program Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE restoration of mind, or sight or limb-power by nervous shock is somewhat of a favorite with motion picture producers, but the fact it has done duty in many photoplays does not detract from a well produced and interesting three-reel Knickerbocker Star Feature in which the main character regains his eye-sight following an attempt upon his life by a man who would square accounts with the blind sea captain by pushing him overboard.

"The Oath of Hate" is the story of a sailor who is deserted by his fiancee. He has a quick temper and enters the girl's house on the wedding day and reproaches both bride and groom to the consternation of the guests and the family, who are indignant with this sailor who offers to fight the new husband. Mark Stone is then discharged at the request of the bride's father. In an attempt to retaliate Mark injures himself and the result is that his injuries cause blindness. He marries a girl who works at the boarding house.

When a child is born and he learns it is a girl, Mark rushes from the house; he has sworn to rear any children sent him to hate the girl who jilted him and her husband, and a boy would be more to his liking than a girl for this purpose. Stone is cared for by a friend. Later the sailor whose enmity he has incurred seeks his revenge and in so doing tenders him an unwilling service. Mark regains his sight and in addition his normal state of mind. He is reunited with his wife and child, while the girl who jilted him is divorced from her husband in a state of unhappiness, looks upon Mark's felicity and that of his wife.

Henry King makes Mark Stone a fighting, boorish sort of fellow. On the whole his characterization is commendable. Marguerite Nichols is a very pleasing May Manning and Ethel Fleming does well with her part. "The Oath of Hate" was produced by Balboa and in photography and staging it is an entirely satisfactory offering. The story carries itself well, holding the interest consistently. "The Oath of Hate" measures up to the best standards of the Knickerbocker Star Features Company.

"The Courtesan"

American Mutual Masterpicture Released May 18. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS play, which was directed by Arthur Maude, written by William Parker, begins as an attempt to justify the life of Mayda St. Maurice, described as "a courtesan," on the ground of her love for her son. The role gives Eugenie Forde an opportunity for emotional acting, and she plays her part capably, without overdoing it. She is shown in the early scenes following closely the career of Glenn Manley, a young lawyer, who is her son and whom she has supported, although the boy believes that his parents are dead and that his income is from property he inherited.

The rest of the play shows a race for a political position between young Manley and Murdock Grandby, Jr., the son of a political boss. The Grandbys try to blacken the reputation of Manley when they learn of Mayda's interest in him. But the truth is at last revealed that Manley is Mayda's son and also that Grandby, Sr., is his father, for he had married Mayda under an assumed name and later deserted her.

The story is melodramatic throughout. The settings are elaborate. There is a great deal of excitement in the play and it holds the interest. The love element is furnished by the romance between the young lawyer and Betty Howard, a society girl, played by Nell Franzen.

While no part of the play can in any way be called suggestive or offensive, still the story is scarcely worth while enough to overcome the prejudice which members of the better class audiences have against a theme of this sort.

The roles are interpreted by a capable cast of players. Hal Cooley plays Manley, Charles Wheelock and William Carroll play the Grandbys, father and son. Al Fordyce plays the role of Mayda's lawyer.

"The Primal Lure"

William S. Hart in Romance of the Northwest. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE PRIMAL LURE," selected to be the feature on the program at the Rialto during the week of May 7, is a melodrama laid in the Northwest and dealing with a romance centering about the rugged factor, or manager of the post, a spirited Canadian girl and a smooth villain whose cowardice defeats his ambition to marry the girl for whose favor he has maliciously discredited the factor. Added to this and serving the purposes of melodramatic self-sacrifice, or the depiction of a willingness to suffer painful death on the part of the factor, there is an Indian incursion following their unheeded demand for the life of a white as an offering to the Great Spirit because a plague has been visited upon them.

William S. Hart makes his latest screen appearance as Angus McConnell, the factor. Mr. Hart makes McConnell a virile, strong charactered woodsman, with a determination that brooks no intereference. His is a praiseworthy character sketch, and, like the acting of Margery Wilson, is deserving of a story of more depth than this melodrama by Vingie E. Roe and J. G. Hawks. "The Primal Lure" provides good entertainment from the beginning, but this is attributable to some striking outdoor scenes and the acting.

The story tells of the factor's resolve to detect the person who has stolen his account book. Lois Le Moyne, the daughter of an old trapper, has prepared a surprise for McConnell, for whom she has great admiration. One can only sympathize with her, therefore when the factor accuses her of the theft when she slips into his office to place the embroidered mocasins in his desk. She bitterly resents this and is too indignant to even plead with him. McConnell puts her in the lock-up and tells her she will remain there until she returns the book.

A representative of the Hudson's Bay Company visits the post and because he is struck by the girl's beauty takes matters into his own hands and releases Lois. Then he has the factor discharged. McConnell does not leave, however, until he has administered a good beating to the cowardly Sylvester. To protect the trappers the former manager returns when the Indians threaten the post and his bravery, coupled with deliberateness, wins the girl's consent to marry him.

part much natural spirit and appeal. Robert McKim is the cowardly Richard Sylvester and Jerome Storm is happily cast as Pierre Vernaisse. The production has true atmosphere and any number of beautiful scenes.

"Jack Straws"

Rubin Three-Reel Drama Released May 18. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

HERE is another good story written by Josephine McLaughlin. Events are so cleverly dovetailed in a plausible fashion without overworking coincidence, and scenes are built up so dramatically, without too much artificiality, that one enjoys watching the unfolding of the plot. While following the play, one has a feeling that events might very easily have worked themselves out that way.

The story is aided greatly by the excellent acting of George Routh. It is seldom that a character of the sort he plays in this story—Travers—stands out so vividly. Travers is utterly worthless, and yet he is interesting because he seems to have possibilities of strength. He does not seem like a weakling. Routh, in this role, makes one interested in a character which, in the hands of a less skilled player, would be merely "the villain."

Lillian Harrington (Lucy Payton) marries Travers in the beginning of the story, against the wishes of her wealthy aunt, whose heiress she is. The aunt, Mrs. Harrington (Adelaide Bronti) warns Lillian that Travers is a fortune-hunter, and when she refuses to give him up, the aunt severs connections with her niece. In a short time Mrs. Harrington's predictions come true. Lillian is a neglected wife when Travers finds that she will not get money for him from her aunt. Later, Travers gambles away money not his and is put in jail.

Lillian secures a divorce and is reconciled with her aunt. She meets and becomes interested in Donald Kerwin, the brother of her friend Marjorie. Marjorie is engaged to Stuart Winthrop, the district attorney. Donald Kerwin, played by Alan Forrest, is another interesting character. He is by no means a conventional hero, in some respects being a weakling, but he is attractive.

When Travers is released, he becomes one of a gang of counterfeiters whom the district attorney is tracing. When Travers learns of the approaching marriage of Donald and Marjorie, he informs Donald of facts which seem to place her and the district attorney in an unpleasant light. Donald, who at the time is partially intoxicated, accuses Marjorie. Travers believes that Donald will shoot the district attorney, but instead, the attorney traps Travers and sends him to jail. And the other complications are at last straightened out.

The cast of players includes Cecil Van Auker as the attorney and Evelyn Page as Marjorie. The play was directed by Melvin Mayo under the supervision of Captain Wilbert Melville.

"Gloria's Romance"

"Lost in the Everglades," Chapter One of the George Kleine Serial. Reviewed by G. Harris

INTRODUCING Miss Gloria Stafford, who is to become a well-known and, we predict, very much loved personage during the coming months. Those who saw Billie Burke in "Peggy" need not be told that she is a delightful screen actress, that she photographs charmingly, that she has a manner which "gets across" particularly well in the little ways which give the final touch of reality to a characterization, and which are in some ways more effective on the screen than on the speaking stage. Those who saw "Peggy" have no fear for Miss Burke's part in the serial. And, judging by the crowds which filled the Studebaker theater on the day of the first showing of chapter one in Chicago, the audiences had little doubt that a pleasing, wholesome entertainment awaited them.

However, "Gloria" is not "Peggy." She is another creation, though just as captivating. She is a little sixteen-year-old girl, the daughter of the wealthy Pierpont Stafford who, when the story begins is spending the winter at Palm Beach. She has one brother, David, a governess, and a pet dog. She has a good friend in Dr. Royce, who works her algebra problems for her. He is a young physician attending Judge Freeman.

The serial begins more in the fashion of a continued magazine story than the motion picture serials with which we are familiar. This suggestion is strengthened by the introduction, in which the principal characters are introduced by animated portraits as the leaves of a novel, bearing the title, "Gloria's Romance," are turned.

There is no resisting the charm of Gloria because, as Miss Burke plays the role, it does not seek admiration. It is just the expression of a young creature who finds a great deal of fun in life. Miss Burke seems as unaffected and unconscious as any little girl who might steal away from her governess and play in the moonlight and whose only object is to be unobserved. Gloria, wandering along the deserted paths, notices her brother's automobile. Before he returns, with Lois Freeman, the judge's daughter, Gloria herself has gone for a spin which ends when she loses control of the car and drives it into the ocean. In trying to find her way back to the hotel, the little runaway becomes lost in the Everglades, where we leave her sleeping until the next chapter.

The settings and photography of the story are pleasing. The supporting cast is good. This includes Henry Kolker as Dr. Royce, who is to be the hero; William T. Carleton as Gloria's father, William Roselle as her brother David; Jule Power as Lois Freeman, in whom David is interested; Frank Belcher and David Powell. The story, as has been announced, is written by Mr. and Mrs. Rupert Hughes. Each chapter contains two reels, the first released May 22.

"Not My Sister"

Bessie Barriscale in Triangle-Ince Drama. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

UNUSUALLY attractive as to the grouping of the characters in scenes which have settings of singular tastefulness and beauty, "Not My Sister" has received treatment of a character that brings out the full dramatic power of the play at the hands of the cast and the director.

The play is by James Montgomery and C. Gardner Sullivan. It is a story of a type that has reached the screen many times in the past. This is so of both material and development, for the most part. "Not My Sister" is well constructed, however, and it is not commonplace picture drama.

Telling of a girl who poses for an artist when her family faces poverty and who becomes the victim of his brutal cunning, "Not My Sister" is a picture containing no few strong dramatic moments. While her marriage and the return of the artist after a few years of absolute happiness with the husband who lives in blissful ignorance of the outrage his wife has suffered, were things to be expected and came as no surprise, the play sustains the interest throughout. The story shows thoughtful planning and it convinces.

Heading a well chosen and capable cast, Bessie Barriscale gives a powerful and finished portrayal of Grace Tyler. Miss Barriscale does full justice to the part and the opportunities furnished by it. It is a performance of consistency and artistic strength. Undoubtedly the appeal of this picture is in a large way due to Miss Barriscale as Grace Tyler who, when the sculptor induced her younger sister to pose for him, determines to protect the young girl at whatever cost. The play reaches its climax in the court room where her husband is being tried for the murder of Arnold on the evidence of the butler who heard his master swear he would kill the artist after hearing his wife's confession.

The veil of doubt covering the identity of the person who killed Arnold is cleared when Grace's sister takes the stand and explains that she stabbed him when he attempted a repetition of his treatment of Grace. As played by Alice Taaffe Ruth, the younger sister, is a true-to-life character and a vastly appealing one.

William Desmond is quite satisfying as Michael Arnold and Franklin Ritchie and Louise Brownell complete the cast. Charles Giblyn is the director who has done so much to make "Not My Sister" a picture that will be found very interesting by the majority of adult picturegoers. A number of novel camera effects contribute to the finished balance of the picture.

"The Blindness"

Two-Reel Mustang Drama Released May 19. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

AN interesting story, pleasing settings beautifully photographed, and a capable cast of players make this picture a very acceptable offering. Carl Leviness directed the play from a scenario by Karl Coolidge in a manner to emphasize its natural, human phases and still to make it dramatic. There is a villain who seems to be entirely bad, but the other characters are very real. Joe and his motherless little daughter and Anna, the country school teacher, are genuine, "everyday" sort of people.

The romance between Joe and Anna begins in a simple, pleasing fashion and continues without much complication until Joe is enticed away in search of gold by his treacherous partner, Jim, who also loves Anna. While crossing a desert, the men are overtaken by a sandstorm which blinds Joe. Jim deserts his injured comrade and returns to Anna, declaring that Joe had died. But a company of Mexican horsemen arrive in time to rescue Joe and they take him to their home. For a time he is very ill, and he does not recover his sight.

In the meantime, Jim, who has learned that Joe is alive, tries to persuade Anna to marry him at once. Joe, believing that he is permanently blind, does not return. Anna is suspicious of Jim and one evening when he insists that she leave with him that night, Anna secretly sends the little girl for aid. Joe has been cured and he returns in time to reveal the treachery of his partner and to claim Anna.

The cast includes William Stowell as Joe, Roy Stewart as Jim, Dodo Newton as little Sal, Rhea Mitchell as Anna and Warren Ellsworth as a Mexican.

"The Jester"

Essanay Three-Reel Drama Released May 13. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

GERTRUDE GLOVER, a pleasing ingenue, new comer to the Essanay forces, is cast in this play as a girl reporter whose ridicule of a rich man's son turns him from a "jester" to an honest working man. Bob Blair (John Junior) spends his time and money in the way rich men's sons usually do, in pictures, at least, until he meets Jane Whitman, on the staff of a paper owned by a steel corporation inimical to his father's interests. John Blair, Bob's father, is waging a losing fight against the rival company, while his son is enjoying himself. After his change of heart, the son becomes one of the working men in his father's mills. Jane, sent out after another story regarding Bob, not only comes to admire the youth, but she also is able to detect a plot against Blair in which his own secretary is involved.

Bob himself straightens out the difficulties with the laboring men by beating up the trouble maker, who was in the employ of the rival company. Then Jane, who lost her position when her employers discovered her sympathy for the Blairs, is elected to fill the place of the secretary to Mr. Blair; the company is victorious in its contest with its rival and the story ends happily for all concerned.

John Junior's radiant smile is featured in a number of the scenes, especially in the one on the street car the morning he first goes to work. The story is told clearly, is interesting and wholesome. The most serious adverse criticism on the play regards the number of cut-backs repeated too often, which are also too long. It seems that the play could have been presented better in two reels.

"The Overcoat"

American Mutual Masterpicture Released May 8. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS play is a sincere and ambitious attempt to weave a human-interest story about two unfortunate members of society, one an ex-convict, the other a woman of the streets. Rea Berger is the director of the picture, for which J. Edward Hungerford wrote the story. The producers have very evidently wished their play to be sympathetic rather than sensational, and they have written the subtitles with this thought in mind. However, in these they have swung rather to the over-sentimental extreme, and this fact, with the inherent unwholesomeness of the subject, makes the early part of the play depressing.

The latter part, which shows regeneration of the young people through their mutual aid and belief, is much more pleasant. It becomes better as the two leave the shadows of their old lives, and the end of the play is very good. A strong scene ends the play, and the outcome is not obvious at any time.

Rhea Mitchell has a very difficult part to play, one which has infinite possibilities for an actress. She plays it sincerely and in her interpretation there is much to commend, although she does not play with much variety.

The story tells of the regeneration of Maurice Norton through the influence of Belle, a dance hall girl. Much of the early part of the play tells, by means of flash-back scenes, the early stories of their lives, and this part is conventional. Then the ex-convict takes a new hold on life, the girl gives up her former manner of living, and the couple are happy as working people. When the man begins to make good, his father hears of him and comes to him, offering him forgiveness. When the father asks him to choose between the girl who has aided him and his old life, he chooses to remain with the girl. Belle tries to convince him that she has tired of the relationship, but he understands her pretense as another case of self-sacrifice and will not accept it. So the play ends happily for the young people.

"Four Months"

Three-Reel "Flying A" Drama Released May 18. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

ALL the dangers which are supposed to lie in wait for a country girl alone in a big city are met by Vivian Rich in this play in her role of Bess, a struggling author with ideas on social reform. There are even a few additional temptations, for good measure, such as the millionaire masquerader's invitation to rob his safe.

A doctor's verdict that the hero has only four months to live forms the starting point of this melodramatic tale. Alfred Vosburgh plays Billy, the doomed millionaire, who decides to use his four remaining months on earth in searching for some one worthy of inheriting his wealth. His investigations form the theme of an interesting though not very plausible tale. Events move rapidly and the plot is in the main clear. The story holds the attention, and the ending is a good one, effectively presented.

Billy ventures into the slums in search of his worthy heir or heiress-to-be and there he unmasks a few crooks who, under the cloak of charity, are carrying out their nefarious schemes. He meets and saves from their plots a young thoress whom he decides could use his money well. His test of her honesty provides a few thrills and complications, but in the end he deeds her his property, only to discover that the doctor who allowed him four months was insane and that he is entirely well. He is not averse, however, to taking his fortune back when the girl comes with it.

Carl M. Le Viness directed the story, written by Karl Coolidge. George Periolat, Gerdina Bennett, William Tedmarsh and George Webb complete the capable cast.

"The Hard Way"

Three-Reel Selig Drama Released May 15. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE problems and temptations of a high school boy seldom form the theme of a serious drama. In "The Hard Way," a story by Russell E. Smith, produced by T. N. Heffron, Jack Pickford gives a good interpretation of a youth at the stage of life when the craving for adventure and freedom is strong in a nature which has not as yet lost its childlike qualities. The childishness under the surface bravado is emphasized in this characterization of Jack Ransom, and the truth and earnestness which Jack Pickford shows in handling the role make the play more worth while than does the story itself.

The large part of the action of the play takes place in a dream which the boy has after he has taken a few experimental steps along the path of mischief. So far Jack's misdeeds have been mere boyish foolery, but under the influence of his companion, Bert, the lad has a good chance of becoming enmeshed in evil. Troubled by his conscience, Jack dreams that he disobeys his father and goes joy-riding with Bert and two chorus girls. During the dream, Jack forges a note, wrecks his friend's car, killing one of the girls, steals his mother's jewels and pawns them, in a struggle kills his friend, and ends, a murderer, behind prison bars. Then he awakes, and is "not at home to Bert hereafter."

The best point of the story, which in many respects is conventional, is that, behind all the wild events, the pyschology of the dream is sound. Jack Pickford's acting has a genuine quality which denotes both talent and effort, and holds a promise of future brilliance.

The cast includes Harry Lonsdale, Lillian Hayward, Vivian Reed, Sidney Smith and James Bradbury.

"Caste"

"Ideal" Picture Play Produced by Turner Films. Reviewed by George W. Graves

THIS is a delightful English comedy-drama which has stood the test of time and which is now being offered in film form by the Ideal Film Renting Company, Ltd., with Sir John Hare in a most amusing character part. This venerable English favorite makes his first screen appearance in "Caste," and it is altogether a triumphant one, devoid of the marks of a screen novice. His well known characterization of Eccles, a devotee of the cups, "old and whiskered, with dingy silk hat, and a manner which is a curious mixture of hauteur and joviality," to quote from the expressive press book, registers splendidly in the pictures because of their close and faithful depiction of the required facial expressions.

The story, of a human sort, creates plenty of interest and affords a considerable number of humorous situations. A few of these will not find ready response from the American sense of humor because of their pure English interpretation, but the majority will amuse any audience. The film would hardly be called a straight comedy in this country, although it is so designated by the makers. The action is unhampered and natural with moments of tender appeal. Detail in the way of surroundings is given very close attention. This picture is so refreshingly different, Sir John Hare so excellent, and the story so engrossing that it will make a splendid offering for those who enjoy refined entertainment. It is a pleasant diversion from the type of strictly American play.

George D'Alroy, son of the Marquise de St. Maur, marries Esther, a sweet chorus girl, and the two live in perfect bliss in an apartment of their own. The Marquise, who is proud of her aristocratic birth and who has oft times reminded her son of his royal blood, knows nothing of the marriage, and does not find out about it until her son is ordered to the front. She is disgusted with her daughter-in-law, and the people her son is associated with, especially old Eccles, Esther's father, who is always on the lookout for the least sum of money to buy drink. News comes that George has been killed. Later the Marquise tries to "buy" her grandson from its mother in order to bring the child up in the proper way, but she does not get far in this proposal.

Finally George returns—the death report being false—and sees his child for the first time. Then Esther and her husband call upon the Marquise, who has been living all this time in dignified loneliness and misery. Esther first sees the Marquise and offers to give up the child to her. But the old lady now realizes that this is asking too much of any mother and refuses to accept her grandson. George comes on the scene and then his mother's proud heart melts. As she takes her falsely mourned son and his little family into her arms the picture comes to a conclusion.

"Her Father's Gold"

Thanhouser Mutual Masterpicture Released May 11. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A CHEST of gold bars hidden in the sands of an island in a Florida lake is the basis for the rapid action which characterizes "Her Father's Gold," which is a melodrama concerning itself with improbable events mostly. In this adventure story things move quickly and it will appeal to the lovers of frank melodrama.

The manner in which the story rids itself of the villain is quite remarkable. Just as the bearded scoundrel is about to shoot the girl whose father's gold he has appropriated and her dashing sweetheart, a man-eating alligator yanks him out of the rowboat and he disappears below the surface of the calm Florida lake.

"Her Father's Gold" was produced at the Thanhouser studios in Florida under the direction of Eugene Moore, who chose his outdoor locations judiciously. They are good and quite helpful to the action of the story, which tells of a group of crooks who rob a mine. One of them turns traitor and makes off with the loot, burying it on the shore of an island. He is killed but directions as to the location of the chest were drawn on a paper. Over the map a landscape in water colors has been painted. The other characters know there is a map somewhere but they are not sure where.

Eventually, the secret is discovered and some exciting action takes place. The ending finds the girl in possession of her gold and ready to marry the reporter who aided in its recovery. The acting is good and the photography is satisfactory.

Barbara Gilroy, Harris Gordon and Louise Emerald Bates are seen in the important parts. Miss Gilroy is a pretty and a pleasant figure as the miner's daughter. Miss Bates makes a favorable impression as the adventuress. She has one ungrateful scene to enact. This is where she becomes enraged when the wounded man drops back exhausted before telling where the map is hidden, and grasps the apparently dead man by the throat and shakes him until the nurse and doctor interfere. Harris Gordon is the reporter and William Burt is the leader of the crooks.

NEW ROLE FOR HART

Powerful Ince Actor No Longer to Be Known Only in Frontier Types.—Other Kay Bee News

The stepping out of rugged frontier types into the role of a Scotch-Canadian of the Canadian northwest, only gives William S. Hart added opportunities for forceful characterization.

In the Ince production of "The Primal Lure," a Triangle-Kay Bee release, based on the novel of the same name by Vingie E. Roe, and adapted for the screen by J. G. Hawks, Hart will leave the frontier life behind him. In its place the new play will show some adventures with Blackfeet Indians, picturesque forest scenes and teem with intense love. A small, though strong cast, appears in support of Hart. This includes Margery Wilson, Robert McKim and Jerome Storm.

James Montgomery, author of a number of plays, and whose most recent feature was "Not My Sister," on which he worked jointly with C. Gardner Sullivan, the staff photoplaywright of the Ince forces, made an extended visit at the Ince studios to study the technique of the photodrama. After studying the producing end for a while he went to the scenario department for help in photoplay construction. One of the things which impressed him most was that the photodramatist has a much wider field in writing his plays than does the playwright of the speaking stage, where the whole play must be restricted to three or four acts. He decided, however, that it was easier to write a play for the speaking stage than to write the continuity for a motion picture as it is easier to put action into words than it is to put words into action.

Plans are being made for the Metropolitan premiere in one of the Broadway theaters, of "Civilization," Thomas H. Ince's mighty cinema spectacle, which is now enjoying a prosperous run at the Majestic Theater in Los Angeles.

Ormi Hawley, for five years a featured star in Lubin and other pictures, has begun work in a picture under Director Frank Griffen over in New Jersey and began her career as a player for William Fox. Miss Hawley will play opposite Rockcliffe Fellowes, who is now back in the Fox fold, and their first picture is said to be a comedy of a delightful character that will be an entire novelty on the Fox Film program.

One of the most interesting displays at the exposition of Northwest exhibitors was that of the Rialto Theater Supply Co., of which "Sid" Lewis is the manager. Mr. Lewis signed a contract for one of the biggest and best spaces at the armory and had an exhibit well worth going a long way to see. Everything for the theater may be obtained from the Rialto and the big line of supplies, Motiographs, etc., were shown to the public. Mr. Lewis also had a fine display in a show window at Eighth and Hennepin avenue.

There are a number of theaters opening in Quebec, among them the new O'Conner Hall in Huntingdon, operated or about to be operated by O'Conner Bros. New machines are being installed and a first-class service program will be used, including Universal features. The vigorous spring weather is certainly having its effect in Quebec, where the New Imperial Theater opened on May 1st. The capacity of this theater is about 700 seats, and two Powers machines will amply look after the projection. Mr. Knight is to be manager of the new house and states that a seven-piece orchestra will be a feature of the musical equipment of the house. By all accounts, Mr. Knight should meet with great success, everyone speaking of him as a brilliant worker.

Ben R. Blotcky, formerly manager of the Starland Theater in St. Paul, has succeeded George Granstrom as manager of the Strand and Park Theaters in St. Paul. Mr. Granstrom resigned last week and disposed of his interest in the house. Mr. Blotcky has been in the show business many years, having experience in both the picture and vaudeville ends of the business. He has been manager of the Empress Theater in Omaha, and the Empress in Kansas City. Mr. Blotcky is one of the live wire exhibitors of the Twin Cities and has a wide acquaintance among the film men of the northwest. Mr. Granstrom also is mentioned in connection with the managership of a new downtown theater in Minneapolis.

W. B. Martin, manager of the Star Theater, Modesto, Cal., has a very pleasing poster design on the front cover of his program. A pretty girl is seated in a chair reading the newspaper, the back of which carries the advertisement of the theater. Mr. Martin runs Triangle and Paramount releases exclusively.

W. D. Burford of Aurora, Ill., and M. Rosenstein and H. H. Burford of La Crosse, Wis., proprietors of the Bijou Theater, have taken over all the theaters in Aurora. Six houses are included in the holdings of the new corporation which will be known as the Aurora Theater Company Syndicate. The capital is $100,000. Chicago theater managers are watching with keen interest the experiment in Aurora, and if it proves successful, it is probable there will be theater consolidations inaugurated in various cities.

Business was so good at the University Theater, University avenue and Thirteenth street southeast, in Minneapolis, one night recently, that the patrons pushed through the glass storm front. The big crowd of University students were waiting for the first show to close and packed the lobby. When others came to swell the attendance they just naturally kicked out the glass. Manager W. K. Robinson didn't know whether to laugh or cry, but he finally laughed—business certainly was good.

F. H. Coyle, formerly with the Wyman-Partridge Wholesale Dry Goods Co., of Minneapolis, will manage the New Franklin Theater, which is nearing completion at Eleventh avenue south and Franklin. Mr. Coyle is scouting about among the film exchanges obtaining valuable information regarding the pictures and probably will announce his booking policy within a week or two. He plans to give patrons of the New Franklin the best programs obtainable. The house is being erected by Charles Marrs. It will seat 1,000 and will be one of the finest community theaters in the Northwest.

Efforts are now being made by Vancouver Local No. 348, I. A. T. S. E., to bring about a change in the manner of taxing operators in British Columbia, and establishing an adequate provincial examination. In place of the present fee of five dollars for a city license and one dollar for a provincial card (with fifty cents added for attorney's fee), it is planned to do away with the present city license altogether, and increase the provincial one. An applicant would have to pay five dollars before taking the examination. If he passes he will be required to pay an additional five dollars before receiving his license, while if he fails the original five dollars paid will be forfeited.

The Theatorium, Pullman, Wash., have named their weekly publication "The Photograme." They issue an eight-page folder carrying their weekly program and also a number of advertisements. This is a small folder about two by four inches and is well gotten up, and gives an impression of an up-to-date, progressive theater and management.

Johnson Bros., proprietors of the Utopia Theater at Fountain, Minn., are two hustlers who are making good. The Utopia has two hundred seating capacity and is well equipped. They are using Mutual service with features from Nelson & Moor of the Independent Film Exchange of Minneapolis, and say their patrons are very well satisfied.

Some motion picture exhibitors of the northwest will find themselves in serious trouble if they do not live up to the letter of the law regarding the shipping of films. Recently a shipment came into Minneapolis from a North Dakota exhibitor wrapped in paper and tied with a rope. This flagrant violation was reported to the bureau of explosives and is expected to result in a campaign against those exhibitors who are careless or indifferent to the shipping regulations.

The law on this subject is plain.

"Moving picture films must be packed in tightly closed metal cases inclosed in strong, spark-proof, wooden box; or in spark-proof cases made of sheet iron not less than 0.02-inch thick (No. 25 U. S. standard gauge) and lined throughout with fibre board at least one-eighth-inch thick, or some other equivalent insulating material. The covers of these cases must fit tightly and must lap over the body at least five-eighths inch on the sides, forming a tight joint."

And don't forget your caution labels. Your exchange will furnish you with all you need. See that this label is on every package of film that you ship and that the certificate on the label is signed properly.

Edgar Brown of the Garden Theater, Pottsville, Pa., is certainly a hustler. One night a few weeks ago his theater burned to the ground while he was out of the city. Brown found out about it, rushed for a train, and had not been in Pottsville more than a few hours before he had taken over the lease of the Victor Theater and changed the name to the Garden. Then he sent out word that there would be no break in the service; that the Garden Theater, Pottsville, Pa., was still on the map. That's the kind of exhibitor who deserves success.

The Auditorium Theater, Montrose, Mo., issued a very startling and catchy handbill advertising one of their performances. The headline read, "Tonight you can see 'The Devil.'" This was advertising the Mutual five-reeler, "The Devil," and certainly displayed originality and snap.

The U. S. Palace Theater at East Orange, N. J., has originated an extremely clever idea for advertising "The Call of the Cumberlands." This is to purchase and place in the Public Library several copies of this well-known book and after buying them call the attention of the patrons of their theater to this fact.

New York is to have a new mammoth hippodrome to seat 35,000 people. It will be built by B. S. Moss and will be located at 181st street and Broadway. A $25,000 electric organ is to be one of the features of the equipment.

IMPORTANT CHICAGO NEWS

C. Z. Schefer, formerly manager of the Casino theater, 58 W. Madison street, on May 7 took over the Band Box theater, 127 W. Madison street. The Band Box is one of the finest theaters in the loop and when Mr. Schefer completes the improvements which are being made it will be Chicago's most talked about house. A complete new equipment will be installed and a big electric sign will decorate the front of the house. Mr. Schefer has signed a contract for the Mutual-Chaplin pictures and at present is showing Red Feather and V. L. S. E., but it is his intention to add Fox, Metro and Bluebird photoplays. Another feature which adds to the refinement of the house is the installation of girl ushers.

The Alvin theater, 1612 W. Chicago avenue, managed by E. L. Levine, is one of the best equipped theaters on the northwest side. Triangle and Paramount pictures are being featured by this house.

H. C. Miller, the energetic manager of the Alcazar, Boston and Rose theaters, has just signed a contract for the Mutual-Chaplin pictures at a reported price of $22,800. The Boston theater is a feature house, while the Alcazar and the Rose show the General program. The Alcazar is one of Chicago's all-night houses.

LATEST FROM OKLAHOMA

By William Noble

Special Correspondent for Motography.

The Carl Morris-Gunboat Smith prize fight at Tulsa, Okla., last week, drew a large crowd. The Zanzibar Film Co. of Kansas City, Mo., made 2,000 feet of the fight, but on account of the drastic federal laws prohibiting the transportation of fight films, they are being developed in Oklahoma. Cleveland Hilson, general manager of the Zanzibar Film Company, personally supervised the taking of the pictures.

The Orpheum Theater at Durant, Oklahoma, has been sold to Richard Webber of Muskogee, Okla., by the former owners, Sittel & Benfer. Webber has been treasurer of the Broadway Theater at Muskogee for several years.

The new theater in Springfield, Mo., will be called the Alhambra, and will be under the management of H. H. Hughes. The policy of the Alhambra will be strictly feature pictures, with orchestra.

HORKHEIMER OF BALBOA

Probably in the entire film field there is no official more aggressive than E. D. Horkheimer, secretary and treasurer of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company. He is efficiency personified and keeps in touch with every detail about the big Long Beach studio.

E. D. Horkheimer, secretary and treasurer, Balboa Amusement Producing Company.

Mr. Horkheimer is a native of Wheeling, West Virginia. His first commercial experience was gained as a youth in the ranks of Horkheimer Brothers—of which his father was one—leading wool merchants of America. Then he went to Cornell University and was graduated from the electrical engineering department.

For several years "E. D.," as he is familiarly known, was associated with mining companies in Pennsylvania. His specialty was erecting machinery. Summoned home, on the passing of his father, he took charge of the Horkheimer family affairs and remained there until his brother, H. M. Horkheimer, started the Balboa Company and invited him to participate.

An engineer by profession, E. D. Horkheimer is a methodical man. His hobby is efficiency—not of the red-tape variety but the sort that gets actual economic results. Yet his business immersion has not calloused him to the artistic appeal. He stands for the best in pictures and as such has given the trade some valuable ideas.

The old Auditorium in Joplin, Mo., is to be entirely remodeled for a motion picture theater. It is reported that J. D. Wineland of Webb City, Mo., will be the new manager.

The Bluebird is the name of a new moving picture theater which will open at Girard, Kansas, May 1. Thomas Miller will manage the theater and will show Universal, Red Feather and Bl ebird pictures exclusively.

The Hippodrome Theater at Springfield, Mo., under the management of Mrs. Lulu B. Harris, has closed.

Harry Smith, a motion picture operator, was seriously burned when a film exploded in the booth of the Iris Theater at Topeka, Kansas, last week. Quick action on the part of the ushers in opening the many fire doors in the building prevented a panic, and none of the audience was injured.

Notwithstanding the fact that the lid has been lifted, and the people voted for Sunday pictures at Fort Worth, Texas, recently, the past two Sundays passed without any moving pictures being shown. The stringent state law against the operation of moving pictures in Texas on Sunday may have had something to do with the failure to operate Sunday films in Fort Worth.

Rev. Festus Foster, one of the censors for Kansas, proposes to place the ban on films showing smoking. Rev. Foster says that smoking is evil and suggestive and not proper teaching for the boys and girls of Kansas. On several occasions the Kansas censors sought to prohibit Charlie Chaplin pictures being shown in Kansas, but were stopped from doing so by the state appeal board.

C. A. McGuigan will soon open the new Gem in Topeka, Kansas. Mutual pictures only will be shown.

The Hippodrome theater at Topeka, Kansas, under the management of Roy Crawford, will show Mutual photoplays during the summer season in connection with tabloid and musical comedy.

The Ashland theater, Kansas City, Mo., has been enlarged to a 3,000 seating capacity.

An indictment charging a $2,000 swindle in connection with a deal for war films was returned by the Dallas county, Texas, grand jury Saturday. The defendant named in the indictment is reported to be in Rochester, N. Y. The indictment charging swindling over $50, alleges that $2,000 was obtained from H. M. Hardie on December 11, representations having been made to him that arrangements had been made for the purchase of war films which were to be leased by the defendant and Mr. Hardie to motion picture shows throughout the United States. The indictment alleges that representation was made that the films had been purchased with Mr. Hardie's money and that bookings had been secured sufficient to pay half the cost of the films and that in addition $500 had been spent in lithographs and that the pictures were actually being shown. Such representations, the indictment charges, were false and fraudulent.

NEWS FROM NORTHWEST

By A. R. M. Sutton,
Special Correspondent for Motography.

Ackerman and Harris, who operate the Hippodrome Circuit in California with houses in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Sacramento, San Diego, and Santa Barbara, have bought the Empress theaters in Seattle, Portland, and Butte from Sullivan and Considine. Six vaudeville acts and feature pictures will be used in all the houses. After the deal had been closed the purchasers offered Eugene Levy, owner of the Hippodrome of Seattle, $10,000 for the use of the name Hippodrome for their Seattle theater, but Mr. Levy refused the offer; so Ackerman and Harris will call their house the Palace Hippodrome.

Alec Pantages has booked the Pathe serial, "The Iron Claw," featuring Pearl White, Creighton Hale, and Sheldon Lewis, for all his theaters both in Canada and in the Pacific Coast States.

C. E. Schmidt, formerly Pathe road man out of Omaha, is the manager of Pathe's new exchange office in Butte. G. G. Maxey, assistant booker in Seattle, has been appointed booker in Butte.

J. L. Schlafier, former manager of the Universal Exchange in Seattle, has been given charge of the service program in Chicago.

J. V. Lynn is a new road man for the Universal out of Seattle. Mr. Lynn was formerly at the head of the Olympic Amusement Company of Everett, Wash. For the past year he has been manager of the People's Theater, Portland. He knows the business from the ground up, and the Universal people in Seattle are sure that their interests will be well looked after by him.

The Gottstein interests, part owners of the Seattle Coliseum, have taken over the Empress Theater, Tacoma, and have renamed it "The Regent." It will show motion pictures exclusively. The owners are remodeling the house and will reopen it some time in April. They have made no definite announcement as to just what pictures will be presented, but they have let it be understood that no expense will be spared to give Tacoma the very best to be had, and the pictures will probably be better than any that city has had for several months.

The Spokane Theater in Spokane, Wash., has been taken over by W. C. Marshall, a well known theater man, and is to be renamed "The Strand." It was opened March 30 with vaudeville and feature pictures. The vaudeville booking will be made through the W. V. M. A., but no announcement has been made as to what feature pictures will be used.

Manager Dunham of the Rex Theater of Mount Vernon, Wash., is staking the biggest publicity stunt that has been pulled off in his town for years. It is a contest in which a thousand dollars in prizes will be given away. The first prize will be a five-passenger Ford automobile, then there will be a diamond ring, clothes, etc. The contest is for women and girls, each active contestant to receive some sort of prize. Contestants are to be named by vote. Fifteen-cent tickets entitle the purchaser to 100 votes and a ten-cent ticket entitles one to 50 votes. The contest is to extend over a period of seven weeks, and, although only half over, it is already a big success.

A new theater is to be erected at Anchorage, "the mushroom town of Alaska," by A. E. Lathrop, who has a chain of Empress Theaters throughout Alaska. This house is to be known also as the Empress, and is to be of concrete construction with a seating capacity of 865. There will probably be a pipe organ installed, as well as other up-to-date fittings.

I. L. Williams, manager of the Orpheum Theater at Snohomish, Wash., gets out a program every week, very attractively designed and printed on four pages. About once a month Mr. Williams gets out a number with a string attached and hangs one on every door knob in Snohomish. This has been found to be a very effective method of advertising in a small town.

The V-L-S-E office in Seattle has sent out to exhibitors a card asking which of three photoplays they would prefer released first. The following is a copy of the card:

The most recent of the many improvements made by Manager John Hamrick in his Rex theater is the installation of a $10,000 fotoplayer. The only music the Rex has had since its opening has been a piano and traps, but in spite of this handicap Mr. Hamrick has made of the smallest first run house in the city one of the most popular. It is felt that if possible the Rex will be even more popular now that it has music adequate to the interpretation of the pictures. The fotoplayer may be played by a person of ordinary skill, who may thoroughly control the instrument by hand, playing manually or by using the ordinary 88-note player piano music which can be purchased in any music shop. The instrument is equipped with what is known as a double tracker device which carries two rolls of music at one time, and by a simple turn of the lever the operator may change instantly from a light, snappy selection for comedies to the music of tragedies or long photo dramas.

A new way of papering the country is being practiced by Manager Haubrock of Everson, Wash. The vicinity of Everson is a great dairying country. Every farmer for miles around sells milk to the condensary, so every time Mr. Haubrock changes a show he goes there and sticks a herald in every milk can, and in a few hours the entire country is papered "via the Milk Route."

Motion pictures, shown with a nightly change, have enabled the Guerney Lumber Company in the wilds of Wisconsin to hold steady crews in their camps near Ashland. The lumber jacks used to go to the cities and blow in their roll; now they stay in camp, work in the day time and see the pictures at night.

Another industry was added to St. Louis, Missouri, Tuesday, with the incorporation of the Mississippi Valley Motion Picture Corporation, capital stock $250,000, of which $125,000 is paid up. The promoters have moved quietly and very few St. Louisians had even heard of the project until the articles of incorporation were filed. More than half of the capital is said to have come from Chicagoans. H. K. Lange of Kirkwood, Missouri, one of the incorporators, who is secretary of the company, said that pictures would be produced in the new studio within the next two months. Plans are being laid to build a large studio in St. Louis county, just outside of the city limits.

COHN OF GREAT NORTHERN

Martin G. Cohn has just celebrated his fifth anniversary with the Great Northern Film company.

Five years ago "Moe," which name he is called by the trade, entered the service of his firm and through his ability, integrity and loyalty has gained the confidence of General Manager Oes.

"Moe" is a popular young man in the trade, having won many good friends by his pleasing personality and by his agreeable and accommodating disposition. Beginning as an office boy, he gradually worked himself up to a responsible position, the careful execution of which is a not unimportant factor.

Next month "Moe" becomes a benedict and the good wishes of all go with him.

Vogue Films, Inc.: This company is adding new talent to its cast on a very substantial schedule. Vogue offerings have gained steadily in popularity and are now regarded by a large number of exhibitors as a permanent part of their program. Reported earnings—based on its modest capitalization—figure out at a higher percentage than 80% of the film manufacturing companies receipts, according to the best available information.

Lone Star Film Corporation: Twenty-five is now bid for the common stock and sales have been reported at considerably higher figures. If Charlie Chaplin fulfills the expectations created in the minds of exhibitors, his bookings will, in all probability, establish a record that will not be duplicated in a number of years. The $1,500,000 of business has set a mark that has never been approached in the history of the film industry, at least for the few weeks taken to acquire this volume of bookings.

Mutual Film Corporation: It is stated, on very good authority, that business booked on the Charlie Chaplin series had reached, on Monday evening of this week, a little over $1,500,000, in which the Mutual will have an interest—based on its 30% for distribution—of $450,000, which would pay the full 7% on the preferred and approximately 21% on the common stocks excluding all of the rest of the Mutual Film program. This explains why both preferred and common have been in demand during the past two weeks. In addition thereto, the earnings from the regular Mutual program have been far in a way the best of any period during the last fifteen months.

Randolph Film Company: The first release on the pre-service schedule of "Gloria's Romance" occurred Monday evening in about twenty-five of the largest cities in the United States with overcrowded houses. Seventy is now bid for the common, which is an advance of ten points in the last two weeks.

Triangle Film Corporation: The ambition of this most recent aggregation of film companies is apparently to found its appeal to the exhibitor on the magic of big names. The merit of the productions is of a very substantial nature, but it yet remains for someone to explain why the securities are not in demand. It is difficult to secure a bid for Triangle and New York Motion is offered at 40 without any takers.

Mirror Films, Inc., has been chosen to direct the fourth Mirror feature starring Nat Goodwin.

Kathleen Butler, who has been seen in a number of Gaumont productions, notably "The Secret Agent" and "The Ace of Death," has a prominent role in a forthcoming Gaumont production now being filmed at the Jacksonville, Fla., studios.

Walter McNamara, scenario editor of the Mirror Films, Inc., adapted a well known stage play as the fourth picture vehicle for Nat Goodwin.

Jerome Kern, famous musical composer, is writing special accompaniments for each chapter of "Gloria's Romance," the motion picture novel which stars Billie Burke.

Two clever children, William and Ethel Stewart, are appearing with Theda Bara in a new William Fox photoplay. This is their first appearance in a Fox film.

Bangs, the celebrated New York photographer, is taking the "still" pictures of the players in the new Billie Burke film, "Gloria's Romance."

Gladys Hulette, the Thanhouser-Mutual star, is five feet in height and weighs about one hundred pounds.

Mary Miles Minter has become a suffragist. She hopes that when she is twenty-one, six years hence, she will be allowed to vote.

Richard Bennett, who has been signed by President Samuel S. Hutchinson as a star of a number of features for the American Film Company, will leave for Santa Barbara as soon as his engagement with the "Rio Grande" company at the Empire theater terminates.

Wallace MacDonald, director with the American Film Company at Santa Barbara, is visiting his mother in Halifax. He will spend six months in the north and east.

Warner Orland's favorite game is croquet.

Pauline Barry, of the William Fox forces, began her stage career when five years old as little "Meenie" in "Rip Van Winkle," with Joseph Jefferson.

"The Light of Dusk" is a Lubin drama being produced by Edgar Lewis from an original scenario written by Anthony P. Kelly.

Jule Power enacts a "heavy" role in "Gloria's Romance," starring Billie Burke.

James O'Connor, now with the William Fox forces, played on the speaking stage with William Faversham and Maude Adams.

The supporting cast in Theda Bara's next picture includes Stuart Holmes, Claire Whiney, William H. Tooker, Stanhope Wheatcroft, Velma Whitman and Ben Deeley.

The cast of "Sins of Men," the William Fox picture in which Stuart Holmes and Dorothy Bernard are co-starred, includes Alice Gale, Tom Burrough, Hattie Burks, Stanhope Wheatcroft, Blanche Clark and Kittens Reichert.

Roy Garish, formerly with Vim, is now with the Serial players in Florida.

Ray Godfrey has joined the Vim company.

The C. C. Field Film Company's studio at Miami is nearing completion.

Edmund Breese, who plays the stellar role in "The Spell of the Yukon," the Metro play based on the poem by Robert W. Service, had a narrow escape from serious injury in a battle with a wolf used in the picture.

More than one thousand titles for the Billie Burke story were considered before "Gloria's Romance" was chosen.

Katherine and Jane Lee, the popular children with the Fox players, have returned from Jamiaca, where they took part in the Annette Kellermann picture, and are ready to work in other Fox features.

Violet Horner, star in the William Fox picture, "The Marble Heart," has very light hair, and very dark eyes and eyebrows.

A company of Henry W. Savage players are at Stuart, Florida, making scenes for "Every Woman."

Joseph Rucker and M. H. Swain, with the Pathe Weekly, are in Jacksonville, Fla., taking scenes for "Historical America." St. Augustine will also be visited.

L. R. Stark has accepted a position with the Rolfe Photoplays, Inc., as assistant to Harry O. Hoyt, head of the scenario staff in the Rolfe studio. Mr. Stark began his career playing comedy parts with the Kalem company, and afterward with the Vitagraph and Lubin.

Philip E. Rosen, of the William Fox forces, is president of the Cinema Camera Club, Inc., an organization that is growing rapidly. Mr. Rosen was the camera man for Director J. Gordon Edwards in the various Robert B. Mantell-Genevieve Hamper pictures.

Nat Goodwin and a company of players from the Mirror Films studio left recently for Quebec, where they will appear in the exterior scenes of the fourth Mirror picture, in which Mr. Goodwin is to be featured by the Mirror company.

Jack Cunningham, formerly telegraph editor of The New York Sun, who has been publicity manager for the Mirror Films, Inc., has been made studio manager of the Mirror studio at Glendale, L. I. He will continue to handle publicity. Hector J. Streyckmans, former studio manager, is now assistant manager of the company.

The General Film Company, Inc., has moved its headquarters from the Fifth Avenue Building to the Passavant Building, 440 Fourth avenue. The branch office in West Twenty-third street will remain where it is.

Sidney Drew, who with his wife is making the weekly one reel Metro-Drew comedies, rarely uses any make-up while working before the camera.

PAT O'MALLEY OF EDISON FAME

A typical soldier of fortune is Pat O'Malley, the juvenile lead of the Edison Company, a man who has seen the world, has taken it at its best and given his best in return.

He is a man who impresses you with the charm of his personality, inspires one with a wish for a better acquaintance, and upon better acquaintance proves well worth knowing. Pat is very gentle and quiet, yet is called "the human cyclone." He is the kind of man you would expect to do daring deeds and laugh away all praise for his bravery, the kind of man women trust, the kind of man men give their confidence. And because his true manhood and winning personality are so strong they show through his film roles and give him justly the popularity he holds.

Even as a child Pat was a daredevil and at the age of eight was doing a slack wire act on the stage. He also became an expert horseback rider at an early age and was more at home on a horse's back than on the slack rope.

Pat O'Malley was a soldier of fortune for fifteen years and there is little of this country or the old that he could not connect with some interesting escapade if he would. It was because of this natural diablerie, his prowess in all things calling for agility and physical strength linked with being born a natural actor, that led him into the film world. His first appearance was about four years ago with the Lubin Company, and he was soon sent to Ireland as leading man with the Sid Olcott players, and perhaps it was his name matching the Emerald Isle, although Pat is a native born American, that helped him make his great success in these pictures. After a short experience with the Gene Gauntier Feature Players and the Kalem Company Mr. O'Malley joined the Edison Company. The play in which he made his name in this company was "In His Father's Footsteps," in which he made a wild ride over the country more hazardous than that of Paul Revere. Pat is now playing juvenile leads for this company—and doing it well. Some of the plays in which his personality and talent are well depicted are "Blind Justice," "A Blade of Grass," "Celeste of the Abulance Corps," and "The Law of the North."

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than clsasification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

He is seen by the strikers and yells of "scab" brings the situation home to him and he jumps through the window into a corridor. The strikers rush to every entrance and Otto, realizing that his escape lies in disguise, dons a full dress suit. He cannot find a pair of shoes so is forced to wear his paint stained ones. A cop unable to see the connection between Otto's shoes and his clothes arrests him, but he is later released when a painting is found in the tail pocket of the evening dress coat, which Count Espangola had stolen from the Dollarmark home, and he also wins the girl.

He learns the identity of the beggar king and Haller, determining to save his daughter disgrace at any cost, writes a note to Paul telling him that he will learn some very important information for his article by calling that night. Haller tells Meta he is called away and for her to keep Paul there until he returns. He then gives instructions to three gunmen he has hired to shoot Paul if he leaves the house before eleven o'clock. Paul has a struggle between love and duty, but finally he writes a note to the editor resigning his position. When Haller learns of this he returns home and is shot by one of the gunmen. It is our aim to make this department as complete as possible, although to do this, we must have the co-operation of all the manufacturers of film in the United States. If brief stories of the films you are releasing this week are not contained in this department, it must be due to the fact that you have not supplied us with synopsis sheets. In that case please see that we are advised of your film titles and release dates, and furnished with a brief synopsis of the story. This department is intended for every film manufacturer, whether he uses our advertising pages or not.

A Child of Fortune—(Three Reels)—Knickerbocker—May 19.—Featuring Frank Mayo and Lillian West. Pokes takes a fancy to the girl and abducts her. Jabbs finds the policeman's spare uniform and puts it on. Marching toward the 'squire's house he comes on Pokes with the girl, overpowers him and forces him to put on the prison clothes again. Pokes escapes and climbs unobserved into an automobile, which drives in at the prison gates, making him a prisoner once more.

TRIANGLE PLAYS

Mae Marsh and Robert Harron in A Child of the Paris Streets

For the week of May 21st the TRIANGLE Fine Arts Picture will be Mae Marsh in "A Child of the Paris Streets"—a picture play that is bound to reach right down to the hearts of your patrons and "get" them.

There's an indefinable charm about the little lady who plays the part of her own mother in this latest TRIANGLE PLAY—first as the wife of the stern judge who sent an Apache to the gallows, and later as his daughter, stolen by the queen of a band of crooks as the revenge for the deed of her father.

They brought her up a masterpickpocket, capable of extracting a pocketpook under the most trying circumstances—with her teeth if necessary—but always able to "prove" her innocence by her winning manner and honest smile.

But when they tried to ill-treat her, and threatened her with the same punishment as another member of the band had received she ran away.

Bobby Harron found her far in the corner of his room huddled up on a couch fast asleep. He couldn't understand why she was there and when in the morning she had disappeared the mystery was deeper than ever.

W. S. Hart in "The Primal Lure"

Then there's the TRIANGLE-Ince Picture in which W. S. Hart repeats the success he made in such other plays as "The Disciple," "Between Men," and "Hell's Hinges."

Rembusch Backed to Head League

HERRINGTON TO RUN FOR RE-ELECTION

FRANK J. REMBUSCH of Shelbyville, Ind., is being urged by the exhibitors of the middle west to become a candidate for the presidency of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, the annual convention of which is to be held at Chicago, July 10 to 18, inclusive.

The exhibitors of the middle west are a unit in declaring that Mr. Rembusch is that clean-cut, vigorous type of motion picture showman whose effort has been and will be to elevate the business to a higher plane and who will lend dignity as well as aggressiveness to the League and will work all the time in behalf of the organization.

Mr. Rembusch, who has been requested on previous occasions to become a candidate, for strictly personal reasons has hithereto been forced to refuse.

The Chicago motion picture showmen are enthusiastic over the man they say "will be next president," but Mr. Rembusch will not win without a real political battle.

Fred J. Herrington, the present incumbent, is an avowed candidate to succeed himself as president of the League and he no doubt will fortify himself as much as possible to repulse any attacks. Also Mr. Herrington, who has done much for the League through his constant traveling and activity during the last year, is known as quite some little politician. Chicago showmen are authority for the statement that he purposes attending the convention flanked and supported by the showmen from his home city and its environments in an effort to repulse the attack of the hundreds of supporters of Mr. Rembusch. Forecasts predict a merry fight between the Rembusch and Herrington adherents.

The strong support of Mr. Rembusch is caused by his country-wide reputation of being everything that a showman should be and combining with his knowledge as a showman a large business experience, a level, practical business mind and the ability of making more than an acceptable address whenever called upon.

Frank J. Rembusch.

Another person whose name has been mentioned for the presidency, but without his sanction, is Tom Furness of Duluth, Minn., one of the most popular men in the motion picture business. If Mr. Furness would consider the office, judging from the comments of showmen he would poll a heavy vote. But it is a foregone conclusion that Mr. Furness would not consider the office.

William J. Sweeney of Chicago also has been mentioned, but Mr. Sweeney prefers to remain in an advisory position in the League, so it is unlikely that his name will be placed in nomination.

The convention of the League is to be given over strictly to business in an effort to improve conditions surrounding the exhibiting end of the motion picture and at the same time with due regard for the rights of the manufacturers and distributers. The whole keyword of the convention and show which will follow and which is to be held at the Coliseum July 12 to 18, inclusive, will be "harmony." The committees in charge, who are working day and night to make the convention and show a success, feel that there must be some middle ground upon which the producers and showmen may meet, exchange views and come to an agreement for the general uplift of the business.

Two matters of vital interest, and which have been bones of contention for years, will be taken up with an idea of settling them for all time.

The delegates to the convention will be requested to go on record and abide by the vote of the majority on the questions of bookings and contracts.

M. A. Choynski, owner of the Newberry theater, Chicago, will make an attempt to place the League on record as being against the program and in favor of open booking, and if he succeeds he will attach a rider to his resolution in an effort to make it mandatory that all members of the League abide by the vote of the convention.

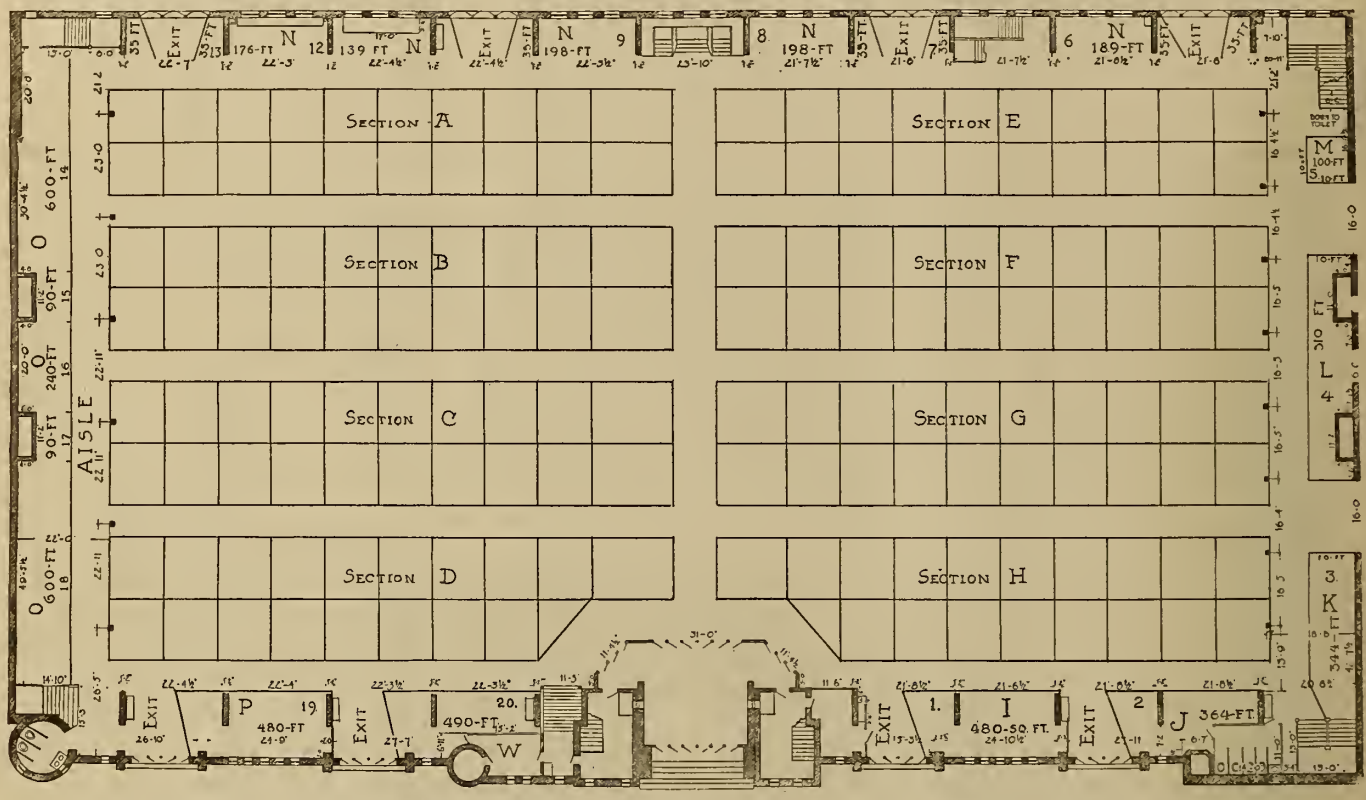
Arrangements are being made to have the Chicago showmen act as guides for the visitors from other cities. An appeal has been mailed to every motion picture showman in Chicago requesting them so to arrange their time dur-



Floor plan of the Chicago Coliseum as arranged for the Exposition, showing divisions of space. Scale 1/32 inch to the foot.

This action is sure to precipitate a fight on the convention floor, as many exhibitors appear to be partial to program booking, their argument being that the companies leasing programs are showing a greater inclination to respect the rights of the showmen and are making every effort to rent a well-balanced program.

The convention also will be asked to go on record on contracts. It has been claimed that the contract now generally accepted is not equitable, as it works a hardship on the showman and in favor of the manufacturer. One member of the convention committee explained that, under the contract form in use, the producer or distributor could cancel at any time, which the showman cannot. The form of contract to be submitted increases the liability of the producer and distributor and diminishes the liability of the showman. League members declare they want a contract which will be binding upon the distributors and manufacturer but subject to cancellation by the showman on a notice of two weeks.

As a justification for the proposed contract the League members assert that, under the present form of contract, the manufacturers and distributors may cancel at any time they so see fit or have the opportunity to lease their films to a neighboring house at a higher rental.

The League members also will be asked to go on record as favoring the rental "payment in advance" idea, their contention being that such a course will stabilize the business and prevent the entry of persons with little financial backing. By the country-wide endorsement of the "pay as you enter" idea the League members believe they will keep many "fly-by-nights" out of the business.

While the steering committees of the convention and show are devoting much time to convention work they are not overlooking the social end of the program. ing the nine days of the convention and show that they may act as guides for the visiting showmen and their wives. It is the intention of the Chicago exhibitors to see that the visiting showmen not only do something for their business while in Chicago, but that they return home with a knowledge of the western metropolis that will make them have a desire to return to it.

The "Beauty Contest" inaugurated by the show steering committee has brought in numerous photographs of young women who feel the call of the screen. The winner of this contest will be given a short time contract with a large producing company and if she can act before the camera in keeping with her looks she no doubt will become known throughout the world.

All photographs entered in this contest should be mailed to the "Beauty Contest Committee," Suite 1413, Masonic Temple, Chicago, Ill., or to MOTOGRAPHY, Monadnock Building, Chicago, Ill. The name of the contestant should be written plainly on the back of the photograph and it should be designated that the photograph is for entry in the Motion Picture League's "Beauty Contest."

Showmen in attendance at the Chicago convention and Motion Picture Industry exhibit to be held July 12 to 18, inclusive, may keep in close touch with home by having their mail and telegraph messages addressed in care of MOTOGRAPHY, Monadnock Block, Chicago. Every effort will be made by MOTOGRAPHY to make immediate delivery of mail and telegrams from its exhibit in the Coliseum.

Board of Trade Exposition Big Success

STILL GREATER SHOW PLANNED FOR NEXT YEAR

FOLLOWING a week and a day in which the motion picture held forth at Madison Square Garden, the First National Exposition of the Motion Picture Industry under the guidance of a Motion Picture Board of Trade of America came to a successful close on Sunday night, May 14.

Not only the men who were directly interested in the welfare of the show but those who occupied booths expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with the exposition, feeling that the returns, both material and those of a nature not measurable by figures, were justification for the expenditure of time and money required for proper representation at the exposition.

In a statement in which he thanked "everyone who helped to make the exposition possible by their loyal co-operation both prior to the opening and during its continuation," J. W. Binder, executive secretary of the M. P. Board of Trade, gave a clear idea of the measure of success obtained when he said that, "a very large number of the Garden exhibitors have already signed tentative contracts for next year's show." This expresses better than anything else that the exposition was a success. Mr. Binder also stated that there would be only one Motion Picture Exposition next year, and that toward such an end negotiations were already under way.

Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, president of the Board of Trade, who formally opened the exposition on May 6, also referred to a single and greater exposition next year in the following statement: "The success of the Motion Picture Board of Trade's Exposition has added another evidence of the public's interest. It has given encouragement to the industry as a whole and I am frank to admit that I am looking forward with great expectations to a greater exposition next year, under the united efforts of the exhibitors, distributors and manufacturers."

As beautiful as it has ever been in its history, and surely there is history connected with it, Madison Square Garden, all green and white and gold, opened its doors nightly to throngs, attracted no doubt by the special features arranged by the various producers with exhibitions at the show. The afternoon visitors were also large in number but expositions of this magnitude thrive at night. On opening day there was a balloon ascension from the roof of the Garden and an auto parade down Fifth avenue plus the fact that it was opening day to bring crowds into the greatly beautified arena.

Sunday was Actors' Fund day as well as the Universal Film Manufacturing Company's day. Some notable features were enjoyed by those in attendance on this day. Set aside for the bankers and business men Monday the show did not adhere strictly to its program but it was none the less one of the exposition's best days. John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual Film Corporation addressed the large assemblage. On this day Paragon registered its much remarked thrust at censorship. Pearl Brown, one of Paragon's pretty actresses climbed to the tower and "petticoated" the famous Diana who for these long years has held herself gracefully at the highest point of the Garden. Miss Brown said that as long as it is right to censor pictures art should be censored and that statues undraped are, along this line of reasoning, immoral.

On Tuesday the show was given over to the cause of California. A reception was held at the booth of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce. Oranges, lemons, walnuts, ripe olives and other products of the Golden State were distributed. Lee Ochs, Samuel Trigger, Al Blumenthal, Louis Levine, William Brandt, John Whitman, Henry Schaeffer and a number of out-of-town exhibitors who came on to New York for the two shows visited the Garden on this night.

Wednesday evening Mutual stars were presented from the stage situated at the Fourth avenue end of the Garden. A number of Cooper-Hewitt studio lights were placed on the stage and the visitors were given a glimpse of studio work. Mary Miles Minter enacted an impromptu scene or so just as it would be done in the studio. Marguerite Courtot, Gladys Leslie, Gladys Hulette, the Fairbanks twins and other Mutual stars appeared on the stage.

Showings of the new Morosco release, "Pasquale," was the feature of the program both afternoon and evening on Thursday, which was Paramount day. The star of the picture, George Beban, appeared and addressed the audience after the picture was shown. In the evening a reception was held at the Paramount booth. Guests of honor were Fannie Ward, George Beban and Dorothy Dent. Miss Ward's very popular Lasky feature, "The Cheat," was on the program offered to the visitors on the huge screen. Adolph Zukor, W. W. Hodkinson, Jesse L. Lasky and Burton Holmes were present Thursday night. Friday the Red Cross Society furnished special pictures with other exercises of an appropriate nature, among them a boy scout drill and some patriotic music. Henry Reuterdahl was a guest at the Paramount booth Friday night.

Friday was also characterized by the features contributed by the Fox Film Corporation. Several Fox stars were present and received friends at the company's booth, which was decorated much after the fashion of the exhibit at the Grand Central Palace the week before.

The Vitagraph Company offered attractions on Saturday. The Vitagraph booth, than which none claimed a bigger patronage throughout the week, was ocupied by all the famous Vitagraph stars, in fact, all the players from the Flatbush studios were present. Recent Vitagraph feature pictures were shown during the afternoon and evening, among them "The Suspect" which stars Anita Stewart. The actors and actresses were introduced from the stage. Commodore J. Stuart Blackton of Vitagraph introduced the group of stars and as he was about to leave the stage J. W. Binder stood in his path. John M. Lakin of the Acme Lithographing Company wished to present, as a token of esteem to Commodore Blackton, a painting. Mr. Binder made an appropriate little presentation address and Mr. Blackton after glancing at his likeness on the canvas replied in a few heartfelt words.

On the closing day of the exposition the International Film Service supplied the attractions. Four episodes of the "Mysteries of Myra" and some split-reel cartoon comedies were shown. The famous cartoonists who do animated cartoons for the International were present. George McManus, Winsor McCay, George Harriman and Tom Powers were to be seen at the International booth. Votes for the most popular motion picture actress were counted. This popularity contest which International conducted was won by Irene Castle, who took turns in leading the contest from the time of its beginning with Anita Stewart, Mary Pickford and Grace Darling.

Throughout the week the immense crowds manifested a keen interest in the attractions offered by the manufacturers and as well in the accessories, of necessity to the projection of pictures on the screen, on display at the various booths. Of course, dancing was very popular, the devotees of the dance having at their disposal ample space and splendid music.

In addition to the delightfully decorated and furnished booths occupied by the motion picture producers mentioned above, there were representations made by numerous others of importance in the industry. The Nicholas Power booth was business-like in appearance. The latest models in projection machines could here be seen, and they were seen by all who came to the Garden. Nicholas Power was a frequent visitor to the show.

Essanay's booth was located on the main floor. Souvenirs and photographs were distributed from this booth. G. K. Spoor, president of Essanay, was in New York and paid several visits to the exposition.

The Novelty Side Company had a large booth on the main floor which contained many things to attract attention. It seemed as though every visitor stopped for a moment at least at this booth.

Accessories and all manner of projection machine efficiency devices were to be found in the booth of J. H. Hallberg, which was located on the main floor next to the Red Feather booth.

Panchroma Twin-Arc lights were on display at the Allison and Hadaway booth. John W. Allison and Tom Hadaway were in charge of the display where one could see and hear some very interesting things pertaining to the proper lighting of scenes in the making.

An active spot at all times was that held by the National Cash Register Company. The new two-color ticket printing machines greatly interested picture ex-

National Censorship Bill on Calendar

BY THOMAS O. MONK
Washington Correspondent of Motography

THE Hughes censorship bill has been formally reported to the House, and is now on the calendar. Whether it will be passed at the present session remains to be seen. It is believed that now that the bill is actually before the House, the manufacturers who oppose it will let their opposition be known to the members in no uncertain manner, and those who favor its enactment will likewise get busy.

There is but little doubt that the welfare workers will make great efforts to get action.

It can be stated positively that there is no possibility of the House taking up the measure until after the conventions or until the latter part of June. The time in the House has all been allotted up to the meeting of the Republican convention on June 7, when an agreement will go into effect between the leaders of both sides that nothing will be done in Congress except routine work until after the adjournment of the Democratic convention, which meets one week after the Republican convention.

Chairman Hughes appears to be confident that if he can bring the matter to a vote it will pass the House. However, those who oppose the measure will now have an opportunity to state their objections and to furnish members with information in regard to the subject. It will be a new subject to them, and the prediction is made here that the debate on the measure will be one of the most interesting and instructive ones ever staged in Congress.

In filing the report of the Committee on Education, Chairman Hughes made the following statement:

The report which I am submitting to the House fully explains the bill. The committee has endeavored to so frame the measure that it will safeguard the public welfare and at the same time work no unnecessary hardships on the motion picture industry. I believe we have accomplished not only this, but have presented a measure which will vastly benefit the industry in the matter of relieving the producers in a large measure from the oppressive weight of the growing local censorships. This bill is the one way open to the producers to protect themselves from the ruinous effects of state and municipal censorship, for it will make unnecessary the local boards by meeting the public demand for regulation of motion pictures.

The sooner the bill becomes law the better it will be for the industry, for it would be much easier to prevent the formation of a state or city board of censors by showing that there is already in existence an efficient federal regulation than it will be to have a local board abolished which was created before the federal law became effective. In any event, the national board will be considered the leading motion picture commission and its decisions will carry the weight of leadership. Should a picture be passed by the national board, a local board would have to give a good reason to the public for prohibiting the exhibition of the picture.

It is for the good of the motion picture interests, as well as the public welfare, that I am pressing this measure for early passage. It is my prediction that should this bill not be passed at the present session, the great majority of motion picture producers will come to Congress—as the Famous Players, Paramount, Lasky, World and Equitable companies have already come—at its next session, demanding the passage of the bill to save them from the tremendous costs and hardships of local censorship.

Following is the text of the report of the Committee:

The Committee on Education, to whom was referred H. R. 15462, have considered the same and submit the following report, with the recommmendation of the committee that the bill do pass:

The necessity for regulation of motion pictures is apparent. It has been acknowledged by a large majority of the film manufacturers by their voluntary submission of their films to unofficial boards for approval. That the public demands this regulation is demonstrated by the scrupulous regularity with which the producers exhibit such approval at the end of each picture.

The vicious picture brings the larger return to exhibitor and producer, because it gets the money of the regular customer and the sensation seeker also. This state of affairs constitutes a temptation hard to resist, and, in fact, the production of vicious pictures is constantly increasing just because they are more profitable. If the industry is to endure, if decent people are to stay in the business, this cancer must be cut out. A federal regulatory commission should prove a fearless surgeon, and we therefore favor such a commission.

This statement of conditions is made in the brief filed with the committee by the legal representatives of four of the ten manufacturers who produce 90 per cent of the motion pictures in the United States, and by the legal representatives of one of the largest distributers of motion pictures in this country. The brief in full accompanies this report.

This bill has the earnest support of the leading moral and religious organizations of the nation. A similar bill was unanimously reported to the House from this committee in the last Congress.

With the acknowledgment of the need of regulation both by the motion-picture interests and the public they serve, the question arises as to what shall be the regulation and who shall do the regulating. The National Board of Review at New York City is composed of representatives of various moral and civic organizations. The expenses of this board are paid by some of the leading motion-picture interests, and it has no legal authority. At the request of the manufacturers this board passes upon pictures. It is estimated that more than 95 per cent of all pictures produced in this country are passed upon by this unofficial board.

In addition to this voluntary board there are numerous official censors, both state and municipal. The establishment of such large numbers of these local boards, which are rapidly increasing, clearly demonstrates the inadequacy of the so-called National Board of Review, which by its very unofficial character cannot exercise effective supervision. Though it were to exercise a careful and intelligent supervision over 95 per cent of all pictures, still there would remain 5 per cent which could be immoral and unfit to be shown. It is only fair to assume that those pictures which are most objectionable will not voluntarily be submitted for review. An unofficial board which has not the right to examine 100 per cent of the pictures is in reality not a board of regulation, but a board of recommendation and approval. As a matter of fact, evidence before the committee discloses that a very considerable percentage of the pictures approved by the unofficial board are declared by local boards unfit for exhibition. The decision of the National Board of Review is not binding. Pictures which have been disapproved by it are shown to the public.

The character of the motion-picture industry renders state and municipal regulation inadequate. Motion-picture films are essentially articles of interstate commerce. They are not manufactured for use in any one state or municipality, but practically every picture is exhibited in all of the states of the Union. Innumerable inspections by local boards work great hardships on the industry. In the absence of any official federal regulation, the states and cities are finding it necessary to establish these local boards to prevent the exhibition of immoral, indecent, and obscene pictures. The only adequate method of regulating motion pictures is to be had in a federal commission, and the establishment of such a commission is the one way to obviate the necessity for innumerable local boards.

The bill which this report accompanies provides for the appointment by the President of five commissioners, and a supplementary force of deputy commissioners to be appointed by the commission. The commission is required to license each film intended for interstate commerce unless it finds that such film, or a part thereof, is obscene, indecent, immoral, inhuman, or is a reproduction of an actual bull fight or prize fight, or is of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals or incite crime.

The main offices of the commission are to be at Washington, but the commission is granted authority to establish branch offices where necessary. Each branch office is to be in charge of one of the commissioners or a deputy who is clothed with the power of a commissioner. Licenses may be issued by this commissioner or deputy commissioner at such branch office. Should he render an adverse decision on the film, the producer has the right to appeal to the full commission, and in all cases the producer can appeal from decisions of the commission to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

The commission is authorized to issue licenses for pictures which are to be shown only to people over 16 years of age.

It is further provided that a film not having been licensed by the commission shall not be transported in interstate commerce.

The exhibition of unlicensed pictures at places of amusement for pay in the District of Columbia or in any of the territories of the United States, or any place where the local police power is in the jurisdiction of the United States, is prohibited. The penalty for a violation of this act is a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment not more than one year, or both, and the confiscation of the films illegally transported, exhibited, or changed.

Motion picture films meant for use by the learned professions and not for purposes of entertainment are excepted from the operation of this bill. Films known in the industry as "news films"—those depicting current events—may be granted a permit so that they can be shown immediately after manufacture, the commission having authority to withdraw the permit when this privilege is abused. All motion-picture films which are in existence at the time this act is approved shall be granted a permit to enter interstate commerce without examination.

License fees of $2 for 1,000 feet of film for originals and 50 cents for each duplicate copy are provided in this bill. It is estimated that 200 original reels of 1,000 feet each are produced weekly in this country. The best figures obtainable indicate that an average of 25 duplicates are made of each original. The income from the originals would therefore be $400 per week, or $20,800 per annum, and from the duplicates $2,500 per week, or $130,000 per annum. The total income is therefore estimated at $150,800.

The commission is given authority to revise these fees after six months so that only an amount sufficient to bear the expenses of the commission will be collected.

In the consideration of this measure your committee, after once determining that regulation of motion pictures was a pressing necessity for the protection of the public, and particularly the children, against vicious and immoral pictures, sought to frame a bill which would meet the needs of the public and not work unnecessary hardships on the industry. The measure which your committee reports has the indorsement of leading producers of motion picture films and others engaged in the industry.

Statement of Messrs. Meyers & Clark, Attorneys for Paramount Pictures Corporation; E. J. Ludvigh, Ralph A. Kohn, Attorneys for Famous Players Film Co.; Arthur S. Friend, Attorney for Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co. (Inc); and Moritz Rosenthal, Attorney for World Film Corporation and Equitable Motion Pictures Corporation.

Hon. D. M. Hughes,

Chairman Committee on Education, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Sir: The undersigned, representing substantial interests in the motion-picture industry, viz., Paramount Pictures Corporation, Famous Players Film Co., Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co. (Inc.), World Film Corporation, and Equitable Motion Pictures Corporation, submit herewith for your consideration a revision of the Smith-Hughes bill (S. 2204; H. R. 456) which, while crude in form, covers practical points of great importance to the trade, and will, we trust, serve as a working basis for a bill to be reported by your committee.

While the idea of censorship of motion pictures is distasteful to our clients, as well as to others in the business, our support of the principle of regulation embodied in the bill before you is due to our realization of unfavorable conditions in the industry which cannot be corrected by ordinary means nor by sporadic and occasional criminal prosecutions, procured by the better elements of the business or by individual or organized reformers. The motion-picture business, now of vast financial importance, has had a mushroom growth and is not yet homogeneous and standardized.

Too many persons engaged in the business look upon it as a temporary means of getting money instead of permanent business, the continued profit of which is dependent upon the quality and character of the productions. They are like miners who quickly exhaust the high-grade ore and leave the low-grade on the dump. They are get-rich-quick artists, looking for a quick "clean-up and a get-away." They find the opportunity for such methods in producing and exhibiting sensational productions which display scenes of lust and crime.

Unfortunately, the public is not yet discriminating and goes to see both bad and good, which are usually to be found upon the weekly program of the same theater. Still more unfortunately, the vicious picture brings the larger return to exhibitor and producer, because it gets the money of the regular customer and the sensation seeker also. This state of affairs constitutes a temptation hard to resist and, in fact, the production of vicious pictures is constantly increasing just because they are more profitable. If the industry is to endure, if decent people are to stay in the business, this cancer must be cut out. A federal regulatory commission should prove a fearless surgeon and we therefore favor such a commission.

The motion-picture business has three well-defined divisions—production, distribution and exhibition. The producer deals with authors and performers and makes the pictures. The distributor contracts with the producer for his product and, through local offices, known as exchanges, places it in the hands of the exhibitor. The exhibitor deals directly with the public. All three divisions of the business would be affected adversely by an act providing for federal regulation which overlooked the practical needs of the business. In order that those needs may be served, we urge you to include in any bill which you may report provisions as follows:

(1) Local offices for the commission in New York and Los Angeles, so that the producers, most of whom operate in those cities or their vicinity, may have ready access to the supervising authority and prompt consideration of their product.

(2) Authority to the commissioner or deputy in charge of a local office to grant or refuse a license. This is necessary to procure the prompt action on applications, which the producer requires in order to meet his engagements with the distributor, covering a constant and frequent supply of pictures, and which the distributor requires in order to enable the exchanges to supply to the exhibitors the daily and weekly changes covered by their contracts. Delay would certainly be costly and might be fatal to the organized business.

(3) A provision for condemnation of specific parts of a film, which, when the same are eliminated, shall become entitled to license.

(4) A provision for review by the commission when the examiner refuses a license. As the determination of the question whether a film is entitled to license is not based upon exact standards but is a matter of opinion only, it should not be possible for one man, in his discretion, to destroy the large investment represented by a modern photoplay.

(5) A provision for an appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia from a refusal to license. As the determination by the commission would be really arbitrary because of the absence of legal tests or recognized standards, it is of the greatest importance that the commission should not be vested with supreme power. Where great property interests are involved, the citizen should always be afforded an opportunity for relief from the court, if he feels that he has been treated unjustly.

(6) A provision permitting the producer to transport films prior to application for license. The producer should be free to transport a film from its place of manufacture to his home office or other place, where it will be cut and trimmed and otherwise prepared for exhibition.

(7) A provision for substantial salaries for the commissioners, so that the President can secure the services of capable men, who will accept office as a career and not for the purpose of carrying out preconceived and perhaps prejudiced ideas as to reform of the film industry.

(8) An exemption from the operation of the act of (a) films exhibited to the public prior to its enactment, and (b) films which do not contain any dramatic or fictional element, such as pictures of current events, commonly known as news pictures and topical reviews and pictures of places and peoples, geographical in nature, and commonly known as travel pictures.

(9) A provision granting discretion to the commissioner to issue a permit under which films may be exhibited pending revocation of the permit and application for license. Such a provision would enable the commission to adjust the burden of temporarily accumulated applications by granting permits (in effect, temporary licenses) to producers whose history and reputation entitle them to a presumption of complying with the law.

As we are moved by the sincere purpose of co-operating with your committee in procuring a draft of an act which should prove effective and workable and at the same time fair to the decent people in the motion-picture business, we respectfully request that when a bill is ready for action by the committee a copy shall be sent to us, and we shall be given an opportunity to appear before the committee and make such suggestions and criticisms as may occur to us.

NEW YORK, January 25, 1916.

(NOTE.—H. R. 456 was the original bill, which was amended by the committee and reintroduced as H. R. 15462.)

The Paramount Pictures Corporation has begun a publicity campaign evidently intended to line up exhibitors for the Hughes censorship bill. A two-column advertisement, in fine display, has appeared in the Washington Evening Star, headed "Sign this motion picture protest," and it continues: "Mothers, Fathers, Teachers, Ministers, Everybody who is interested in clean, wholesome photoplays, should read this and act.

"The future of the motion picture industry is in your hands.

"No sane exhibitor is going to persist in showing pictures that do not meet with the approval of his patrons. There are plenty of wholesome, entertaining and uplifting photoplays.

"Paramount Pictures are the production of Famous Players Film Co., Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co., the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Co., Pallas Pictures," etc.

The advertisement ends up with the following:

I Am a Protest and a Request

LEAVE ME AT THE BOX OFFICE

I am opposed to sensational and suggestive pictures. I want the best. I would like to see Paramount Pictures. I will support you in any conscientious effort toward bigger, cleaner, better pictures.

NEW CHAPLIN FILM

The Second Mutual-Chaplin Comedy, "The Fireman," Is Rapidly Nearing Completion at the Los Angeles Studio

The versatile Charlie—as what will he appear next? From his position as floorwalker he has ascended—or descended—to the role of "The Fireman," the second Chaplin-Mutual comedy going to the public June 12.

This comedy is not all fun and laughter but also contains some very dramatic scenes and breathless moments. The scenes show the real burning of two houses. These had been condemned by the Los Angeles Fire Department and were purchased outright by the Mutual-Chaplin studios and destroyed by fire to give the correct realistic touch to the picture.

In this picture Chaplin has abandoned his usual make-up and appears almost entirely in a fireman's uniform. But the public need not feel that they are going to be cheated out of some laughs on this account, for this fireman's garb is one of the funniest ever. Several members of the Los Angeles Fire Department have helped Chaplin out in these scenes, many of which were taken in a fire station located but a short distance from the studio. The fire pole, used by the firemen in sliding from the dormitory to the main floor at the alarm signal, has been utilized for some excruciatingly funny antics on the part of the comedian.

The entire cast which was engaged to appear in his support when he signed with the Mutual Company appear with him in this production. Edna Purviance, his leading lady, has a very important role to portray. Eric Campbell, Charlotte Minneau, Lloyd Bacon and Leo White also add their quota to the fun of the film.

In addition to the regular cast about two hundred extras were brought into play for the filming of the fire scenes, adding considerably to the realism of the production.

CONVENTION FOR PITTSBURGH

A State Convention and Big Exhibitors' Exposition Will Be Held in Pittsburgh on June 27, 28 and 29 Plans Crystalizing

Fred Herrington, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, has announced that on June 27, 28 and 29 the state convention and a big Exhibitors' Exposition will be held in Pittsburgh.

Just where the convention will be held has not as yet been decided upon, but a number of places have been under advisement. The Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce has tendered the use of the Pittsburgh Exposition Building, and it is possible that either the main building of this group or Machinery Hall will be selected.

A number of the Pittsburgh supply houses have promised their support and it is possible that the manufacturers will be well represented at the convention. The members of the state league intend to make the affair the biggst thing in the state.

Reservations for space will start shortly and film and supply houses have been asked to let the management know what their requirements will be, in order to book the exhibits as quickly as possible. It is hoped to make the exposition one which will be a credit to the industry.

A subcommittee in the Chicago city council has asked the law department to draw up an ordinance to allow motion picture shows within 200 feet of churches, providing a majority of the property owners in the vicinity consent. The same is to apply to hospitals, if the hospital authorities consent.

The Famous Soprano Visits Studio to See How the Pictures Are Made and Praises Beatriz Michelena, "California" Star

Madam Emma Calve, the famous soprano, claims that the jump from the operatic stage to acting before the screen is a small one. Madam Calve is a picture fan and says that the outstanding feature of the recent motion picture affairs is a development from the merely pretty fact epoch to the one demanding genuine talent and art as well.

Madam Calve is very emphatic in her praise of Beatriz Michelena, the California Motion Picture Corporation star, who she believes is equally wonderful for her beauty and her dramatic talent. The prima donna has followed Miss Michelena's work on the screen since her debut. Her interest in the actress is heightened because of the prominence of both Madam Calve and Fernando Michelena, the father of Beatriz, in operatic circles.

Madam Calve and her party visited the "California" studio at San Rafael where "The Woman Who Dared" is now being produced, with Miss Michelena in the stellar role. In this play Miss Michelena plays the part of a famous French opera singer and her characterization in this role received high commendation from the prima donna.

This play was a very good one to show to the great soprano the careful thought and the great amount of work which is put into a screen production. A very pretentious theater set was devised for this play. Not only is the set actual size, but it aspires to rival in rich appointment and architectural arrangement the most elegant opera houses of Europe. Much of the story of the play develops in this opera house where Miss Michelena appears as a prima donna. In the biggest of these scenes the stage is full set for the garden scene in Faust. The whole theater interior is built in detail for the camera. No detail has been omitted to make these opera scenes realistic. The roles of Faust, Mephisto and Valentin are taken by actors already schooled in the opera, and Fernando Michelena is directing the opera scenes.

Madam Calve expressed herself as very much impressed, she had never before seen a picture in the making and was intensely interested. Also she was pleased with the correctness of the European detail in the elaborate sets.

To wind up the day's pleasure Madam Calve was invited to do some acting herself before the camera, and the film was presented to her by the California producers as a souvenir of the day.

Audrey Munson in Allegorical Film

The American "Flying A" forces have just about completed the filming of an allegorical art masterpiece featuring Audrey Munson. This film, which has been under the personal direction of Samuel S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Company, is a seven-reel feature and will be unique in many ways.

Some beautiful dance scenes were taken on the estate of Francis T. Underhill, a noted landscape architect. Acting as assistant to Director Rea Berger in this scene was Miss Geneva Driscoll, a former pupil of Ruth St. Denis. Two hundred nymphs draped in flowing veils take part in this dance, the premier dancers being the characters of "Pandora" and "Evil," portrayed by Josephine Phillips and Mons. Dumont. One of the notable poses in which Miss Munson will be seen will be that of "Descending Night," the statue for which Miss Munson posed for the San Francisco Exposition.

The title and release date of this production will soon be announced.

Edward Coxen, Lizette Thorne and George Field are appearing in a two-part "Flying A" story, "Repaid," which was written by Anthony W. Coldeway and directed by Thomas Ricketts. This film was released on May 22 through the Mutual Service.

Another story of cowboys and horses in which Anna Little takes the leading feminine part will be a two-part "Mustang" entitled "Jack," to be released May 26. Frank Borzage, who plays the title role, directed the play and Jack Richardson and Dick La Reno also appear in the cast.

An adaptation of "The Reclamation," the story by Kenneth B. Clarke, has been made in five reels by the American Company. The play, which deals with one of the big reclamation projects in the desert regions of the great west, was directed by Edward Sloman. Franklyn Ritchie and Winnifred Greenwood as co-stars are supported by Margaret Nichols, Dick La Reno and Clarance Burton. This play will be released on May 25.

The manner in which Johnny Sheehan exposes Johnny Steppling's fraudulent dsigns in "Adjusting His Claim," called for a motion picture company to take scenes of a two-fisted battle which the two raged over a plowed field. When the battle was finished the score showed two ruined suits of clothes; but the actors were very well pleased with the double camera work—taking a picture of taking a picture. The result as shown on the screen is unusually interesting, as a motion picture is again taken of the running of the motion picture on the interior screen.

Do not clean lenses with a chamois leather; keep two old cambric handkerchiefs for the purpose. The inside surfaces of the lenses seldom need cleaning if the lenses fit properly in the mount. But always give the outside surfaces of the lenses of both the condenser and the objective a gentle polish before beginning an exhibition, because these surfaces, being always exposed, attract dust and moisture.

Hearing on New York Censorship Bill

BY CHARLES A. CONDON
New York Representative of Motography

THE crucial point in the censorship situation in New York attracted the film industry to Albany on Thursday, May 11, when a body composed of representatives of every producing and releasing concern in the United States gathered in Governor Whitman's executive chamber for the final hearing on the Cristman-Wheeler Moving Picture Bill which has passed both branches of the New York legislature, and is now before the governor for approval.

The significance of the governor's action on this bill is not limited to the confines of New York State. Many bills such as this are cropping up in various parts of the country. In fact, there are so many of them either pending or in dangerous stages of development that they take on the appearance of a censorship rash.

The Empire State is a big and powerful one. It has more motion picture theaters than any other state in the Union. While the governors and legislatures of other states are supreme in their own domains, nevertheless the course taken by the governor of a state so important and so close to the vital interests of the film business as New York will undoubtedly carry weight with them.

At the close of the hearing last week things looked very favorable for the film people. During the three-hour session the governor seemed deeply interested in the arguments put forth, and asked questions and checked up statements impartially.

At noon Thursday a special train unloaded the film aggregation in Albany. They were met at the capital by Governor Whitman. Several moving picture cameramen were on hand to immortalize the occasion. Someone remarked "That will have to be censored before it's shown." The governor laughed. It was a good sign. Not only is Mr. Whitman human, but he had met the reform-harassed film manufacturers and had found them to be regular people.

At 2:30 the hearing began.

The speakers for the motion picture body protested against the censorship efforts of Messrs. Cristman and Wheeler in the following orders: Bainbridge Colby, Walter W. Irwin, Dr. Cranston Brenton, Dr. Parkhurst, L. F. Scott, Ex-Mayor Cutler of Rochester, Mrs. Peck, James P. Holland representing Samuel Gompers, A. G. Myers representing District Attorney Swann of New York, Morris Simmons, William M. Seabury, Martin W. Littleton and J. Robert Rubin.

The best speeches were made by Bainbridge Colby, editor of Hearst's Boston American, Walter W. Irwin, general manager of V. L. S. E., Inc., and Martin W. Littleton, famed in legal circles for his brilliance and success at the bar and an important figure in national politics. Each of these three concentrated upon some vital point in the argument. Mr. Colby attacked the bill upon its narrow qualities and unfairness. Mr. Irwin laid stress upon the destructive financial inroads it would make into the film industry. And Mr. Littleton confined his speech to the unconstitutionalities and practical impossibilities of the bill, venturing once into a discussion of the mental capacity of the person who drew up the bill and the small portion intellects which apparently co-operated with him upon the creation of his masterpiece.

Bainbridge Colby, introduced by Mr. Rubin, lost no time in verbally trespassing on the grounds of the censorship enthusiasts. "Because a movement emanates from or is backed by churches and Sunday schools," he said, "does not necessarily mean that it is just or reflects public opinion. For years the churches have censured each other's beliefs, services, practices, and even bibles. If we are going back to the old days of Salem, we might as well call the witches from their graves and tolerate witchcraft under its proper name." Mr. Colby further stated that a desire to do reform work marked the dawn of intelligence. In illustrating his point, he told the story of the straw man in the "Wizard of Oz," who, upon being given life and brains, beamed intelligently upon the audience and immediately launched upon a propaganda of reform.

After naming several instances of where state censorship bodies have proved themselves expensive luxuries capable of inane action, Mr. Irwin gave a concise and conservative estimate of what the approval of the Cristman-Wheeler Bill would cost the industry in one year. It totals $1,813,125.00. He reached these figures in this way: During the year 1915, 9,670 reels were passed upon by the National Board of Review. Placing the value of these duplicates at four cents per foot or $40.00 a reel, there would have to be filed with the Board of Regents $386,800 worth of film during the year. On 9,670 reels the fees required by the bill would amount to $338,450.00.

It is safe to say that the number of reels now in use in the State of New York is 50 per cent more than the figures indicated by the work of the National Board in 1915; in other words, that there are now upon the market in this state 78,300 reels. These, at the fee rate, provided in the bill for the positive prints reviewed and duplicates thereof, make a total of $507,675.00. Accordingly, 14,505 reels (the number of so-called original positive reels to be reviewed and filed with the Board of Regents) at a production cost of 4c per foot, makes an additional loss of $580,200.00 to the industry. Altogether these grievances amount to $1,813,125.00.

Dr. Cranston Brenton, of the National Board of Review, spoke upon the voluntary work done by the National Board, Governor Whitman evidenced considerable interest in the organization by asking many questions regarding its membership, purposes and duties.

Dr. Parkhurst, a Brooklyn minister, outlined film censorship as one form of violation against freedom of speech. He said that if he had to write out his sermons and present them for approval to a committee of three before preaching them to his people he would not do any preaching.

Ex-Mayor Cutler of Rochester, speaking for the Chamber of Commerce, was very brief and pointed in embodying his thought that if New York had any fault at present, it was in having too many laws.

Mrs. Peck, representing the Federation of Women's Clubs, made effective use of the three minutes in which she had to speak for three million women. In concluding her talk, she said that from the standpoint of domestic economy, she saw no reason why, in a family of forty-eight, each of that number should sweep the parlor rug each week.

Representatives of Samuel Gompers and District Attorney Swann read letters from those parties, denouncing the bill, into the Record. Morris Simmons spoke for the Jewish community of New York. William M. Seabury, legal counsel for the Motion Picture Board of Trade, allowed himself one minute for his attack upon the proposed bill.

Martin W. Littleton, representing David W. Griffith, went after the technical errors in the bill. Citing a case in which a designated body was to regulate a certain gas company's rates as a direct parallel, Mr. Littleton quoted the judge's decision in which he ruled against the bill, stating that a statute which did not give both parties equal rights was not valid.

The best speakers for the opposing side were Canon Chase, the Reverend Father Dunne, Attorney Francis Sullivan, and Ella Boole of the W. C. T. U., all of whom are residents of Brooklyn.

The most important portions of the pending Cristman-Wheeler bill are as follows:

ARTICLE 48.

Section 1250. Board of censors. The state board of censors is hereby established, to consist of three members, to be known as moving picture censors. The members of such board shall be appointed by the board of regents of the university of the state of New York. The full term of office of any such censor shall be six years from the first day of January on which the term of his predecessor expires.

The members of such board shall each receive an annual salary of four thousand dollars. The board of regents shall employ a secretary and such clerks and agents for such board of censors as the board of regents may deem necessary or proper to carry out the provisions of this article, and fix their compensation.

§ 1251. Powers and duties of the board of censors. The board of censors shall cause to be examined, by its members or agents, all moving picture films or reels, and report to the regents its approval of such films or reels as it shall find to be moral and proper and its disapproval of such films or reels as it shall find to be sacrilegious, obscene, indecent or immoral or tending to debase or corrupt the morals. Each report submitted shall be accompanied with the film or reel to which it relates. Upon each moving picture film or reel having the approval of the board, there shall be placed the words "approved by the board of censors of the state of New York," accompanied with the date of such approval and a serial number, to be assigned thereto by the board.

The regents may, in their discretion, by majority vote, revoke such approval of any such film or reel at any time. Such revocation shall be complete upon personal service of notice of such application upon the proprietor of such film or reel or upon any agent of such proprietor having charge of the leasing, sale or exhibition of any such film or reel. Subject to the supervision and control of the regents, the board of censors shall have general power and authority to supervise and regulate the display of all moving picture films or reels in all places within the state.

It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to exhibit any moving picture after August first, nineteen hundred and sixteen, unless the film or reel therefor shall have been approved by the board under the provisions of this article, nor unless the words, date and number placed thereon by the board of censors, and the identification matter in the case of a duplicate, are displayed on the screen or surface on which the picture is shown for at least six seconds at the conclusion of the picture.

When the board of regents revoke the approval by the board of censors of a film or reel, as provided in this article, they shall state to the board their reason for such revocation or approval, and the secretary of the board shall transmit to the proprietor of any film or reel a notice setting forth the action of the regents, accompanied with the film or reel.

For each examination made by the board under this article, the vendor, lessor, or proprietor of the film or reel examined shall pay into the state treasury a fee of five dollars for each five hundred feet of film, and for each major fraction thereof in excess of five hundred feet or of an exact multiple of five hundred feet, but the fee in any case shall be not less than five dollars.

If a duplicate of any approved film or reel be made by any such vendor, lessor or proprietor and pictures be exhibited therewith, such vendor, lessor or proprietor shall pay into the state treasury an additional fee for each duplicate amounting to one-half of the fee above provided for an examination of the original.

Provided, however, that no fee shall be required for such examination, nor for a duplicate or duplicates, of any film to be used in any miniature motion picture machine for educational, social or church purposes, where the film is of a size and perforation differing from the standard as used in theatrical machines.

§3. This act shall take effect immediately.

Assembly, No. 2077. 3.

Loew Gets Police for New York

The time required by the Marcus Loew chain of theaters in Greater New York to decide that the Essanay-Chaplin comedy feature "Police!" was needed for the entertainment of the thousands of patrons who daily visit these theaters, was only the time necessary to inspect the film.

"We'll take it and play it a week in each of our theaters," Mr. Loew's representative told the General Film Service man, when the last scene on the film had faded away.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

THERE is one point I would like to impress upon the seekers after knowledge, and it is that I really am just an ordinary man and not a clairvoyant, mind-reader, or vested with second sight. I am only too willing to answer any questions you may ask, but I cannot answer them intelligently unless I have some idea of the conditions which prompted these questions. The answer to a man running a 300-seat house and the man running a 3,000-seat house would be very different. Also the operating conditions in different theaters may be very dissimilar. A knowledge of the situation of your theater and the class of people to whom you cater would also help. All of which leads up to the request that you kindly give me more information concerning yourself and your house when sending in your questions, so that I in turn will be able to give you more information in the answer.

29—I have been wondering if it would be worth the added expense to have ushers in my theater. I have been simply letting the audience seat themselves but two or three of my patrons have asked that I have ushers.

If your patrons have felt the need of ushers to such an extent that they have asked for their service that ought to be sign enough that you do need them. In a large house they are really a necessity as their presence eliminates a great deal of unnecessary walking up and down the aisle a number of times before he is able to watch the screen. The ushers can keep track of just how many seats are vacant and in what part of the house, and as the people come in can quickly and quietly lead them to these seats. Otherwise the patron coming into the darkened room may wander up and down the isle a number of times before he is able to discern just where there is a vacant seat. If the usher carries a small electric flash he can show the seat so that the newcomer can readily find it without disturbing the people in front of whom he has to pass by stumbling along in the dark. There should be one usher for each aisle, unless yours is a small theater. The ushers do not add much to your expense account and they do add greatly to the service rendered to your patrons. And anything which adds to the comfort and enjoyment of the theater adds to the popularity of your house.

30—In the last few months I have received several requests from exchanges requesting that I give them the name of my favorite trade paper. I have read Motography for years but I do not see why I should tell the exchanges what paper I read. I feel that they may be working with some publication and if I told them I read Motography—and none other—the subscription solicitors of competing magazines would hound me to death. Please advise me why I should honor a request for this information if there is a reason.

There is a reason back of these requests, I believe, but I do not think that reason is to help subscription solicitors. Neither do I believe that your answer to this request would result in your being hounded to subscribe to other trade papers. As near as I can figure out this idea back of the requests, the information is desired to serve as a guide in the placing of advertising. The producer naturally wants to exploit his wares before the exhibitor. This is his market and he must in some way create a demand for the goods he has to sell. The best way of creating this demand is by advertising. Therefore, one of the most logical places for him to spend his advertising appropriation is in the motion picture trade papers which are supposed to go to the exhibitors all over the country—the trade papers which were primarily started for the benefit of and to fill the demand created by the exhibitor. Thus before he spends his money for advertising in any of these journals he wants to find out whether the exhibitors really read them—he wants to find out which one, or which two, are read by the greatest number of exhibitors, for those are the ones which he believes will bring the greatest returns for the money expended. Believing he can ascertain this from the exhibitor himself, he writes to him and asks for the information.

There may be other reasons back of this desire for information but I believe this is the basic one. Now the question arises, "should I honor a request for this information?" This is really a question for the exhibitor to decide individually, but let us look at this matter from both sides and see what arguments we can find for and against giving this information.

In the first place the exhibitor receiving this request is rather antagonized, he feels as our friend did who sent in the letter, that there is a nigger in the woodpile. He feels that he is being worked for somebody or something which he does not know about, and he does not care to be worked this way. He feels that the exchangeman is asking him a personal question which is no concern of his, and his first thought is "What business is that of his?" And probably he throws the letter into the waste paper basket and thinks no more about it. Thus is established a foundation for ill feeling not only between the exchangeman and the exhibitor but also between the exhibitor and the trade journal.

I haven't a doubt that sometimes this inquiry is instigated by a magazine; that the advertising solicitor tells the exchangeman their journal is the one and only one in which to advertise; that their paper is the only one read by the exhibitors, and suggests that the exchangemen write to the theater men asking which magazine they read, and then he begins a campaign among the exhibitors to cast a vote for the paper which he represents. This may be a perfectly legitimate advertising policy but if the magazine wants to carry on a campaign of this kind why do it under cover of the exchangeman's skirts? Why not come right out in the open and themselves write to the exhibitor and ask him if he will not boost their paper to help them secure advertising contracts? If you can discourage this sort of thing by refusing to answer these inquiries then you are certainly justified in your silence.

Even at its best this circularizing method is not a true test for so large a percentage do refuse to answer or forget to answer. It really is testimony based on very circumstantial evidence, and does not give a true idea of the situation. Probably not more than ten per cent of the exhibitors answer these questions, with half of those answers signed by subordinate employes; and even this may be a large percentage. Suppose out of fifty inquiries four answers were received, and it happened that all four theater men read the same magazine, which we will call A. Also it might be equally true (though improbable) that the other forty-six who did not answer, all read another magazine, which we will call B. In looking over these answers as a guide the prospective advertiser sees that there are four boosts for A but none for B. Therefore he places his advertising contract with A as he believes it reaches the greatest number of exhibitors, and ignores B altogether. This is neither fair to A, to B, nor to the exchangeman. It is not fair to A because he cannot live up to his end of the contract. He cannot place that advertising before more exhibitors than any other paper could have done because his publication is not read by more as the count would seem to denote. It is not fair to B because on the basis of the number of exhibitors reading that paper he should have had the contract but failed to receive it because his followers failed to answer. It is not fair to the advertiser because he has been misinformed and has not placed his advertising where it will do him the most good. But as he started this thing and it is all his own fault perhaps we feel justified in saying that he received what he deserved.

But this shows in what manner the trade journal is injured by the exhibitor who does not answer. His silence gives wrong impressions and leads to false estimates. Had the readers of B sent in their votes the advertiser would probably have divided his advertising appropriation equally between the two and A, B and the advertiser would all have been benefited.

This question might be looked on as a form of co-operation, the producer co-operating with the exhibitor and the exhibitor co-operating with the publication. The answering of these questions, or the asking of a question in return as to why this information was desired might be the means of establishing a very friendly basis of intercourse. The ideal condition means the co-operation of all parts and branches of the industry and this might be one means of leading to this desired end.

Let us as theater managers look at this question from a personal standpoint. Let us assume that a man with a family who were fond of motion pictures, had just moved into the town where you were running a theater. Let us suppose that this man was very careful what kind of pictures his family saw on the screen, and wanted only the best plays to be witnessed by them. In an effort to find out what would be the best theater to which to give his patronage he wrote a letter to one of the public men of the town and asked if he would be so kind as to tell him what theater or theaters were run on the best principles in that town. Would you as a theater manager in that town want that public man to answer that letter or would you rather he threw it into the waste paper basket and ignore it? If he did not answer it at all the man might think that the theaters did not have a very high standing but that as a public man he did not wish to condemn them, and the man might decide not to become a regular patron of any theater. On the other hand his silence might mean that the man would go around and find out for himself and so be able to form a more unbiased opinion.

If the official did answer that letter and recommend, as he probably would if he were at all fair minded, three or four theaters saying they all were good, that would give you all a boost and probably the man would try one after the other and become a regular patron of more than one as each would have some special thing that he liked on its program.

Isn't this exactly the same proposition we have been discussing in the letter of the exchangeman? Doesn't your silence do more harm to all the trade papers than even your open sanction of only one would do? If you read only one trade paper—all right, but let me tell you right here that it is to your advantage to read them all.

An Ultimatum From the Women's Clubs

AT the biennial meeting of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, to be held in New York this month, the New York Woman's Press Club will introduce a resolution which it adopted unanimously at its own meeting last week. The General Federation expects an attendance at its biennial of twenty thousand delegates from local clubs. The resolution, therefore, becomes invested with some responsibility, and is worth studying. Accordingly we reproduce it here:

> Whereas, the Woman's Press Club recognizes that the motion picture is more widely read today than any other form of printed publication, and that many millions of people daily in all walks of life are visiting motion picture theaters, our own families among the number; and
> Whereas, many of these pictures are far from the standard of literature we would have in our homes—sensational melodrama, while others are immoral, unchaste and salacious; and
> Whereas, some superb pictures are also shown, excellent in all essentials of quality, pictures well meriting the patronage of the educated and cultured; and
> Whereas, by this evidence we know that producers are in position to produce and can produce high-grade, clean pictures; now, therefore, be it
> Resolved, that we, the Woman's Press Club of New York City, do hereby request you [name of company or individual] to devote the efforts of your studio to the production of motion pictures of such quality and character as will merit the support of ourselves and our homes; and be it further
> Resolved, that it is the intention and purpose of the Woman's Press Club to support and patronize pictures of this desirable type and to withhold our patronage from unworthy pictures, and this shall be the attitude of the Woman's Press Club and its members in all club, church, school and social activities with which they may be associated; and be it further
> Resolved, that the names of those producers who will devote their studios to worthy pictures will be published in the club mediums, and every effort will be made to help the producer of high-class films.
> Finally Resolved, that an official copy of this resolution be sent to every motion picture producer of importance.

This resolution was introduced by Jane Stannard Johnson, already known to motion picture circles. Mrs. Johnson admits that "there is almost always a difference of opinion between parents concerning the same production, and this is where the producers have difficulty in making pictures that are universally praised." What little is known of human nature would seem to indicate that the acknowledged difficulty is without solution; but the resolution sets out to solve it by force—the force of organized opinion against disorganized. The means, however, is worthy if the result is good.

It is easy to criticise anything. It is no trouble at all for us to point out that the second "Whereas" seems to imply that the majority of pictures are sensational melodrama, immoral, unchaste or salacious, while the third paragraph, immediately following, casually mentions that "some superb pictures are also shown." This is so obviously unfair that it must have been unintentional, and we trust it will be corrected before it is put before the General Federation.

And in the same paragraph it is said that these "superb pictures also shown" merit the patronage of the "educated and cultured." Would the Woman's Press Club of New York City, serene in its own erudition and culture, censor those pictures which fall short of the esthetic, and deprive the uneducated and cultureless "other half" of its choice of entertainment?

Furthermore, it might be argued that the final paragraph of the resolution is inadequate. It directs that a copy be sent to every producer "of importance"—which is carrying coals to Newcastle. The producers of importance are not the ones who, if any, are in need of the resolution. If pictures worth the blacklisting of the Women's Clubs are made in consequential quantities, it is the unimportant producers who are making them—and they, by its own provision, are immune to the beneficent influence of the resolution.

Club resolutions are not, as a rule, as portentious as they sound. In a number of years of experience with them, we have seen few that changed the course of industry or art. Nevertheless, as this one is to be passed upon by some twenty thousand women, each presumably representing a hundred or so other women, it may have its effect.

Frankly, though, we have little faith in the usefulness of any of these efforts. We know that the total output of motion pictures will assay a far higher percentage of purity than the speaking stage, or literature, or any of the other popular arts with which the pictures are so often compared. It is not the picture's culpability, but its accessibility, that makes it so vulnerable to attack. Literature is concealed between covers; the speaking stage behind a high price and a limited capacity. The picture is before all the world, for friend and enemy, liberal and conservative, to gaze upon and criticise.

All of these quasi-public demonstrations against certain indefinite and unidentified pictures lead back, under analysis, to the children in the audience and the mentally irresponsible; in other words, to those of lesser intellect than the movers of the resolutions. It is a case of the protective instinct perverted. The reasonable way would be to discipline the immature mind in its selection of entertainment, and not to crush the art down to the level of the least of its admirers.

Chicago Is Doing Her Part

EARLY as it is, half of the motion picture exhibitors of North America are already interested in the Chicago convention of next July, and are giving indications of a determination to be present. If the predictions are realized—and they are made by men who know—the Chicago event will be one of the biggest, not only in our industry, but in all industrial history.

That the thousands who attend the convention and exposition will make a tremendous profit on their small investment of money and time we have already declared, and here reiterate. Not an exhibitor but will learn something to his advantage in the vast assembly of his fellows and among the exhaustive displays of all that pertains to the art of picture presentation, however sophisticated and experienced he may be. That is the directly selfish side of the big show, which induces live exhibitors to attend for their own immediate gain.

Then there is the other side of the event—the good of the industry—whose direct return is less obvious, but whose dividends in a short time will be even greater. The power of several thousand men, combined for a single purpose, is so obvious that no argument should be needed to induce any exhibitor to join in the big work. Every man who attends the convention adds his mite to help build up a powerful machine to work always for the good of the business—and the good of the business means the good of every man in it.

For such a machine, made up of thousands of live, earnest, ambitious units, there are dozens of tasks awaiting a strong hand. No need to explain to any motion picture man what those tasks are—we all know them, and we all know that, united, we can perform them; divided, we must fail. Every man of the thousands of exhibitors who read this is one of those units whose strength is needed for the grand assembly.

At this meeting will be elected to office men who, in the eyes of the public and the press, will represent the whole industry of picture presentation. Committees will be appointed, and resolutions will be passed, and work will be started that mean as much to the man who holds aloof as to the man who originates the activities. Common self-interest, as well as the permanent advancement of all the relations with the public and the press, and the inter-relations of the business, demand everybody's attendance and attention.

Chicago is doing her part to make this convention the event of all motion picture history. All the exhibitors are asked to do in return is to get on a train and come.

Paramount's Stand in Proposed Merger

PRESIDENT HODKINSON EXPLAINS HARMONIOUS RELATIONS

THE rumored motion picture merger, linking up Famous Players, Lasky and the Triangle interests, has been commented on by W. W. Hodkinson, president of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, exclusive distributors of the Famous Players, Lasky, Morosco and Pallas productions.

"We favor any combinations that will bring about economy in the production end of the business and at the same time maintain a high quality of pictures," said Mr. Hodkinson in discussing the matter for Paramount Progress. "Motion-picture producers have been fighting each other very bitterly for stars, directors, authors, staffs and copyrights; on that account they have run up the cost of their productions exceedingly high. Any combination to eliminate this, to obviate the destruction of special scenery after it has only been used once, any regulating of enormous salaries paid screen stars and staffs, any step that will increase the earning power of the producer without interfering with the standard of his product is a good thing. The inevitable readjustment of the proportions between stars, producers and authors is far better reached by such a means than through the collapse which seems destined to follow the present period of inflation.

"Aside from that, Paramount is not particularly concerned with it, because Paramount is not a producing company. It is a distributing company. And if, by combining, the producers for our program could have cut down expenses and increased their profits, it would have been ideal from their standpoint and certainly not a cause for regret on our part. There is, however, something to regret in what was coincident with the rumor. It is a lamentable fact that a discussion of such merger has been capitalized into sensational stories—not manufactured by the newspapers, but obviously by persons outside newspaper offices. We regret exceedingly that such a situation has created a condition that might make it appear as if film stock were being manipulated; and even more to be regretted is the fact that even this brief publicity has been used as a selling argument to alienate Paramount exhibitors. Of course, such a condition placed our producing companies in a position doubly embarrassing, considering the cordial relations that exist between them and Paramount.

"Mr. Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Company, issued an official statement in which he put down his views on the conserving of productive expenses:

"In part he said: 'The genuine and most important object of the affiliation of film interests for which these conferences were arranged is the tremendous advantage that will thus be created for the production of bigger and better pictures. The coalition of producing facilities and equipment and staffs that would result from this arrangement would increase the efficiency of each of the companies involved in a remarkable degree. . . . Such an affiliation of interests as is now contemplated would remove at once all the necessary obstables that have so far impeded the fullest progress of the photoplay art.'

"Paramount is heartily in accord with those views of Mr. Zukor. It would be in sympathy with any movement that would work for the continuation of its policy of better pictures.

"The cost of production, of course, is something that we know comparatively little about. We know something about the manufacturers' problem in paying for stars and controlling the services of authors; but that is something entirely outside our province. What we are interested in is in disposing of the products of these producers, which products, by the way, we control for a period of twenty-four years, as yet. We have definite contracts for so many pictures on certain terms, and have an ample volume of business continually increasing to warrant our meeting all of our obligations to the producers. That is why our producers felt called upon at once to make such vigorous denials of the sensational stories that unfortunately had been spread broadcast. Mr. Goldfish, vice-president and general manager of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, quickly crystallized their position in relation to us when he said:

William W. Hodkinson.

"'I have read the stories that appeared in the various newspapers and wish emphatically to deny that any negotiations have been concluded. The Lasky company has no intention of releasing its productions through any other distributing concern than Paramount Pictures Corporation in the United States.'

"Shortly afterwards, the Triangle Film Corporation issued a statement saying in part that: 'The new combination of interests is by no means the far-reaching affair indicated in unauthorized reports of some weeks ago.'

"Of course, by 'reports' Triangle meant sensational newspaper stories and possibly a circular letter that was distributed on the 28th of April by a well-known stock and bond house. It was to house customers. In speaking of this combination, it said: 'It is estimated that this (the combination) would save $3,000,000 annually to the Triangle interests alone, and probably save $1,000,000 to the other companies involved. This saving alone should be sufficient to return very satisfactory dividends on the new stock. . . . It is rumored that the present Triangle stock will be exchanged share for share.'

"Paramount has every confidence in its producers and its producers have every confidence in Paramount. Paramount anticipates nothing but the continued performance of their contracts—a continuance of better pictures for better people."

VOGUE'S BATTERY OF COMICS

Ben Turpin Will Hereafter Add His Antics to Those of the Other Comedians in This Active Company.

Ben Turpin, the well-known comedian, has been added to the force of funny men who appear on the screen under the Vogue brand, and future releases will show Mr. Turpin in new laugh-provoking comedies. The first picture in which the comedian will appear will be

"National Nuts," which will be released May 28, and is being produced under the direction of Jack Dillon.

The comedy was filmed during the opening season of the Coast League and the game was between Los Angeles and Salt Lake. Turpin will be seen as Peerless Frank Chance's greatest twirler. When he appeared on the field eighteen thousand fans wondered, but the next moment it dawned on them that a picture company was at work, and all eyes were focused on Turpin, who, dressed in a suit large enough for a player three times his size, "wound up" and delivered in his own unique expression of baseball comedy.

In addition to Turpin's comic ability the Vogue forces already include Paddy McGuire, who has familiarized the American world with the antics of the characterization of "Bungling Bill." Paddy has a most careless disregard of "safety first," and will take a fall out of a third or fourth story window with the same nonchalance that he will submit to being run over by an automobile.

Rena Rogers also contributes her share to these comedy scenes and is an able assistant in all fun making.

Arthur Moon assumes all the heavy roles of the plays and can alike enact the heavy lover and heavy villain parts.

Madge Kirby is starring in a Vogue comedy entitled "A Plane Story," under the direction of Rube Miller. One scene in this play calls for the heroine's ascent to a considerable height in an airship and a parachute jump therefrom. Mr. Miller was planning to have Miss Kirby doubled by some air-man, but the nervy little actress declared she would not submit to this—and she had her way. She went up to a height of about 1,500 feet and made the jump. Every one but the camera man shut their eyes. The landing was made safely, however, and Miss Kirby insisted that the scene be retaken to be certain of success—but the director had thrills enough and felt sure of the effectiveness of the first shot.

Steady pictures depend on two conditions, a perfect film and a perfect machine, including the stand.

TO TEACH PREPAREDNESS

Activities of the Various Mutual Producing Companies and Some Interesting Facts About Plays and Players

The "Detekters," being the laughable exploits of two detectives, was released by the Thanhouser-Mutual on May 15. Claude Cooper and Frank McNish, the well known comedians, are featured in this comedy. A series of comedies featuring these two laugh-makers are now being prepared in the New Rochelle studios for early release.

Gertrude Robinson, a Gaumont-Mutual star, has sent a request to F. G. Bradford, general manager, that she be allowed to do her part toward national "preparedness" by appearing in a number of pictures which will make a great spiritual and patriotic appeal to the men who are to be recruited and those already in training, and also will be educating the women to the part they must play in the conflict. Mr. Bradford is considering the proposition of the patriotic pictures. They will not be issued as a serial but will all be hung upon the same thread of national appeal.

The true spirit of the newspaper office has been attained in the American-Mutual two-part human interest drama, "The Touch on the Key." The whole play reeks with the hurry and bustle and one thing coming on top of another atmosphere of the modern newspaper office. Vivian Rich, Alfred Vosburg and George Periolat have the leading roles in this play.

"Four Months," a three-reel "Flying A" production written by Karl Coolridge, also features Vivian Rich and Alfred Vosburg.

Visitors to Coney Island this summer will be given an opportunity to become acquainted with the Bostock collection of 130 trained animals which have been appearing in productions by the Horsley-Mutual. These animals, accompanied by their trainers, are being shipped east and will be one of the features at Luna Park, Coney Island, this season. During the season the animals will be used in a number of pictures to be produced in the arena for release through Mutual.

The second release of "Reel Life" was given to the public on May 14. The Blackfeet Indians, photographed in their own home near Glacier National Park, form the subject of this release. A demonstration of the Indian sign language is given, their religious ceremonies and other customs are shown. As subsidiary numbers of the same reel are views of cuttle-fish and a colony of ants.

L. N. Burrud, Mutual Weekly cameraman with Gen. Pershing's forces in Mexico, was one of the party designated to visit Chihuahua for the purpose of identifying Villa, whose exhumed body was being brought to the state capital by Carranza's soldiers for the purpose of identification. Mr. Burrud had known Villa intimately and although he considered the trip to identify the Mexican a wild goose chase, nevertheless he obtained a number of interesting pictures during his three days' stay in Chihuahua. These will be shown later in the Mutual Weekly.

If the carbons are new, allow them to burn a few minutes before starting the projection, so that a good crater may be formed on the top carbon and to give the light time to settle down steadily and to become quite silent.

What Theater Men Are Doing

AN OPEN FORUM

Seattle's Greatest Publicity Stunt

By A. R. M. Sutton

Special Representative for Motography.

MANAGER John Hamrick of the Rex Theater is on record as having worked the greatest advertising stunt ever seen in Seattle. Mr. Hamrick has the smallest first run house in the city, but in spite of this, when the date for the release of the Chaplin feature, "Carmen," was announced, he resolved to get it.

John Hamrick.

With all Seattle's larger theaters bidding for it, Mr. Hamrick outbid them, paying a record price. Realizing that such a picture deserved big advertising he set to work right away. The first showing of the film was to be Sunday, April 16. For a week before he had the town well papered with huge posters showing a picture of Charlie as Darn Hosiery and announcing the price he had to pay to outbid the other exhibitors. Next, he arranged with the Seattle Star to run a Chaplin contest to take place Saturday noon, April 22, in Bon Marche Park, in the center of the downtown district. Then in some unaccountable way he managed to persuade the editor of the Star to feature this contest on the front page of his paper for five consecutive days. The result was so many entries that Mr. Hamrick began to wonder whether there would be room in the park for them all.

Before noon there were thousands of people lined up along the sidewalks waiting to see the parade. Led by Mr. Hamrick and Tom North, northwest manager of the V-L-S-E film service, in an automobile, followed by a band, three hundred Charlie Chaplins, the judges' car, and several other decorated autos, the parade marched to Bon Marche Park, where the prizes were awarded. For ten blocks or more the young imitators cavorted in true Chaplinesque style, accompanied by a shouting, horn-blowing, hat-waving crowd of onlookers. It was such a big thing that it held up street car traffic for twenty minutes.

At the bandstand Mr. Hamrick put the contestants through their paces, then awarded the prizes and announced that moving pictures of the parade and contest would be shown at the Rex along with the "Burlesque on Carmen." (Mr. Hamrick had found the demand so great that it had been necessary to get an extension of another week in order to let everybody see the picture.) The judges were Norman Hackett, leading man at the Metropolitan Theater; the mayor's secretary, Jimmy Crehan; D. S. Tobias of the Northern Pacific (just a picture fan); Manager Hamrick, and Tom North.

The winner of the first prize of $25 cash, given by Mr. Hamrick, was just thirteen, but was so good that he was engaged to impersonate Chaplin during the remainder of the run on "Carmen." The winner of the second prize, also thirteen, is said to be the only red-headed Chaplin in existence. He received a $25 gold watch given by Tom North, V-L-S-E manager. The third prize, won by one of the older contestants, was a $25 suit of clothes given by Chauncey Wright, president of the Seattle Restaurant Company. The fourth and fifth prizes, won by boys of eight and fourteen respectively, were annual passes to the Rex.

The papers gave the event much news space. The Star ran a front page picture of the parade and a story, including the "apology" of the red-headed Chaplin boy, whose baggy pants slipped down during his antics.

From this it is clear that Mr. Hamrick believes in doing big things in a big way, yet never shirking the details. Ever since the announcement of Kleine's new Billie Burke serial, "Gloria's Romance," all Seattle theaterdom has been agog with excitement and gossip as to who would get it. Again John Hamrick surprised them all by taking off the prize. As soon as he closed the contract he had all the town papered and has begun changing all the seats in the balcony into Billie Burke loges and putting in a separate new ventilation system for the balcony, and heaven only knows what special advertising stunt he has up his sleeve, for at this writing it is still a week before the new serial will be shown, the first day being Sunday, May 14.

Mr. Hamrick is a firm believer in the contest as a means of advertising. He has run nearly every sort, from word and essay contests to the Chaplin variety. One very successful one was a few weeks ago when he was showing "The Misleading Lady." He offered several prizes to women only for the best essay on:

"Does the women of today prefer the cave-man methods of making love?"

The manager of the Rex is also quite an artist at planning lobby displays, which never fail to attract the attention of the passer-by. In a recent showing of "The Island of Regeneration" he had the dome-like roof of the box office covered with a rocky scene of the desert island and cut-outs of the heroine, dressed in her flowing hair, decorating the scene. All around the walls of the lobby were cut-outs of parrots, and two live parrots in cages hung from the awning.

The Rex has been a success since the first week in February when, with its name changed from "The Melbourne" to its present one and under its new manager, it opened its doors to a week of good business; while, with two feet of snow on Seattle's streets and the car service blocked, other houses were doing only a fair business or none at all.

Mr. Hamrick's career as a manager began ten years ago in Kansas City. When he came to Seattle he built the Queen Anne Theater on Queen Anne Hill, the second residential district theater built in Seattle. He gave that up to build the Colonial on Fourth avenue, which became under his management one of the leading downtown houses.

One of Mr. Hamrick's chief tenets in his business is "Courtesy," not alone courtesy of employes toward the public, but courtesy from every one to everybody else, and he begins by setting the example himself. In fact many attribute his success mostly to his pleasing personality. Everywhere he has been in business he has left many well-wishing friends behind, and the writer can testify to the fact that there is one hustler who does not consider it necessary to be sharp and brusque in manner in order to hustle.

Booming a Feature to Big Pay

By J. E. Rickards

Phoenix Amusement Company, Phoenix, Arizona

We recount our splendid recent success with the exploitation of the picture "Hop," from the Blue Bird program. It offered unusual opportunities for advertising.

First, we took advantage of the word "hop," a colloquialism of the under-world for opium, by sending to our patrons a post card with the word "Hop" in display type. Under this head we ran terms, the opium smoker or "hop head," as he is called. For instance, the ashes from the pill of opium is called "Yen Shee." This we explained; and each of the several others used "Hop Duey," bowl of the pipe; "Yen Hok," the needle used by the smoker to hold the pill over the fire, and so on. At the bottom we appended a line which read: "The U. S. Government spends thousands annually to control this fast growing evil, not alone in the underworld, but in the ranks of society."

This we followed up with a window ad. This attracted so much attention that state exhibitors sent for the idea to use when they played the picture. We secured an old opium "layout," as the pipe and lamp is called, and co-operated with a local clothing man, who supplied his window decorator and window. A bunk with curtains half drawn was fixed up with a reclining figure of man with his back to the street side of the window. His trousers lay on a broken chair, several cigarette butts strewn around the foot of the table which contained the "layout," spoke eloquently of the "hop head's" second best bet, the cigarette. A playing card with an imitation of a daub of opium half used, was placed beside the pipe and lamp.

A simple card in the window read: " 'Hop,' a five-reel picture showing the evils of the drug habit will be shown next week at the Columbia Theater."

Our business with this picture alone was something uncanny. People stopped by the thousands to view the "hop" window. Here, where "hop" smoking was a common thing some years ago, the old timers retold tales of the days when the state was wide open, and the new comer listened and became a patron of the theater to get a view of the "Hop" picture. It worked wonders.

This is only one of a number of things we did to exploit this picture.

We dressed the ushers in the new Chinese costumes bought from the Chinese store. The girl in the ticket window wore a mandarin coat, penciled her eyes to almond-shape and adorned her coiffure with a brace of chop suey sticks in lieu of hair ornaments. The front of the theater, the lobby and the side lights were all decorated with chinese lanterns, while incense burned in pots at convenient spots in the foyer and auditorium. The effect was further enhanced by our man at the Fotoplayer, who served incidental music with a decided Chinese flavor.

Patrons Want Pictures with Real Plots

By A. E. Van Croix

Manager Bijou Theater, Jamestown, N. Y.

While I have followed the picture business for the past fifteen years I have not been actively interested all the time, but the business has always been of great interest to me, and I have made a study of it and have reached the conclusion that the day of the moving picture is fast becoming a thing of the past.

What I mean by the moving picture is the common one, two and three-reel subjects of no great merit. I have made a study of my patrons and their desires and I find that they want real entertainment, they want pictures with a real plot in them, something with a kick and a punch, and not only that but they want some great star as well.

The pictures that I find the most successful are the ones that contain some sensational stuff. I have tried educational features but met with no great desire or demand for them. I use the best features that I can obtain, such as Fox, World and Mutual. I also use the Chaplins and have been fortunate in securing the exclusive use of the Chaplin films. I give the business close personal attention, keep my theater clean, well ventilated and inviting, treat my patrons courteously and make them feel at home. I pay close attention to the projection, using the Simplex machines, and avoiding as far as possible any stops or waits. To the above and my own personality I attribute my success as an exhibitor.

Tell Us Your Good Ideas

Editor Motography:—We are taking considerable interest in your open "Forum" for the exhibitor. In the smaller cities where there is no chance to glean ideas from the exhibitor in competition, your "Forum" could be made an invaluable aid to exhibitors by the interchange of ideas. In the exploitation of pictures, we search the trade papers and the ads of other houses, in other cities, as well as our individual brains for ideas to give "punch" to any picture we deem worthy of extra effort.

If we evolve some good idea here, some thought that brings results, we are glad to exchange it for some fellow-exhibitor's good idea. We also hope the exhibitor in other localities will send his hits to the "Forum" for general use.—J. E. Rickards, Phoenix Amusement Company, Owners of the Columbia and Amuzu Theaters, Phoenix, Arizona; the Iris, at Ray; the National, at Hayden; the Isis, at Florence, and the Juarez, at Sonora, Arizona.

With Northwestern Exhibitors

AFTERMATH OF THE EXPOSITION

ALTHOUGH the second annual convention and exposition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Exposition of the Northwest has passed into history, numerous incidents pertaining thereto are constantly demanding attention. There was one tragic fact about the show which in all other ways seemed a success, and that was that although they are the people to receive the richest benefit from the show, the exhibitors did not attend. When the people in charge of the exhibition work so hard each year to make it a success it does seem very ungrateful and very discouraging that the exhibitors do not do their part by at least attending the convention. But in this case, with a few bright exceptions, they did not, and although the large attendance was gratifying the exhibitors were conspicuous by their absence.

That a large amount of business was done during the convention is shown by the report of one firm that its sales for the four days amounted to $50,000, which, when compared with the rental of the booth and other incidentals netted about 1,000 per cent on the investment. This does not take into consideration the amount of profit which may be realized through the advertising done by the display.

The wide scope of advertising reached through exhibits at the show is demonstrated in a sale made by George G. Johnston, of the Monogram Slide Company, of St. Paul and Minneapolis, who also has the agency for the Simplex arc. One day at the exposition Mr. Johnston sold five of these lamps to Hans Bergem, manager of the Framfilm Company of Christiania, Norway.

Another company which reported good sales was the Twin City Scenic Company of Minneapolis, which averaged a sale a day.

Fred S. Meyer, manager of the Laemmle exchange of Minneapolis, claims the record for bookings on his film "Peg o' the Ring." Mr. Meyer has three prints of this serial now working and arranged for in June and has ordered a fourth from headquarters.

S. A. Louis and George Luxton, respectively manager and assistant manager of the Rialto Theater Supply Company, believe that it pays to advertise through the medium of the expositions. At their booth they sold six new 1916 Motiograph machines; took about thirty-five new accounts for supplies; sold one Cushman No. 3 electric power 4½ k. w. generator outfit complete; sold their entire stock of 2,000 foot reels; in addition to selling large quantities of Rialto Instantaneous Cement.

The two-reel feature on the exposition which was filmed by Kimball & Cobb of Minneapolis, is expected to be ready for release in a few days. The feature includes all the bright spots at the convention and several famous stars participated, among them being Anna Held, Velaska Surratt, Bryant Washburn, Edward Arnold, C. M. Giffen, Wallace Coburn and Ned Campbell. Officials and prominent members of the Northwest Association are also shown. Several of the theaters in St. Paul and Minneapolis have already booked this film.

One of the important events of the convention was the election of the new officers and executive board of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association. This election resulted as follows:

President, James Gilesky (Alhambra), St. Paul, Minn.; vice president, Charles W. Gates (Bijou), Aberdeen, S. D.; secretary, William Koenig (Bijou Jitney), Minneapolis; treasurer, C. E. Van Duzee (Gem, St. Paul), Minneapolis.

EXECUTIVE BOARD.

Thomas Furniss (Rex), Duluth, Minn.; W. A. Scott (Auditorium), Red Wing, Minn.; Henry P. Greene (Lake), Minneapolis, Minn.; Frank Nemec (Nemec), St. Cloud, Minn.; W. A. Reisman (Dale), St. Paul, Minn.

STATE VICE PRESIDENTS.

Minnesota, Antin Gilles, Breckenridge; Wisconsin, J. E. Sherwood, Madison; Iowa, J. B. Boyle, Dubuque; South Dakota, J. E. Hipple, Pierre; North Dakota, J. E. Kavanaugh, Grand Forks.

The newly elected officers, most of whom were reelected, will not take hold for thirty days and the present officers have wound up all the convention and exposition matters.

The officers were pleased to announce that the association was never in better condition than at present. The Northwest Association will be incorporated and from the proceeds of the past convention will be able to pay the old debts of $700.00 left by the previous regime.

Minneapolis now has a new film company with headquarters at the Film Exchange building. This is known as the Federal Features. The members of the company are E. Oddy Freedman, A. M. Gruenberg, Peter Markus, Sam Freedman and Meyer M. Isaacs. The first release of this company is "Defence or Tribute."

Twin Ports Feature Film Service, of Duluth, reports big business with "In Touch with Death," "Tracked by Wireless," "Dawn of Tomorrow," "The Harper Mystery," and "Zigomar," and that new features have been ordered from the east.

Al Rosenberg, who handles "The Ne'er Do Well" throughout the Montana, Idaho, Washington and Oregon territory, has booked the feature solid in Montana until July 15. Mr. Rosenberg says at Butte the picture broke the record for attendance held by the "Spoilers" by $600.

The Freidman Film Corporation, of Minneapolis, successor to the Western Kriterios Film Company, is now located in the Film Exchange building. This company reports big business both with the features and the regular service.

Billie Burke Opens at Globe

George Kleine's serial "Gloria's Romance," featuring Billie Burke, had its first New York showing at the Globe Theater. Following negotiations between the producer and Charles Dillingham contracts were signed whereby the Globe will show the various episodes of "Gloria's Romance" in weekly installments. In this play Miss Burke is supported by a notable cast, which includes Henry Kolker, David Powell, William Roselle, Frank Belcher, Wm. T. Carleton, Frank McGlynn and Jule Power. Also many of the members of the fashionable winter colony at Palm Beach, where the opening episodes were staged, took part as "extras" for dance, tea party and yachting scenes.

STAR'S WONDER WARDROBE

Survey of Anna Nilsson's Fifty Thousand Dollar Wardrobe and Intimate Glimpse Into the Dressing Room of the Star

Fifty thousand dollars spent on mere clothes probably seems like a flagrant waste of perfectly good money to a man, but to a woman it means almost a little glimpse of heaven. This is the amount, however, which has been spent on the wardrobe of Anna Nilsson, the star of the Pathe series, "Who's Guilty?" These gowns were designed exclusively for Miss Nilsson's use in the serial by Hickson, the modiste of New York's Four Hundred.

Although her gowns are so extravagantly wonderful, Miss Nilsson is as perfectly at home in them as she is in her severely plain dressing room. A neater, simpler, "homier" and more comfortable room could not be imagined, and it is exactly opposite what one would picture as a typical actress' dressing room. Everything has a place—and is in that place, and even the chairs appear prim. On the wall just above the dressing table is a photographic reproduction of one of Sorolla's surf pictures. Bordering this are copies in sepia of two fjord pictures of Nordstrom, the great Swedish painter, who comes from Helsingfors, where Miss Nilsson was born. Flanking these, and all about, are photographs of the world's greatest marble statues. On the dressing table, in a beautiful dull gold frame, is a marble effigy of Dante.

Seeming out of place in such delicate surroundings, on another wall hangs a huge, two-handed sword such as the Crusaders carried almost a thousand years ago. And, sure enough, this is a family heirloom of Miss Nilsson on her mother's side, whose hard-fighting English ancestors went forth against the Saracens in the days when war meant individual combat.

FLICKERS FROM FOX FILMS

Relating to the Great Kellerman Picture, the Addition of a Brand New Star, and Unusual Coming Releases

No definite date has yet been set for presenting to the public William Fox's million-dollar Annette Kellerman picture. It is believed, however, that this will be shown early in June. Neither has any definite information been vouchsafed as to which city will witness the premiere. The best theaters have been offered to Mr. Fox but only those offering exceptional advantages for the staging of a spectacular picture will be considered. The picture will be shown at advanced prices in the best theaters in the larger cities. The film itself being a de luxe production it is planned to have its presentation on a scale commensurate with its importance. A noted composer has just completed a special score for the picture which is said to be a distinctive musical achievement, and will add much to the effectiveness of the showing of the film.

Jose Collins, daughter of the famous Lottie Collins, has been added to the array of Fox stars. Although Miss Collins' popularity will probably be heightened because of her well-known mother, nevertheless the actress possesses sufficient personal charm and talent to be able to hold her own on the screen, regardless of her progenitor.

"Battle of Hearts," featuring William Farnum, was released on the William Fox program on May 22. In this play Elda Furry makes her first appearance with this company, as does also Wheeler Oakman. William Burress and Willard Louis also appear in the cast.

June Caprice, the young actress whom Mr. Fox says he is going to make famous, has already started on a very rigid regime of study to prepare for her appearance on the screen. Besides regular school girl subjects she is being taught to dress, and the very ABCs of motion picture acting and picture making.

Delectable glimpse of the big Fox Kellerman spectacle.

Famous Novelist Signed by Pathe

Noted picture maker met noted author the other day when J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of Pathe, entertained in his office Louis Tracy, the English novelist, and persuaded him to lend his talents to screen work. Mr. Berst was one of the pioneers in believing that if a manufacturer was to spend fifteen or twenty thousand dollars in producing a picture the services of trained minds were necessary in the writing of the scripts. As a result of the meeting of Messrs. Berst and Tracy, the author is to write "The Grip of Evil" for Pathe, a serial story which will be picturized and released probably during the early summer.

Mr. Tracy's works are tremendously popular, and he may be said to be a man with a million readers. Among his books are "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," "The Silent Barrier," "Karl Grier," "A Son of the Immortals" and "The Great Mogul." A man of strong personality, he is of an extreme reserve. Born in Liverpool and educated in France, he ran away from home to join the British navy only to find that it was not his vocation. So he drifted into journalism, and later through his novels became an international celebrity.

The J. H. Kunskey Theatrical Enterprises, Detroit, announced in its weekly program that the following stars would personally attend the screen ball at the Arcadia, Monday evening, May 15: Clara Kimball Young, Alice Brady, Dorothy Bernard, Claire Whitney, Valli Valli, Stuart Holmes, Emmy Wehlan, Carlyle Blackwell and Viola Dana. This event brought out a S. R. O. crowd at the big ball.

The Story of a Strange Life-Drama

THEATER PRESIDENT LIVES UNDER CLOUD EIGHT YEARS

COULD you live with a black cloud over your life for eight years and still smile the smile that springs from a soul at peace with the world and a disposition that was still wholesome and cheerful?

If a man had cost you more than twenty thousand dollars and had cast you into the street without a cent and with the stigma of a blackened reputation, could you go and greet him without the bile of revenge rankling in your heart?

Could you start after ruin with less than nothing, stand the loss of one position after another, and then build soundly and swiftly up to success?

These things, and more too, have been accomplished by E. C. Divine, president of the Strand Theater Company of Chicago.

Mr. Divine's life reads like a pictured story on the screen. No drama woven in sunshine and shadow on the perpendicular stage of his beautiful theater is more romantic. Alger never penned a book for boys which contains a finer example of how to fight through handicaps and win the battle according to all the rules.

E. C. Divine, President Strand Theater Company.

The boldest and cleverest big-money forger this country has ever known, A. Gilbert Sargent, is Divine's double. In 1908 Sargent stole $30,000 from a Boston firm by means of a forged check. Divine, living in Chicago at the time, was arrested for the crime. Three people from the Boston firm who had never before seen Divine swore he was the man who had signed the check. Divine escaped from the merciless grind of the suit only by the merest chance.

"Had Sargent forged that check a day later or a day before he did, I should have been sent to prison and would have been there still," said Mr. Divine to a representative of MOTOGRAPHY.

Here is the factful scenario which wove so strange a spell into the business and personal life of this successful business man and wealthy exhibitor.

Part One. Two Men Mirror Each Other

In 1908 Mr. Divine was living in Chicago, earning his bread, and more too, by the sweat of his brain.

His home had been Belding, Michigan, and like many another small town young man, took great pride in the fact that he was winning his fortune in the city, honestly and rapidly.

At the same time A. Gilbert Sargent lived in suburb of Boston, apparently a man of means and a gentleman. These two men, who knew nothing of each other's existence, had been moulded by Fate into forms and faces almost precisely alike. Color of hair, forehead, nose, and even the attractive habit of turning up the corners of the mouth in pleasant conversation —practically each man's every characteristic was mirrored in the other. Each man is forty years old. Mr. Divine's mother's maiden name was Parker. Sargent committed his bold forgery under that name. Ninety per cent of criminals, according to criminologists, a disposition that was still wholesome and cheerful?

Part Two. The $30,000 Theft

In the summer of 1908 a new office was opened in the finest building in Worcester, Massachusetts. "Richard F. Parker, Structural Iron Contractor," was lettered in gold across the oaken door. From time to time the leisurely and prosperous Mr. Parker associated with the moneyed men of the city and of Boston with the quiet dignity which breeds confidence and trust.

Before long, wishing to invest some money, Mr. Parker wrote an unassuming letter to A. B. Turner and Company, of Boston, bond brokers, asking them to send a select list of securities. This the company promptly did and also invited Mr. Parker to come and talk matters over at his convenience. Being a careful and conservative investor, Mr. Parker took some time to consider the list of bonds. In a few days he made his selections and the price, $30,008.75, was agreed upon.

Pre-occupied in business Mr. Parker closed the deal by wire from somewhere in Massachusetts. A few days later he strolled into the Turner offices to make the payment and secure the bonds.

Mr. Turner, president of the company, held a long and pleasant conversation with his distinguished customer, in whom he saw the prospect of a volume of good business for the future. He suggested to Parker other very desirable bonds, but that very modest gentleman assured the broker that he made it a policy to never attempt a deal larger than he could easily swing. The broker expressed admiration for this wise attitude.

Smiling pleasantly at the solicitations of the president, Mr. Parker handed over a certified check on the Worchester Trust company for $30,008.75, talked a few moments longer, took his leave and strolled from the office with his customary modest dignity.

Here Mr. Parker drops from the scenario for seven years.

Some swift scenes intervene, showing the presentation of the worthless check, and the solemn conference between Turner and Company of Boston and the Worchester bank. Turner and Company register worry, enmasse. A flash of the interior of a comfortable Pullman state room discovers the conservative Mr. Parker conversing volubly and sincerely with a fellow passenger. But the next week found him at his home in an exclusive Boston suburb as usual. The neighbors greeted him with pleasure as they always did when he returned from a business trip.

Part Three. Fate Crosses their Wires

The next scenes of this real story glimpse the detectives in all the large cities of the country examining their records following the general S. O. S. turned in by one Turner and Company of Boston. The faces of these keen Sherlocks register "Ah, ha!" They deducted the fact that Mr. Parker had been a particularly active and successful business man. His transactions under various names and in various parts of the country mounted nearly up to the one hundred thousand dollar mark.

At his modest but comfortable Chicago home (heroes must be in modest circumstances, you know), E. C. Divine is seen in the next scenes kissing his wife and tiny daughter a fond goodby as he leaves for his office in the loop.

"Remember now, early tonight," his wife called after him.

And Divine promised to be home in time for the dinner party his wife had planned.

But he did not return that evening, nor for several evenings following. He was thrown into prison and grilled for hours with the nerve-wringing third degree for a crime he knew not of.

Divine had been seated at his desk in the office of Edward M. Deane and Company, bankers, in the First National Bank building, Chicago, when suddenly a man stood before him and said: "Hello, Parker!" And thus in an instant the stain spread over the character of an innocent man and, as ink penetrates a blotter, fixed itself into the very fibre of his life.

Part Four. Freedom That Did Not Free

After all the tortures and tricks of the police inquisition had failed to wring a confession from Divine, he was permitted to engage a lawyer. He employed Attorney Fred D. Jackson, who saved him from a trial in Boston. The president of Turner and Company came to Chicago with his cashier and stenographer.

One glance at Divine through the bars at the jail convinced them that he was Parker, and all through the trial they stuck to that opinion. On the stand Divine was asked to write his name. He did so. It was compared with the forged signature and found to be an almost perfect replica. Divine was acquitted only because he could prove an absolutely water-tight alibi. The check had been forged by Parker on September 10. On that day Divine had been at his bank in Chicago, and a dated and timed telegram proved beyond a doubt that he had been seated in the office of A. K. Brown, president of the Kenwood Trust and Savings Bank, at the very hour when Turner turned the bonds over to Parker in Boston.

The exhibitor was freed, but in the body only. The false shadow clung to his life and colored him a cleverly escaped criminal in the eyes of his business and social world.

"The papers were full of my arrest and trial," says Mr. Divine, "but when I was acquitted it was only noticed in small paragraphs in the last sheets."

He was thrown out into the street without a cent, without a job. The trial had cost him thousands. One position after another he lost when it was discovered that he was the Divine of the sensational forgery deal. He was branded as "clever," but undesirable as an employee. Probably no man ever had driven into his soul more deeply the sharp sense of injustice felt by the outcast. Few have made a more manful struggle against the stone wall of an obstacle seemingly insurmountable.

But the tide turned at last, with the profits won by Divine through his interests in the Eastern Mausoleum of Buffalo. And even through his fiercest struggles the bitterness gradually passed from his naturally optimistic disposition. In six more years Divine was again rated high in the financial world. You can't keep a good man down.

Part Five. "Truth Will Out"

Meanwhile the keenest forger America has ever known for seven years plied his dignified trade with his usual conservative success—$9,000 here; $27,000 there. He was caught in Atlantic City in 1914 with $22,000 worth of stolen bonds in his inside vest pocket. Turner confronted him.

"You're Parker."

And that dignitary smiled his acquiescence.

Two weeks ago E. C. Divine saw Parker in his cell.

"No bitterness rankled in my soul against him," said Mr. Divine. "I had fought my way out. The papers have now printed the whole story of my life and my complete vindication. And now 'Parker,' a keen, intellectual man with a super-abundance of nature's gifts, has before him the rest of his life behind the bars. The ordeals I have passed through have built up in me an absolute confidence in myself."

Since the romantic story of his life has appeared, Mr. Divine has received hundreds of letters of sympathy and congratulation from men and women who have been similarly placed at some period in their lives. Some of those not confidential but pulsing with feeling, Mr. Divine read to Motography's representative. And as the latter passed out through the lobby of the prominent exhibitor's beautiful theater he thought of Kipling's familiar words—"If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you, but make allowance for their doubting too . . . the world is yours and everything that's in it."

E. C. Divine is one of America's great photoplay exhibitors. He spent more than $25,000 in remodeling Chicago's old-time Globe theater into one of the most beautiful shadowplay houses in the world. During the three weeks following his opening with Geraldine Farrar in "Carmen" he did a $27,000 business. The symphony orchestra, the beauty of foyer, auditorium and stage setting, the lighting, the soloists, of Mr. Divine's Strand make the presentation of his film dramas something which appeals to patrons of the highest class with supreme satisfaction.

And there is no one to say that he has not earned the wealth and success he has achieved.

Masters of V. L. S. E. Ill

It is with much regret that we note that E. Lanning Masters, advertising director of V-L-S-E, is confined to his bed at the Flower Hospital, New York, suffering from an acute attack of appendicitis, which made itself felt on his return with the V-L-S-E censorship delegation from Albany.

The operation was performed by the noted specialist, Dr. Von Vonowich, of that hospital.

Victor M. Shapiro, the assistant advertising director, will handle Mr. Masters' work while he is away.

Big Advertising Pays

PATHE PROVES VALUE OF GENEROUS SPACE—NEW RELEASES

WHEN crowds packed the Strand Theater to overflowing on Sunday, May 7, there was a reason, according to Tarleton Winchester, manager of Pathe's sales department. For the first time in the history of motion pictures, a New York theater had advertised on the same scale as that employed in western cities. Goldberg's Animated Cartoon, "The Boob Weekly," brought about the revolution.

In Seattle exhibitors take full-page space in the newspapers as a matter of course. They realize that by doing so they are creating business for their theater. They know that the small directory ads in vogue in the east serve merely directory purposes. They only succeed in bringing to the theaters those persons who are coming anyway, and pick up the paper to find out what is the big feature, what time the show starts, or where the theater is located.

Ever since his entrance in the motion picture business, C. R. Seelye, of Pathe, has been preaching the new religion of fewer, better pictures, longer runs and bigger theaters. In his judgment only 3,500 seat houses can afford to advertise in a big way and only by big advertising can a great new feature be shown to sixty per cent of the total population.

The backwardness of the east, compared to the progressiveness of the west in regard to advertising has worried him more than anything else.

When Pathe signed a contract with R. L. Goldberg and the Evening Mail Syndicate for the film presentation of Goldberg's famous cartoons, Mr. Seelye decided that here was a chance to show what advertising would do.

When one of New York's first large moving picture theaters was opened some time ago, he offered to give the management the benefit of his advertising advice for the satisfaction of proving that his ideas were correct. The people behind the theater decided that they would run things their own way. Their way was characterized by every advertising man in New York as all wrong, and they themselves were finally forced to admit it.

All New York is talking about the campaign on the Goldberg cartoons. Whole pages of powerful display copy have been run. A page in the Saturday Evening Post has helped the good work along.

The advertising is full of human interest, not only because of the nature of the pictures exploited, but because of the true romance of Reuben L. Goldberg's life. How many youngsters of 33 do you know who draw salaries of $50,000 a year? Goldberg, the artist-humorist, has just been raised to a $50,000 minimum and royalties from his animated cartoons will yield him $75,000 a year more, so that his total income will be approximately $125,000, and Goldberg won't be 33 until July 4.

Goldberg is a dramatist. Even in his newspaper cartoons the dramatic element is strongly evident, and when he puts his cartoons on the film, where he can pull the puppet's strings to suit his imagination, where he becomes master of action, he can go the limit.

He always tells a story. It hits off life, it strikes straight at some human foible. In a good-humored way, Goldberg gets human nature's number. He is funny, but he is wise too. On top he is a scream, but if you get down beneath the skin of one of Goldberg's extravagant cartoons you will find a vein of solid sense.

The secret of big display advertising for a moving picture house is that it brings to the theater people who have not been there before. It is then up to the exhibitor to make them steady customers.

Pathe Announces $5,000,000 Serial Program

J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of the Pathe Exchange, Inc., has announced plans for a $5,000,000 motion picture serial program on which will be released at least seven picture serials between May, 1916, and May, 1917. Mr. Berst claims that the public demands the continued motion picture, which is the serial literature of the screen. Pathe has contracted for the services of a number of authors of national prominence, among them Louis Tracy, Randall Parrish, Albert Payson Terhune and Mrs. Wilson Woodrow. Newspaper advertising will be the backbone of Pathe's serial campaigns, and arrangements for the syndication of the stories are now being made with leading newspapers in all the leading cities of the country.

Nine reels divided between a serial, a series, a comedy, a scenic and educational, a cartoon and two issues of the Pathe News varies Pathe's May 22 program.

"The Hidden Face" is the name of "The Iron Claw" episode for release in this week.

"The Tangled Web" is the title of the chapter of the "Who's Guilty" serial.

The one-reel comedy is "Luke's Late Lunchers," a "Lonesome Luke Comedy," which is just as funny as all the others have been.

The educational is "Saving the Shad Supply," one of the official pictures made for the U. S. Bureau of Fisheries and released with government approval. On the same reel is shown the scenic "Yunnen-Fou" (Southwest China). This is an intimate travel film, and is short enough not to be tiresome.

Rube Goldberg's second cartoon appears on this program. "Leap Year" is the story of a forty-seven-year-old maiden who would have been more popular if all men were near-sighted. "Leap Year" is on the same film with "How to Bring Up a Child," a nonsense film heralded as "something no wives or mothers should know."

The Pathe Club gave a dinner recently in the Green room of the Hotel McAlpin, New York, at which one hundred and twenty-five members and guests were present. President J. A. Berst entertained at his table Messrs. Shallenberger and Le Vine of the Arrow Film Corporation, Mrs. Shallenberger, Alice Joyce, Katherine Gray, Guy Coombs, E. A. Bingham, Anna Nilsson, Tom Moore, Pearl White and Grace Darmond. The party of Louis J. Gasnier, formerly vice-president of the Pathe Exchange, consisted of Mrs. Grasnier, Leon Barry, William Baker, Mr. Hart and Hannah Kohn.

LUNCH TO VIVIAN MARTIN

Petite Star Lunches with Press Representatives on Day Before Her Departure for Morosco and Pallas Studios

Though as busy as a motion picture actress who is preparing to leave the next day for Los Angeles whither a long term contract to appear in Morosco and Pallas Pictures called her, Vivian Martin managed to find time to be the guest at a luncheon tendered the petite star on Wednesday, May 3, at the Hotel Claridge, New York. Miss Martin's table-fellows were the representatives of trade and daily papers and officials of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company.

From the first step toward the arrangement of the farewell affair to its realization with the many guests seated at the long table, there passed but one hour, which only goes to show how informal a gathering it was. Second to the pleasure Miss Martin's presence afforded the scribes, who allowed certain of the day's routine duty to care for itself in order to wish the honored guest a pleasant journey to and success at her new studio, the absence of speeches was the delightful feature of the occasion.

With her mind not quite made up whether or not she was glad to leave New York for Los Angeles, the little star whose screen personations have charmed hosts of men, women and children all over this and other countries expressed herself as hopeful, ever so hopeful, that a number of completed scenarios would be awaiting her at the Morosco and Pallas studios, for she is anxious to get down to real work. Miss Martin related some of her experiences since becoming a star of the screen and this brought on the discussion of many phases of motion picture production.

During the conversation MOTOGRAPHY's representative heard only one statement with which he was entirely at variance. An advertising man said certain things about motion picture reviewers and the head of the Morosco New York office nodded and claimed that the same held good for motion picture censors. The representative spoken of happened to be a reviewer and he was perturbed, not to say peeved at being classed with a censor. Aside from this everything was serene and everybody immensely enjoyed the opportunity to wish Vivian Martin the greatest of success in her future work for the Paramount Program.

Present at the Vivian Martin luncheon were: Carl H. Pierce, Julian M. Solomon, and Pete Schmid of the Morosco and Pallas organizations; Kenneth Hodkinson, J. Hesser Walraver of the Paramount Pictures Corporation and W. L. Hill of the Famous Players Film Service, Pittsburgh; also thirteen well known luncheon-goers who are connected with the press.

Exhibitors Parade to Trade Show

There are a number of ways of showing that you are co-operating with a fellow.

The Exhibitors' League of America probably chose as effective a way as any when they attended the exposition given in New York by the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America, May 6 to 14. Gathering a crowd of exhibitors at their headquarters they marched in a body to Madison Square Garden, headed by a band. Inside they made a circuit of the big hall to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne." They finished with a turn on the central dancing floor where they gave three rousing cheers for the Board of Trade and followed by some cheers for the League. The "parade," headed by Sam Spedon and Sam Trigger, was heartily applauded.

The theater men then dissolved into the crowds to enjoy the festivities of the occasion.

Pathos of the "Extra"

Madame Bertha Kalich, the Fox star, tells a very stirring story of the tragedies of the "extras" in the film world.

These people are in a class by themselves. They are a throng of quiet, serious, unpretentious people, eager to learn and willing to do exactly as they are told, who come to the studios day after day in search of work—and are turned away day after day. Sometimes as many as seven hundred of these aspiring actors and actresses gather at the studios, and their need is often serious. There are little children dressed to look their cutest, clinging to their mothers' hands. Perhaps, there is a father ill, or out of work, at home. They look to the little tot to make a screen success so that the family may be lifted from the depths of want and hunger.

"There are wide-eyed, curly-haired young girls, who have come from simple homes in small towns, glowing with ambition to become screen stars. And many who have distorted their childish faces with heavy make-up trying to attract managerial attention.

"There are old, old women whose hope of earning a living up to a few years ago, had been vague. Now, the motion pictures require old women for character parts and hope is revived in their poor, old hearts.

"Here and there one sees an old face that seems strangely familiar. They are fallen stars and some of them have drifted until they are merely 'extras.'

"As in every other phase of life, there is tragedy and comedy here. There are those who leave smilingly and those who carry away aching hearts. But, as I said in the beginning, there is a doggedness—a determination—to come back day after day in the face of failure, with the abiding faith that one day, their persistence will be rewarded."

The Bronx, New York, took an active part in promoting the stupendous "All Star Movie Jubilee," held at the New York Hippodrome on Sunday evening, May 21. There was present the greatest number of screen stars ever gathered together on one stage. The proceeds will go to the Motion Picture Campaign for the Actors' Fund and for fighting censorship bills. J. J. Wittman, president of the Cinema Exhibitors' Association, was chairman of the committee in charge of the affair. Henry Cole, also a Bronx exhibitor, spent considerable time in assisting the committee members in their work.

The picture industry was touched upon from a unique angle in an article published recently in The Transmitter, the house organ of the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone company of Baltimore. The two-page story dealt with the use of the telephone in the photoplay and was illustrated with numerous scenes of tragic and comic telephoning.

Baseball is called the national game, but motion pictures are now without a doubt the great national amusement.

New York Bill Spells Vast Cost to Films

BY WALTER W. IRWIN
General Manager of V-L-S-E, Inc.

THERE is no legalized form of censorship of motion pictures in any country today except the United States and Canada. As for Canada, there is no section of that country where there is in existence or where there is proposed any law to tax motion pictures at anything like the rates provided for in this bill, or which duplicates any other of the extreme provisions of this bill.

The Cristman-Wheeler censorship bill now pending proposes that the state of New York shall charge for the examination of film, fees, five to ten times as much as are charged in other states.

The rates provided for in this bill are ten dollars for examination of each one thousand feet of original film, and five dollars for each one thousand feet of duplicate film.

Below is a comparison of the fees, existing and suggested:

New York State—
$10.00 per 1000 feet of original film.
5.00 per 1000 feet of duplicate film.

Pennsylvania—
$1.00 for each 1200 feet of original film.
1.00 for each 1200 feet of duplicate film.

Ohio—
$1.00 for each 1000 feet, original or duplicate film.

Kansas—
$2.00 for each film or reel (length not specified).

Ohio, Kansas and Pennsylvania are the three states which now have boards of censors with examination fees.

Maryland has a censorship law not yet in operation. The charges for examination will be:

$2.00 per 1000 feet of original film.
1.00 per 1000 feet of duplicate film.

As to the federal bills, H. R. 456 (known as the Hughes bill) proposes:

$1.00 per 1000 feet original film.
.50 per 1000 feet duplicate film.

There is another bill in the national Congress, introduced by Senator Hoke Smith, wherein the charges are:

$2.00 per 1000 feet original film.
.25 per 1000 feet duplicate film.

The bill under discussion provides that the film or reel to be examined shall be filed with the Board of Regents. The physical value of such a reel, presuming it to be a duplicate and not the original positive (if the negative the value might be all the way up to $500,000) would be, at the rate of 4c per foot, $40 for a reel of 1,000 feet.

Therefore, every reel submitted for approval would represent a commercial value of $40. And this must be regarded as a tax additional to the fees charged for examination.

It is stated on reliable authority that during the year 1915 there were 9,670 reels passed upon by the National Board of Review. It is to be presumed that all of these were intended for exhibition in New York state. $386,800 wasted yearly.

Therefore, under this bill there would have to be filed with the Board of Regents 9,670 reels of a commercial physical value of forty dollars each, making an amazing total value of $386,800 in one year.

That amount of $386,800 would be taken from the pockets of the moving picture producers in one year. It would be a shameful waste to tie up that amount of money in the archives of a Board of Regents. No other state attempts such an exaction.

And that amount would be in addition to the fees that would be paid by the moving picture producers. These fees in one year would amount to:

9,670 reels, originals, at $10	$ 96,700.00
9,670 reels, five duplicates of each, 48,350 duplicates, at $5 each	241,750.00
Total examination fees in one year, for a total of 58,020 reels	$338,450.00

To prove that the quantities—9,670 reels of original film, and 48,350 duplicates, are not exaggerated, the Kansas censors examined 31,000 films in one year, and it is estimated that the Pennsylvania censors passed upon approximately 75,000 films. (Annual receipts $75,000 at $1 per examination.)

Reels so filed are not, according to this bill, to be returned to the person applying for approval, excepting (see page 7, section 1255, line 6) if the Board of Regents has revoked the approval by the Board of Censors of a film or reel. Only in that case does the owner of a reel get it back, and in that case it is of no value to him in this state.

Page 4, section 1251, lines 13 to 15, provides that the "Regents may, in their discretion, by a majority vote, revoke such approval of any such film or reel at any time."

Under this proposition a producer of a moving picture, having gone through all the procedure required, and obtained the approval of the Board of Censors, and then having manufactured and distributed his duplicates for exhibition, may find the approval of the censors revoked at any time. That is, after the producer has made his full investment, upon the approval of the censors and their assurances that it is morally and commercially safe for him to make this investment, he may find that the power appointing the censors differs in the end from the censors.

The last reports of the boards of censors in other states show the following receipts and disbursements:

	Receipts	Disbursements
Pennsylvania (for one year)	*$75,000	$37,500.00
Ohio (for one year)	31,000	26,500.00
Kansas (for nine months)	17,542	3,983.36

*Estimated.

H. R. 456 fixed $40,000 as the total amount to be expended annually for salaries and all other expenses, by the proposed Federal Motion Picture Commission.

But the Cristman bill provides that New York state alone is to make the motion picture producers pay examination fees annually of at least $338,450, as well as to tie up almost a million dollars in films. Why?

Why a tax of upwards of $725,250 annually upon the moving picture industry in the state of New York?

However, the financial burden upon the industry for the first year of the operation of the bill will far exceed this sum, for the bill permits the censors not only to pass upon all subjects now upon the market, but to compel the filing of a print of each with the Board of Regents.

As before stated, in the year 1915 the National Board of Review passed upon 9,670 reels. Figuring conservatively that it takes six prints of each reel of each subject to supply the market of New York state, and that each subject works at least a year, there are 58,200 reels now in use, upon which a censorship fee must be paid. But within the last two years the merit of the motion picture product, particularly in the making of pictures of four or more reels in length, has advanced so rapidly that the life of most subjects far exceeds one year; in fact, the life of many of them will exceed two years. Moreover, many subjects require new prints, while many other subjects of popularity are being reissued.

It is therefore safe to assume that the number of reels now in use in the state of New York is 50 per cent more than the figures indicated by the work of the National Board of Review for the year 1915; in other words, there are now upon the market in this state 78,300 reels.

Seventy-eight thousand three hundred reels at the censors' fees provided for in the bill for the positive prints reviewed and duplicates thereof, makes a total for censoring the product now on the market of $507,673.

In addition to this, a copy of each print now upon the market must be filed with the Board of Regents.

Accordingly, 14,505 reels (the number of so-called original positive reels to be reviewed and filed with the Board of Regents), at a production cost of 4c per foot, makes an additional loss sustained by the industry (and which means no revenue for the state) of $580,200.

Consequently, if the Cristman-Wheeler bill is signed by the governor, the financial drain upon the industry for the first year of the bill's operation will amount to $1,813,125.

To review 14,505 reels, the number of what may be called original positives now on the market, would take a censor committee, working eight hours per day (at last two hours longer than the eye will permit), 453 days. This work, however, must be accomplished, if the bill is signed, within 54 working days, prior to August 1. Consequently, the state would have to appoint, at a tremendous expense, a large number of inexperienced committees to accomplish this task.

Billie Burke Pictured Novel of Twenty Chapters Insures Keen Summer Business—Exhibitors Use Some Unusual Publicity Schemes

Never was the idea of "Preparedness" better exemplified in the motion picture industry than in the case of the enormous number of bookings on the George Kleine motion picture novel, "Gloria's Romance," in which Billie Burke is being featured. Theater managers all over the country are taking this method of ensuring capacity business during the hot summer months, when attendance at the theaters is inclined to fall off.

Exhibitors well know the drawing power of Billie Burke's name alone, so they immediately took advantage of the opportunity offered for securing this celebrated star in a motion picture novel in twenty feature chapters that would bring audiences back to their houses time and again. To make the subject doubly certain of success, the story is not one that depends on sensational thrills and spectacular hair-breadth escapes to bring its followers back to the theaters, but a clean, wholesome, fascinating little story that depends for its drawing power on a logical development of an interesting love and mystery tale. Dainty Billie Burke charms everyone who beholds her in the early chapters of the novel and her romance grows more and more interesting with its further progress, so that those who witness the opening of the story are sure to flock back to the theaters, no matter how hot the night, once they begin to follow the story.

The importance of interesting as many as possible in the very first installment of the story has led many exhibitors to resort to unusual publicity methods to ensure capacity houses on the opening night of the first chapter of the picture. In one city the leading exhibitor running "Gloria's Romance" is issuing specially engraved invitations to a mailing list of five thousand society people, announcing that on a certain date Miss Billie Burke, the star supreme, will greet her friends on the screen at his theater.

In another city, a red-haired girl contest is being put on, with free season tickets offered to the winner, who must most closely resemble Miss Billie Burke, the star of the Rupert Hughes novel, "Gloria's Romance." Though the contest has not yet begun, this manager has already received calls from more than seven hundred young ladies, who fondly imagine that they are perfect duplicates of Billie Burke, and request that they be given special consideration when the contest opens.

"Society nights" are being planned for other theaters, and one house, located in a neighborhood in the "400" district, has reserved a large parking space for the cars of its patrons, who will come in their evening gowns and dress suits to pay homage to fair Billie Burke.

The smaller town exhibitors are adopting the "season ticket" idea with a vengeance and tremendous orders have been given for these pasteboard cards that sell at a slight cut rate, and offer the buyer the full twenty chapters of the novel, via the twenty admissions to the theater, at a saving of about fifty cents over the normal admission price for the twenty nights.

In view of the elaborate preparations that have been made by exhibitors to get the story off to a good start, it is expected that the summer's business will run even higher than during the cooler months, thus establishing new records for the entire season's business.

Exhibitors Lunch with Miss Minter

Mary Miles Minter, on her way to the Santa Barbara studios of the American Film Corporation, stopped over in Chicago long enough to be the guest at a luncheon given in her honor at the Hotel Sherman by the Mutual Film Company, with Jay Cairns and R. R. Nehls as hosts. A number of prominent exhibitors were present and had an opportunity to meet the little star who is so popular with their patrons and who is about to begin a new and even more brilliant phase of her career.

The play which the little actress will work in first at the coast studios has not as yet been decided. She is to be leading lady of a special company, the Mary Miles Minter-American Company. Miss Minter is accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Charlotte Shelby, who is a careful guardian of her talented little daughter.

The influence of the organ orchestra in the theater of science has tended to greatly augment the musical side of photoplay presentation and it is, indeed, a befitting as well as a truly artistic adjunct of the modern motion picture theater, illustrating as it does the gradual resort to scientific means of expression.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

I. L. WILLIAMS, manager of the Orpheum Theater, Snohomish, Washington, gets out each week a very attractive program printed on four pages, and states that about once a month he gets out a number with a string attached and hangs one on every door knob in Snohomish.

The New Regent Theater, Ottawa, Canada, states it has changed its policy and removed features from the house except as they are used as additions to the regular program, which it is believed will be secured from the Universal Company.

J. P. Cox, manager of the Perry Street Theater, Cape May, New Jersey, issues a miniature program on a card only two by three inches. It contains the program for the whole week, however, and the convenience of the size probably insures its being slipped into pockets for future reference.

It is quoted from good authority that A. J. Nichols, president of the Independent Amusement Company and well-known in Montreal as owner of the Strand and New Regent theaters, has decided to open still another house in Westmount. The house will seat 1,500 people and will be a facsimile of the Majestic Theater, Detroit.

From operator to manager of the theater in seven months is certainly a swift climb. This is the record of which Harry Golden-Har boasts. Seven months ago he started as operator in the Lux Theater at Montreal, and now he has assumed the position of manager of the same house.

Mr. Golden-Har will continue to use Universal service as has been the policy of this theater.

The Orpheum Herald is the name of a weekly theatrical newspaper issued by the Orpheum Theater of Aberdeen, South Dakota, with A. W. Walker as editor. This is a fine example of what the progressive, alive theater man can do, and one which could be followed advantageously by other theaters. This paper—in regular newspaper form—not only gives the program for the week but also carries news items regarding the plays and players and synopses of the releases.

The program of the Theater De Luxe, Los Angeles, California, of which Frank L. Schaffer is manager, shows Paramount and Triangle films exclusively. Two special notices given in this program are good, the one tells the exact time at which the five-reel runs will begin so that the patrons can be sure to get there in time to see the play from the beginning, and the other is an announcement to the effect that a special officer is employed to watch the automobiles in front of the theater.

The ladies of Colorado are now getting their spring creation ideas from the screen if the following appeal to Real Reels for help from W. C. Robertson, Princess Theater, Pueblo, is any criterion:

"I want to borrow a set of photos of Marguerite Clark in 'Mice and Men' as there is a young lady having a dress made by one of the leading dry goods companies here, and wants to copy the dress she wore."

The New Theater, Toronto, Canada, after being closed for a period of three years, has been taken over by Playhouses & Theaters, Limited, and will be opened in the near future. This company already controls two theaters in Toronto, the Playhouse and the Dundas Playhouse. Maurice J. Thayler, president of this company, has in view the acquiring of another prominent picture house in Toronto and steps have already been taken to secure the title of the theater in question.

A profit producing advertising campaign is being carried on by the management of the Palace and Lyric Theaters, Emaus, Pennsylvania. This is a newspaper campaign in conjunction with the Emaus Independent. A full page advertisement states that each new subscriber to the newspaper upon the payment of $1.00 for a year's subscription, will receive absolutely free a card entitling bearer to $1.50 in admission to either of the theaters. Following this announcement are the programs of the two theaters with a little comment on each film to be shown. This co-operation ought to be profitable to both the theaters and the newspaper.

William Code, owner and manager of the Alaska Dream Theater at Nome, Alaska, reports great difficulty with his ventilation because of the large attendance of the natives. Mr. Code says he keeps the windows open, has a large fan at front which blows a strong current of perfumed air over the gallery and in back another fan which sucks out the foul air. This is necessary because the natives are strong for pictures, in fact they are so strong that were not some such violent form of ventilation used there would be a dropping off of the white patronage, perhaps permanently.

Weekly Film News, Detroit, Michigan, devoted to the interests of the J. H. Kunsky theatrical enterprises, is a very pretentious little magazine. J. H. Kunsky, Inc., operates the Washington, Garden, Liberty, Royale, Strand, Empress, Alhambra and Columbia Theaters, all located in Detroit. The magazine runs sixteen pages and cover. The latter is in colors and bears the likeness of some actress. The programs of the eight theaters mentioned are given, and besides the regular gossip of the film industry, pertinent editorials and a question and answer department add to the interest of the little magazine.

L. F. Guimond, president of the Monticello Amusement Company, Monticello, New York, operating Lyceum enterprises, theater, bowling alley, billiard room, sends a copy of his house organ which he states, "is not yet what we are aiming at, but it is approaching nearer that ideal at any rate." The Lyceum Motophotograms, as this paper is called, is issued every two weeks. It contains eight pages of motion picture news and the program of the theater for two weeks. It also contains two pages of jokes scattered among the advertisements. The paper contains a number of illustrations and altogether is a very attractive house organ.

The New Family Theater, Adrian, Michigan, published the following in its program under the title, "Hints to our Help":

We are offering many startling surprises to every employee of the New Family. The boss expects you all to advance with the new industry.

Fifty per cent of the population of Adrian ought to see our Paramount attractions.

Long waits between pictures are unnecessary. Misframes should never happen in a well-regulated theater.

Every employee should be posted as to future attractions. It is your fault if you don't know.

Ushers, help patrons on with their coats, care for their packages, etc. Remember, on snowy days brooms have been provided to brush same off.

"Thank you," don't cost much and goes a long way to help make the New Family service more complete.

Reel Ammunition is the name given to a newsy four-page paper issued every Wednesday by the Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis, Minnesota, in the interest of every exhibitor of the northwest, and sent free to all regardless of their exchange affiliations. The staff of this little paper includes:

Fred S. Meyer, editor-in-chief; Julius Bernheim and L. J. Blumberg, Jr., editors; D. O. Hoye, H. L. Muir, E. C. Marohn and L. A. Horn, associate editors; J. Gardner, L. H. Coen and S. T. O'Brien, correspondents enroute. Honorary associate editors: Carl Laemmle, president; Joe Brandt, general manager; M. Fleckles, general manager, Chicago; M. H. Hoffman, general manager exchanges. Contributing editors: Every motion picture exhibitor.

A real up-to-the-minute management is back of the Majestic Theater, Grand Junction, Colorado, as shown by the weekly newspaper of four pages, called The Movie Fan, which this theater issues. The subscription price of this paper is twenty-five cents a year, and besides carrying the weekly program of the theater it also contains reviews of the different photoplays, news of the motion picture world, and a goodly supply of advertising. Congratulations are to be offered to the Majestic operating staff, made up of: President, William H. Swanson; treasurer, H. T. Nolan; general manager, Chas. Decker; musical director, Prof. Leslie Grossmith; operator, Howard Morton; assistant operator, Whittaker Jaynes; cashier, Anna Boecking; house electrician and doorman, John Mahoney.

To L. F. Valley, advertising manager of the Broadway and Piedmont Theaters, Charlotte, North Carolina, is due a great deal of credit for the weekly magazine he issues entitled Movie News. This little house organ contains sixteen pages and is a regular motion picture magazine. It carries reviews of the films, notes of the players, a question and answer department as well as the programs of the two theaters and advertising matters pertaining to the theaters, and a large amount of local advertising. This paper is issued every Friday and is given free to every patron of the Broadway and Piedmont Theaters. The current issue contains a coupon asking the reader to sign and send it to the box office of the theaters, stating whether they enjoy the Movie News and wish it continued. There is no doubt that every coupon will vote for a continuance of this magazine.

Two examples of clever newspaper advertising by moving picture theaters are seen in a Waterloo, Iowa, paper. The Plaza Theater has a specially designed "frame" which outlines all its advertisements, and asks its patrons to watch for that frame every day as it will contain the notices of the attractions at the Plaza. The other clever advertisement is that of the Palace Theater of Waterloo, Iowa, which ran in the local paper a big scarehead: "Can the Palace Theater Continue? Management Between the Devil and the Deep Sea of the Film Celebrities and the City Guardians." This advertisement evidently hits a vital issue of the town in the fight for better paving of certain streets in a very clever manner. The writer of the copy evidently knew what would most quickly attract the attention of the readers of the paper, and this publicity also identifies the theater with the vital interests of the community, which is good business.

E. B. Raifstanger, manager of the Maihawe Theater, Great Barrington, Massachusetts, carried out a very clever bit of advertising recently. He advertised in the local papers that on a particular night there would be a drawing for a six weeks' old baby at his theater, the visitors to the theater to receive coupons and the drawing to take place after the performance. The baby was described of good parents, with blue eyes and light hair, and Mr. Raifstanger agreed to take the baby back if it proved unsatisfactory to the winner. The affair caused a great deal of comment throughout the town—and incidentally gave the theater a great deal of free advertising. On the night of the drawing it was announced that the winner would be obliged to sign papers agreeing to look after the welfare of the baby. The drawing took place and amid great excitement the winner was presented with a fat little pig.

Triangle Program Popular in New York

The motion picture exhibitors in the Times Square district evidently think the lead of S. L. Rothapfel, of the Rialto Theater, is a good one to follow, for since he started his house with Triangle pictures S. Eckman, Jr., manager of the New York exchange, reports that he has signed the New York Theater, the American, the Stanley and the Broadway, all in this district, and also the Savoy and the Park in an adjacent neighborhood. This makes 130 theaters in New York using the Triangle program.

Charles Johnson Post, author, artist and soldier, has been engaged by the Triangle Film Corporation to organize a Pacific Coast branch of the publicity department. The Triangle aims to make Mr. Post the man on the ground who will standardize the distribution of the Coast studios and obtain through his close connection with the eastern offices and knowledge of their desires the kind of special material for which there is constant demand.

Thomas Ince has gone east to make arrangements for showing his big film, "Civilization," in a special private showing for the president and his cabinet and other government officials. Also he is planning to send a print to Rome to be shown to the Pope, and hopes that it may be a powerful influence for universal peace.

The real inventor of motion photographs was Eadweard Muybridge, who was born at Kingston-on-Thames in 1830, and afterwards migrated to America.

Vitagraph Forces Humming

UNUSUAL FEATURES COMPLETED

FOR the week of May 22 Vitagraph offered a six-part feature, "The Suspect," and a three-part feature, "The Primal Instinct," as well as three three-reel comedies, "Kernel Nutt Wins a Wife," "The Cost of High Living," and "The Battler."

These will be followed on May 29 by "The Lights of New York," a Blue Ribbon Feature. The story, written by Charles L. Gaskill, deals with life in New York's slums and later leads into the society circles and gives an idea of the manners and customs of the "Upper Ten." Leah Baird plays the leading role, supported by Walter Grail, who is seen as a gangster. Adele De Garde plays the role of the sister and Arthur Cozine and Don Cameron are also seen in good parts.

William O. S. Earle, director for the Vitagraph Company, assisted by Cameraman Clark R. Nickerson, is at Monte Alto, Pennsylvania, filming scenes showing the old and new methods of forest fire fighting. Mr. Earle is co-operating with the Pennsylvania Forest Rangers and School of Forestry. There will be two full reels made to assist the Bureau in their campaign for the collection of the necessary amount of money required to improve the present conditions. The first reel will show the system now in vogue, the old style way and means of carrying out their work, and the other will present the advantage of the new and improved methods.

Earle Williams, who is now working in Vitagraph's "The Secret Kingdom"

Director Wilfrid North and his company of players headed by Lillian Walker, Evart Overton, Denton Van and Robert Gaillard, have returned from Highland Falls, New York, where they have been filming scenes for an adaptation of one of Hamlin Garland's books, which is being produced as a Blue Ribbon feature. Director North used many of the natives of Highland Falls in the filming of the play, and the locations corresponded exactly with the description in Hamlin's book. An iron mine which has been in operation since 1776 and from which iron was extracted to furnish cannon balls for Washington in many of his battles, was utilized in this picture.

If he had been made to order Anders Randolf could not have better suited the part of Karatoff, the military governor, in the Vitagraph feature, "The Suspect." Mr. Randolf is a direct descendent of one of the Viking kings of early Danish history, and his physique and general appearance make him resemble his noted ancestor. In addition to being an actor of ability he is a pastelle artist of reputation and one of the greatest swordsmen in Europe, being the winner of the championship in Denmark at the age of eighteen.

One of the prominent physicians of Bay Shore, Long Island, received a telephone call the other day which made him move about as fast as he had ever moved in his life.

When he answered the 'phone an excited voice on the other end shouted: "Come to the Vitagraph studio, quick, one of our stars has attempted suicide."

He immediately collected a number of instruments, including the pulmotor, put them into his waiting auto and made a dash for the film establishment.

While he was doing this, Director Ralph W. Ince, with his cast and camerman, were patiently awaiting his arrival. It seems Lucille Lee Stewart was to have attempted suicide in the Blue Ribbon feature now being completed by Mr. Ince, and this capable director conceived the idea of having a practicing physician come into the scene and go about his work in the regular way. With the assistance of Miss Stewart the deception was carried out and the developed negative shows a very realistic piece of work, including a busy doctor with all the latest surgical instruments.

"The Secret Kingdom" provides Earle Williams with an opportunity to reveal the strongest and most convincing angles of his acting. Although Mr. Williams has been an admired Vitagraph celebrity for years he is now giving promise of better acting than ever before. He is displaying remarkable versatility in each new Vitagraph shadow drama that appears.

City Taxes Theaters

Petitions have been placed in circulation in Defiance, Ohio, asking for a referendum on the new ordinance passed by council imposing a tax on motion picture theaters.

Proprietors of the local theaters are backing the movement. They assert that the tax imposed by city council is prohibitive and that if it is enforced it will mean either the closing of their places or the importation of cheap and trashy films.

The assertions also is made that the tax is considerably higher than that imposed in Toledo, where the shows have the benefit of three performances, one in the morning, a second in the afternoon and the third in the evening.

The tax provided is $4, $8 and $12 per month.

Kleine Opens New Branches

The demands for the Billie Burke serial have caused George Kleine to add four new offices to his list of exchanges. There is now a branch in the Empress Building, St. Louis, with I. P. Rosenberg in charge; another in Indianapolis, Fletcher Savings and Trust Building, W. A. Ratz, manager; one at 207 Broadway Market Building, Detroit, in charge of F. Rutledge, and a fourth new office under the managership of Rudolph Berger in the Bank of Commerce and Savings Building in Washington, D. C.

UNIQUE INTERNATIONAL FILM

International Film Service, Inc., Catches Anti-Censorship Demonstration at Albany. "Mysteries of Myra" Still Going Strong

Friday night at the Motion Picture Board of Trade at Madison Square Garden witnessed the first showing of scenes made at Albany during the anti-censorship propaganda led by the International Film Service, Inc. The film showed the arrival at Albany of delegates and speakers on the special train run over the New York Central road, the progress of the huge motor truck, containing ballots of protest against the obnoxious measure being hauled through the streets of Albany and approaching the state house, where the box of protests was presented to Governor Whitman.

His excellency the governor is shown greeting prominent officials in filmdom, lawyers and speakers. A very excellent close-up was obtained of E. A. MacManus, president of the International Film Service, Inc., in the act of shaking hands with Governor Whitman.

The International is to be congratulated upon the success of its whirlwind campaign against the obnoxious censorship measure, and it will be almost entirely due to the untiring efforts of this company that the censorship bill will be vetoed.

How Jean Sothern, star of International Film Service, Inc., was actually hynotized in her own scene during the filming of an episode in "The Mysteries of Myra," has been told in a previous issue.

The scene referred to showed the great hynotizing machine in operation, and at the conclusion of the scene Miss Sothern continued in her position, eyes fixed and staring. After being awakened Miss Sothern was dazed for some time and was unable to continue with her work for the rest of the day.

A New York woman also fell under the spell of the machine, from watching the screening of the particular scene in "The Mysteries of Myra" which so strongly affected Miss Sothern. That this actually occurred, and the lady in question was in a sort of trance for some minutes after the scene faded out, will be corroborated by a number of witnesses.

J. K. Burger, manager of exchanges, of the International Film Service, Inc., has left for a week's trip to Pittsburgh, Chicago and St. Louis, where he is called on business matters in connection with the unprecedented booking of the "Mysteries of Myra" feature series.

On a recent trip to Boston Mr. Burger booked additional business to the amount of thirty-nine thousand dollars.

Up to date the "Mysteries of Myra" series has broken all records for bookings all over the country, and the demand for this feature is greatly increased as the exhibitors are made to realize the possibilities of this huge success. Letters from exhibitors are daily pouring into the International offices, and in every instance the "Mysteries" series is pronounced the biggest thing in pictures now before the public.

The International Film Service, Inc., introduced a decided novelty at the Board of Trade exposition, when Mr. Herbert Hancock, one of America's most eminent motion picture producers, staged some of his work for the edification of the crowd.

Mr. Hancock showed the gowns themselves displayed by New York's best model talent. He then directed the actual filming of the gowns, as it is done in the studios. One hour later he showed on the screen the finished picture, and scenes which had been taken only a few moments before. Thus the audience was given opportunity to view these late creations twice in the same evening, much to the delight of the feminine contingent.

When introducing this novelty, Mr. Hancock stated that it has been his aim always to produce fashions in an artistic manner, showing not only the gown itself to the best advantage, but also seeing to it that the models wearing these gowns are physically fit and best suited to the purpose, thus carrying out the idea of beautiful gowns for beautiful girls.

Board of Trade Show Big Success

hibitors who came to the show. The Eastman Kodak Company's booth was in charge of Richard Brady of the cine film department. Other booths on the balcony at the Twenty-seventh street side of the Garden were occupied by The Acme Lithographing Company, Simplex Photo Products Company, Bell & Howell, National Carbon Company, Children's Program Society, Typhoon Fan Company, John Letterstedt.

The Motion Picture Apparatus Company's representation was situated on the balcony at the Twenty-sixth street side. Here numerous motion picture supplies were on view. The Carroll Non-Rewinding Magazine was on display at one of the booths. The Cooper Hewitt Company, Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company, Film Fire Protection Company, Vim Comedies, Universal Electric Stage Lighting, Kinetikartoon Company and the Screen Club booths were to be found on the balcony.

The motion picture press was well represented. Arthur Leslie's Publicity Headquarters, Motion Picture Magazine, Motion Picture Classic, The Moving Picture World, The Motion Picture Mail, Motion Picture News, New York Morning Telegraph and MOTOGRAPHY maintained booths throughout the week.

What for a few minutes looked like a fire panic at the Garden during the exposition was caused by the ignition of film in one of the booths. The crowd were quickly quieted, however, when they learned it was only a fire started to demonstrate the efficient fire prevention device which was attached to the projection machine. The demonstration was made by the Film Fire Prevention Company which handles this device.

Director Ralph W. Ince conferred a distinction upon his roster of players when he added to them Miss Josephine Lovett, who will play the part of the mother in his next production.

Miss Lovett has had a stage career that has been significant, appearing in leading roles with Henry Miller, Robert Hilliard, Robert Edeson, Miss Henrietta Crossman and just prior to joining the Vitagraph players was connected with the Miss Grace George Company at the Republic Theater in New York. These important stage portrayals has well fitted Mr. Ince's new player for the photoplay. Miss Lovett also wrote the scenario of the play in which she is to appear.

Should the film fire in the gate of the projector always remember that the first thing to do is to keep cool.

Munsterberg Speaks at Paramount Reception

GEORGE BEBAN AND OTHER NOTABLES AT EXPOSITION

THE Paramount reception at the exposition brought together an unusual number of notable people of the screen. An exhibition of George Beban in "Pasquale" was made one afternoon and evening and Mr. Beban was present to give a little talk and receive his friends. Dorothy Dent was the guest of honor at the reception, and Fanny Ward came to the Garden to see herself on the screen for the first time in "The Cheat." Jack Dean, who in private life is Fanny Ward's husband, accompanied her. Burton Holmes and Professor Munsterberg were also present.

Hugo Munsterberg, Harvard psychologist, scenario writer and associate editor of the Paramount Pictographs, spoke at the exposition on how he dared put psychology into motion pictures. He said he realized that the screen provided a more universal text book than the laboratories could ever become and that psychology might become a vast and far-reaching influence through its presentation on the screen.

"Much is heard about the conservation of natural resources in this country," said Professor Munsterberg. "But what, if anything, is heard about conserving the natural talents of young people, who know nothing about directing their ability in the proper direction? Practically nothing. Here is where I saw that the Paramount Pictograph might step in to direct a vast wealth of talent into the proper channels.

"I have arranged my mental tests in the Pictograph so that motion picture audiences may learn what characteristics equip one for special kinds of work, so that each individual may find his proper setting. There are tests to show whether one has constructive imagination, the ability to think quickly—these are for the executive type of mind, which must be able to grasp the meaning of a situation as soon as it presents itself. My scenario shows simply how the constructive mind can build names out of letters arranged in a totally different order from the original one.

"For the man who does detail work there is another kind of test. In this the pictures show how keen is one's power of observation and the scenes have important details missing which may not be apparent at first glance. There is no type of mind which cannot be classified through this series, which may do a wonderful work in making the necessary connection between talent and the occupation for which it is best suited.

"While the school books of the past may not be discarded for the screen, the films will have perhaps a wider and greater field of usefulness. There need be no limits practically to the influence of the motion picture as an educator, although there is no subject which can be more clearly presented through the camera than psychology."

New Holmes Travel Picture

Burton Holmes' latest "Easy Chair" journey was "Cruising Through the Philippines to Cebu, Iloila and Zamboangu." The trip was made as the guest of Uncle Sam in the coast guard cutter "Scout." Mr. Holmes has also prepared a film entitled "Every Little Bonnet Has a Meaning of Its Own." This shows a collection he has acquired of masculine millinery from all parts of the world.

Mr. Holmes himself posed for the photographs in which he is seen in India wearing the pith helmet, in Hawaii with a "lei" around his broad-brimmed hat, as a Javanese gentleman with turbans, skirts and parasols, in Hongkong—looking very much like an American—among the Parsees wearing their shadeless homely black headgear, in peasant gala costume in Bohemia, as a gentleman from Java dressed for a rainy day promenade and in the street dress and pot hat of Korea.

The second of Ashley Miller's "Plastiques," "Did Sherman Say Law or War?" is among the short reel subjects from the J. R. Bray studios on the Paramount Program. Two farmers, a lawyer and a cow constitute the cast of this drama, the plot of which depends on the squabble of the farmers over a cow which is claimed by both. The rightful owner engages a lawyer to defend his rights, but the litigation drags out through the courts until the cow wastes to a skeleton. At the final settlement one farmer is awarded the cow's tail, the other his horns. To the lawyer himself goes the cow as the payment for long and faithful service.

Witchcraft Exploited by Lubin

Sorcery, superstition, witchcraft, wraiths and goblins all have a part in the Lubin five-reel feature, "The Flames of Johannis," in which Nance O'Neil is starring. There are many wierd and unusual scenes and mystic camera tricks inserted in this film which make it quite out of the ordinary. One scene depicts Nance O'Neil as the foundling, Marika, playing tense episodes with herself as Zirah, the old gipsy thief. The company encountered some peculiar superstitions of the Dutch while filming this play in Pennsylvania. One scene calls for a snow storm and there is a legend to the effect that the Onion Snow always comes about the first of April. The director waited in vain and at last had to move the company to Wilkesbarre, where a real snow storm was raging, because the Onion Snow did not arrive this year until April 7.

For a perfectly opaque screen, a stout, dead white paper, pasted over heavy sheeting and well whitewashed when dry, answers excellently.

With Paramount and Burton Holmes in the Philippines, glimpse from one of the Holmes Travel Pictures

FEATURE FOR EXPOSITION

Selig Has Interesting Feature at Exposition—Other Pictures Completed and in the Making

William N. Selig prepared a most unusual and interesting feature to add to the pleasure of the exhibitors and others who attended the National meeting of Motion Picture Exhibitors in New York—a special film presenting the famous Selig Zoo at Los Angeles, and inside views of the filming of a Selig Red Seal Play.

Selig's six-reel feature, "War-torn Poland," had its premier showing at the Star Theater, Chicago. Although the seating capacity of this house is 2,200, it was packed from one o'clock until midnight and the manager has secured a return engagement for two days. The leading Polish societies of this country are taking unusual interest in this film and may use it in connection with the Polish Relief Fund.

Athletic Feature Films is a new series which Selig will release through the V. L. S. E. This series will be composed of twelve one-reel feature films showing the most famous stars of the athletic world in action, and will be under the direction of J. H. Herman, well known as a promoter of athletic events. Among the subjects to be presented are Albert Cutler, the Yankee billiard champion, in a match game with Koji Yamata, the Jap marvel; Dr. B. F. Roller and Frank Dalkus in a wrestling match; Mike Gibbons in a boxing match; also champion players of pocket billiards, bicycle racers, boxers and others prominent in various lines of sport and science.

Active work has begun on the seven-reel production of "The History of Indiana." The scenario, which was written by Gilson Willete, has been approved by the Indiana Historical Commission and the Governor of the State. Frank Beal is directing the production.

The Selig Company released a number of shorter productions through the General Film Company. On May 1 "The Man Within," a three-reel Diamond special featuring Tom Mix and Victoris Ford, was released. "An Elephant's Gratitude," in which Edith Johnson and Harry Lonsdale are starred, and an elephant enacts a most important role, was released May 6. Charles Hoyt's comedy, "A Stranger in New York," with Otis Harlan in the title role, will be another three-reel Diamond Special and was released on May 8. "The Sheriff's Duty," a Tom Mix drama, was scheduled for May 13.

A series of one-reel Tom Mix western comedies and dramas will soon be released by the Selig Company through the General Film Company.

Ivan Insures Realism

Director Abramson of the Ivan studios insists upon realism in the scenes. Recently in the production of "Her Husband's Wife," the child, played by Kittens Reichert, is supposed to cry for her parents and a friendly musician who has taken charge of her tries to soothe her by playing on his violin.

After three rehearsals in which Kittens failed to bring the real tears Mr. Abramson had about given it up, and no wonder for even William Bechtel himself, who was playing the role of the musician could hardly conceal his mirth at his rendition of a popular air. They were struggling with this scene one day when Professor Alexander, the Modern Stradavarius, was visiting the studio. On a happy inspiration the director asked the great violinist if he would play. He consented and the scene was taken with Bechtel "faking the fiddle" and the professor behind the camera playing a familiar lullaby to which Sally Crute, Mignon Anderson, Agustus Phillips, Brindsley Shaw, Bradley Barker and Edward Mackey lent their voices. The effect on Kittens was immediate and real tears coursed down her baby cheeks.

Noted Cameraman Dead

Emmet A. Williams, a well-known New York cameraman and a member of the Cinema Camera Club, died on April 28 at his home in New Rochelle, N. Y. Mr. Williams was for some years employed by the Thanhouser Company, the Mutual Film Company, and for the last two years was connected with the Famous Players Mary Pickford Company. Mr. Williams was Miss Pickford's cameraman. She had great confidence in his ability to portray her to the best advantage on the screen. Mr. Williams is survived by his wife and three brothers.

Among those attending his funeral were Mary Pickford, Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Company, and Mrs. Zukor, Al. Kaufman, James Kirkwood and H. L. Broening, representing the Cinema Camera Club.

New Screen Club Organized

Des Moines, Iowa, is the latest city to come into the fold with the organization of a Screen Club. The charter members of this organization are A. Blank, L. A. Sheridan, M. J. Frisch, Abe Frankel, R. S. Ballantyne, Harry Hiersteiner, C. W. Jefferies, R. C. LeBeau, C. P. Rich, C. E. Smith and V. B. Lederman.

The officers are C. E. Smith, president; Abe Frankel, vice president; Harry Hiersteiner, secretary, and A. Blank, treasurer.

Only one meeting of this club has been held as yet, the object being to plan the best way in which they could co-operate with the Iowa Exhibitors' League in their convention to be held on May 23 and 24. It was decided to give a big ball and banquet on May 24 under the auspices of both the Exhibitors' League and the Screen Club.

Overland in Buffalo

Buffalo, New York, is now the headquarters of the Overland Film Producing Company, a newly incorporated firm. The company's first six-reel feature, on which it is now working and to be released about September 1, is being kept a secret, except that its title is, "Man's Fate Is Woman," and it is announced to be a heavy, society drama, with plenty of strong moral points. The story was written by James Calnay, the president of the company, who is to direct and to be featured in the play. He came to this country from Europe where he is known as an expert in the motion pictures, and although only two years on this side of the ocean he has done well in adopting American ideals.

Annette Kellerman, the "diving Venus," who is famed the world over for her swimming, has a beautiful voice and has an ambition to become a classical singer and dancer. She is now a Fox star.

The Photoplay Scenario

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT

Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

Note—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of Motography, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

"Be Not Afraid"

PERHAPS the best motto to give the aspiring photoplaywright is "Be not afraid." If you are interested in photoplay writing and are desirous of entering the profession, be not afraid, first of all, to carefully take stock of your own endowments. Thoroughly analyze yourself, look the question squarely in the face and consider the matter from all standpoints.

Do you possess any natural talent?

Are you ambitious and determined to succeed?

Are you willing to work and work hard?

Are you ready to overcome various obstacles and many discouragements?

Be perfectly frank with yourself in this analysis. Do not be so modest and so lacking in self-esteem that you are afraid to give yourself a just chance. Do not be afraid to try for fear you will not make a success of the work and for fear you do not possess sufficient talent to justify its being developed. Give yourself a chance to find out of what ability you are master. You may possess much ingenuity which has been lying dormant awaiting development. But on the other hand do not be so sure of yourself that you stumble over your own self-conceit.

SHORT STORIES AND PHOTOPLAYS

Be not afraid you cannot write photoplays because you have never been able to write short stories. The two classes of literary effort are entirely different. There are many successful short story writers who are not able to write salable scenarios. In short story writing you need a command of the English language which is not necessary in scenario writing. The glowing description and flowery literary endeavors so pleasing in short stories are entirely out of place in the photoplay. The clever, spicy conversation which is hard for the neophyte to compose is not required in the photoplay. What is required in the scenario is not a story encompassed with beautiful phrases and carried along by the description of characters and their conversation, but simply a story told in action, and that action expressed in terse, concise words. So your lack of ability in writing short stories does not necessarily mean your lack of ingenuity in writing photoplays.

FIELD IS OPEN FOR EVERYONE

Also remember that the photoplay field is a "free for all." There is no racial prejudice here. There is a chance for everyone in photoplay writing, there is no barring of race, color or class. The film companies are looking for brains which are capable of conceiving original ideas and developing strong plots. It makes no difference to them whether you come from the tenements in the slums or from the palatial home of the multi-millionaire. It makes no difference whether you are a German, an Englishman, a Japanese, or an American-born citizen, everyone has an even chance, there is no playing of favorites.

WORK AND WORK HARD

Be not afraid to work. If you are not willing to work and work hard, do not go into this profession. There is no easy road to success. Do not think it is easy to write salable scenarios. It is not. One of the most erroneous ideas of the amateur writer is that anyone can write a photoplay as good as many of those seen on the screen, and then they start in the work and find writing salable scenarios is a man's work and no mere child's play. Scenario writing is no easy task—it means study, concentration, thought, a versatile mind and vivid imagination, and most of all, a tenacity "to stick until success comes." And to those who will stick, will work, will wait, success will come and in a measure to more than compensate for all the energy involved.

SUBMIT ONLY YOUR BEST EFFORTS

Do not think that the reason you do not succeed is because the editors do not appreciate your efforts, they do appreciate and depreciate them, they know that they are not worth while and so will not accept them. But once produce something which is worth while and see how quickly they will recognize it. Do not start out with the idea that you will try out the game and write a photoplay, no matter whether it represents your best efforts or not, and send it out to a film company just to see what they think about it and then later if you think it worth while, write a masterpiece. Remember the editor is as good at guessing as you are and he recognizes at a glance that this is simply a mediocre script dashed off in a spirit of bravado, and will return it to you with a feeling of resentment that you should think he could not detect your game. And when your next script comes along he will be too wary to bite a second time, and it will be given no consideration. If this photoplay writing is worth doing at all, it is worth doing well. If you are going to write a masterpiece write it, and do not try to break into the film game until you have something to offer which represents the best that is in you at the time. It may not be the best of which you will eventually be capable, for study and practice will develop your faculties until you can produce something which is really salable. But it will show the film company editor that you are willing to submit only your best work, and are putting thought and conscientious endeavor into the writing of your manuscripts, and he will readily see that ultimately you will be able to produce something worth while and will be willing to read whatever you submit.

DO NOT BE EASILY DISCOURAGED

Be not afraid of discouragement. If you are easily discouraged, stop now. If you cannot endure the discouragement of seeing script after script come back with sickening regularity until you have reached the point where you have something worth selling, do not start in this profession. It is disheartening to spend weeks over a manuscript and then have it promptly returned marked "Unavailable." You must be able to rebound from these setbacks, you must not acknowledge you are beaten but simply arise from each defeat of this kind with the grim determination that you will beat the game yet, with the knowledge that there is something lacking in your work, there is some reason why you were downed, you are weak in some respect. Always keep in mind the idea that the joy over the first script accepted will more than atone for all these discouragements.

THE SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST

But stop and consider a moment. Is there any profession, literary or otherwise, which you can enter and immediately attain success? Consider the young doctor and lawyer; does success come to them with the issuing of their license to practice? No. Take the young man entering commercial business; is he immediately made head of the firm? No. In everything, we must start at the beginning and work up, we must climb the ladder of success rung by rung, and in law, medicine, technical work, politics, literary endeavor and photoplay writing, it is a case of "the survival of the fittest," and it behooves you to make yourself one of the "fittest." If you fall by the way there are many ready and eager to press forward to take your place, to obliterate you entirely, and the race will go forward without you.

DO NOT BE OVERZEALOUS

On the other hand do not be overzealous, when a script is accepted and you receive your check accompanied by a polite letter from the editor saying he will be glad to receive further contributions from you, do not thing that your reputation is made and any script which bears your name will immediately be accepted. Do not bundle up all the old manuscripts you have been unable to sell and fire them right back at the editor, for he will return them to you just as quickly. He does not want any old thing you have, he wants other plays which measure up to the standard of the one he has just accepted. This bombardment of mediocre and amateurish scripts will be liable to spoil your career just as it has started.

As there is a psychological moment for everything so is there a psychological time in plot making and selling. To be successful requires patience, definite ambition and good judgment.

Be not afraid to work, study, wait for success—and you will reach your goal.

Revival of the Short Film

A STUDY of the recent releases of the different film companies will bring joy to the heart of the free lance writers, for they will find that almost all of the companies are again turning to the shorter photoplays, the one, two and three-reelers. Some of the companies are making a specialty of the one and two reels and are featuring the same stellar talent in these plays as in the longer ones. This means that the short plays must contain as much meritorious material as the longer ones.

This change on the part of the film companies denotes the change in the public demand—for the public is the ultimate consumer and what the public demands the public will get. There has been such a surfeit of the five and seven-reel feature films that the motion picture public has tired of them and the return to the shorter plays is a relief.

This does not mean that the shorter plays will be shown to the exclusion of all others but that the programs will carry a greater variety, and the number of one, two and three-reelers produced will be much greater than formerly. Some companies which have never before produced anything but features are now adding the short films to their regular programs.

This change of policy should encourage the amateur who has felt that the market for the outside writer was very poor on account of the number of adaptations which were used for features, and the limited demand there was for the short films. Many amateur writers who can write strong one and two-reel photoplays do not feel that they are capable of handling larger subjects, and they have become rather discouraged in the last year because so many of their really worth while scripts have been returned because the various companies stated they were buying no one and two-reel scenarios.

In submitting scenarios of one and two-reel lengths there is this to be taken into consideration. The one and two-reelers of today are very different from those shown two years ago. Each one is a miniature masterpiece. As the companies are putting the same care into the selection of cast and direction on these shorter films as on the features the play must be worthy of that attention. It is not the ordinary play which has so little of value in it that it is not worth wasting more than a thousand feet of film on it that is desired, but it is the play which although extending over only one or two thousand feet of film fills every inch of this space with strong, original action.

There is even a greater demand for short comedies than for dramas, and the writer who has clever, humorous ideas can always find a ready market for them. If you feel that your forte is this class of photoplay, then now is the time for you to dig right in and see if you cannot fill the demand for high class comedies.

Thomas Chatterton—Soldier

Thomas Chatterton, hero of "The Secret of the Submarine," the new American-Mutual chaptered photoplay, was chosen for this role partly because he is one inch short of six feet, and impresses all who meet him with his excellent carriage and soldierly bearing.

Thomas Chatterton in "The Secret of the Submarine."

Mr. Chatterton had a good deal of stage experience to his credit before going into pictures. He acquired the stage fever when fourteen years old, and as a leader of the boys he fitted up the barn, directed the scenery painting, built the props, wrote the plays and acted the leads. After many appearances in amateur theatricals Chatterton secured a position in the Shubert stock company when only seventeen years old. In after years he toured in vaudeville, put in a season with Proctor's Fifth Avenue stock company, and heard his own vaudeville team, and then became a permanent member of a stock company. His first engagement with the motion pictures was with the Universal, after which he became a member of the "Flying A" force.

As Lieutenant Hope, U. S. A., in "The Secret of the Submarine," Mr. Chatterton has a splendid opportunity, and he enacts the role of the dauntless young naval officer vigorously and naturally.

Signal Plans Trip to Orient

Combining business with pleasure, Helen Holmes, J. P. McGowan and their company of Signal players are soon to leave the Los Angeles studios for a trip to the Orient, the trip to serve in the double capacity of vacation after the strenuous work of producing "The Girl and the Game" serial and the later feature, "Whispering Smith," and to enable them to secure the necessary boat scenes and exteriors in Honolulu for the production of a five-reel feature, "The Diamond Runners," which Mr. McGowan and Miss Holmes are at present putting into scenario form.

The party will take passage at San Francisco and go direct to Honolulu to make exterior scenes. It has not yet been decided whether or not they will continue the trip to Japan and the Philippines, but it is likely that they will visit either one or the other of the two places before returning to the Los Angeles studios for the making of the remaining interior scenes.

Those to comprise the company on the trip include, besides Miss Holmes and Mr. McGowan, Paul C. Hurst, Thomas G. Lingham and Mrs. Lingham, Leo D. Maloney, William Brunton, S. A. Sues, the cameraman, and a staff of propertymen and assistants. A set of lights will be taken along to facilitate the making of interiors on the ship and in real locations in the islands.

Before leaving Los Angeles, it is Mr. McGowan's intention to make a number of exterior scenes of action that is to take place in the Kimberly mines. The party will be away something over a month, working by easy stages towards the completion of the five-reel story of adventure.

The J. P. McGowan company of the Signal Film Corporation has completed the production of "Whispering Smith," the first episode of the screen version adapted from the novel of that name by Frank H. Spearman, and has begun the production of the second installment, which is to be released under the title, "Medicine Bend." So far as can be learned, this method of releasing a feature in two episodes of five reels each has never been employed by a film company prior to "Whispering Smith."

Survey lines this week were run by a corps of engineers for the laying out of a spur and a passing track at the Signal's studio station at Signal on the Salt Lake railroad near Pasadena. It was found advisable to lay these tracks to facilitate the production of the company's railroad pictures, in which it specializes.

New Chicago V. L. S. E. Department

The Chicago office of V. L. S. E., Inc., has announced a new department for the especial benefit of exhibitors. It is to be a publicity department, under charge of Gordon Laurence, "which will be ready at all times to assist exhibitors in securing greater returns out of V. L. S. E. features through co-operation with the newspapers, suggestions for local advertising and by supplying especially prepared advertisements for the newspapers."

Visitors are no longer to be received with open arms at the Signal Film corporation's studios. The latch-string has been pulled inside and the welcome mat has been hidden in a dark closet where it is in no danger of April-fooling an unsuspecting public. The popularity of the studio as a place where film fans might watch Helen Holmes at work was found to be growing too rapidly for the liking of the producer and cast. The result was the construction of barred gates and the refusal to allow anyone within them unless he was really bent upon business.

WOMEN URGE CLEAN FILMS

Woman's Press Club of New York Urges Members to Show Manufacturers They Will Uphold Only Clean Pictures

At the last meeting of the New York Woman's Press Club Jane Stannard Johnson delivered an address in which she pointed out to the members that it was within the power of the women to compel clean pictures.

Resolutions were drawn up, a copy of which was to be sent to each manufacturer. These resolutions stated that recognizing that the motion picture is more widely read than any other form of printed matter today and also that while some of these pictures are not of the standard of literature one would have in their homes, some are of a very high class and show what the manufacturer can produce. The resolutions ask, therefore, that the manufacturers turn their time to producing only high class pictures and the women of the club pledge themselves to support these manufacturers by patronizing pictures of this desirable type and withholding their patronage from unworthy pictures. Also they promise to publish the names of the producers who are making these worthy films in their club publications and help them in every way possible.

It is claimed that the efforts of some manufacturers to produce high class pictures has proved their popularity and money making value. For example, the two most popular actresses of the stage and screen are Maude Adams and Mary Pickford, and yet neither has ever been seen in anything but a clean picture. It is allowed that the producers are right in declaring they must give a variety of pictures in order to please everyone, and intelligent women of this country do not think that only such pictures as can be seen by children and girls should be produced.

The members of the club have found it is not only necessary in handling this matter to recommend good pictures seen at local theaters, but to attain the end desired they must get back of the exhibitor to the manufacturer of the films. Hence the determination to send a copy of the resolutions to all manufacturers and ask for their co-operation in this matter.

Action is also to be taken on this matter at the Biennial of the General Federation of Women's Clubs when it meets in New York this month.

A TRIBUTE PERFORMANCE

Mammoth Charity Show Was Given in the Metropolitan Opera House for Benefit of Actors' Fund Many Notables Present

The country-wide movement to raise money for the actors' fund culminated in a tribute performance at the Metropolitan Opera House on May 16. The most prominent members of the musical profession offered their services on this program.

Through her double association with both the films and the opera stage, Geraldine Farrar was particularly important in the Metropolitan affair. Miss Farrar presented the second act of "Madame Butterfly," assisted by Signor Polacco. Such artists as Mme. Alda, Lucca Botta, Fritz Kreisler and Leopold Godowsky completed the musical offerings. The affair was under the personal direction of Daniel Frohman, president of the fund.

Each of the two big film expositions held in New York had an actors' fund day, and at the Garden an added feature was provided in a series of dancers and soloists, who rendered the film song, "Florence Lawrence," which was sold at the Palace for the benefit of the campaign. Renderings of the words and music of the Misses MacDonald and Steiner were given by Ethel Gilmore, premiere danseuse of the Metropolitan Canadian Grand Opera Company; Irma Summa; Florence Tappan; Helene Coyne, of the Metropolitan ballet; Garry McGarry, of the Vitagraph Company of America; Alice Fyller and the Misses Marguerite and Mary McNamara.

The west is vieing with the east in their efforts to swell the actors' fund, and San Francisco is coming well to the fore. The local committee in charge of the activities in San Francisco is composed of: Chairman, Herman Wobber; secretary, Mark M. Leichter; director of publicity, Louis Levy; Irving Ackerman, Morris Meyerfeld, Sid Grauman, Alexander A. Beyfus, John Partington, C. Langley, Eugene Roth, Sam Harris, Joseph Levin, Ralph Pincus, M. J. Getz, George Davis, Homer Curran, J. J. Cluxton, Sam Levin, Sam Gordon, Thomas O'Day, Mark A. Lasky, Selby Openheimer, William Citron, Ralph Clark, Louis Reichert, R. Quive, H. H. Hicks, F. K. Stout, M. L. Markowitz, H. W. Ohive, R. S. Simpson, H. W. Stubbins and Sam Loverich. Great things are expected of San Francisco and its organization when the final tally is made up.

Paul West, poet, author, humorist and photoplaywright, and Epes Winthrop Sargent, author and photoplaywright, have both written letters urging the public to help in this worthy charity, laying stress on the point that one is not simply asked to contribute to this fund, but it given an exceptionally good performance in payment for the amount contributed.

Anita Stewart, the Vitagraph star, led the grand march at the big film ball held in Horticultural Hall, Philadelphia, to aid the actors' fund. The ball was a great success both socially and financially. The committee of patronesses included Mrs. Cornelius Stevenson, Mrs. William Yorke Stevenson, president of the Plays and Players Club; Mrs. Samuel Chew, president of the Charlotte Cushman Club; Mrs. Otis Skinner and Mrs. R. Emmet Hare.

Screen Beauties Invade Wall Street

Florence La Badie, the Thanhouser star, accompanied by the most beautiful young actresses from the studios around New York, invaded Wall street May 15 in an effort to interest the brokers in the campaign for the Actors' Fund. Miss La Badie led the procession in her new white and gold car and the others followed in decorated automobiles. The young ladies were all dressed in their prettiest and most becoming clothes, and hoped to raise money to aid in the campaign and also arouse interest in the benefit performances at the different theaters in the evening.

S. L. Rothapfel, director of the Rialto Theater, New York, assisted by Samuel Goldfish, chairman of the National Executive Committee of the Motion Picture Campaign, and Daniel Frohman, president of the Actors' Fund, planned a mammoth festival of motion picture stars for the Rialto Theater the week of May

On May 15 hardly a theater in Kansas City and vicinity failed to donate ten per cent of their receipts to the Actors' Fund. Much of the credit for this cooperation is due to a sub-committee composed of Frank L. Newman of the Royal, Frank I. Buckingham of the Apollo and William Scoville of the Idle Hour. 15 for the benefit of the fund.

Current Releases Reviewed

"A Rose of Italy"

Three-Reel Essanay Drama Released May 20. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A NUMBER of scenes and events which make for entertainment have been included in this release in a quite unusual combination. There are scenes in the steerage of a ship and in the Italian quarter of a city. There are scenes of the rehearsal and first performance of a musical comedy, scenes in a fashionable restaurant and in an artist's studio. There is a suspicion of intrigue and to end the play there is a "black hand" murder and the villain is blown up by a bomb. If, amid these varied sensations, the story itself gets quite lost, it really does not matter for the story is the least important thing in the release.

Ann Kirk does a very good Italian girl sketch as Lucia Lamberti. She plays with spirit the various phases of the role from newsboy to dancer, and is entertaining at all times. She is introduced in a scene which depicts the steerage of an ocean liner when she and her parents are enroute to America. Later we find them living in the "Little Italy" of an American city. Lucia and a young Italian, Luigi Sforza (Edmund F. Cobb), who is studying to be a lawyer, are very good friends. Through the young man Lucia meets an artist. Ashton Bright (Hugh Thompson), who offers her a position as his model. Later she meets Bolano (Richardson Cotton), an Italian banker, who is influential in securing for her a place in the chorus of a musical comedy. Of course, at the first performance she takes the leading lady's place and scores a triumph.

Because of her success, she is now unwilling to marry the young lawyer. Bolano, the banker, is very attentive and invites her to dine in his apartment. But the banker has been marked for death by an Italian society and a bomb has been timed to explode at midnight. Before the hour is struck, Lucia has been frightened by the advances of her host and has left via the fire-escape. So only the banker is killed. After this experience Lucia decides to give up her career and marry Luigi.

The photography is good and the settings of the play are interesting. The players are well cast and handle their roles capably.

"The Lion and the Girl"

Joe Jackson in Triangle-Keystone Comedy. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

GREAT is our admiration for the courage of Claire Anderson. In "The Lion and the Girl" she does a scene with Leo which we would never consent to were we a motion picture player, even though we are aware that Leo is far famed for the sweetness and gentleness of his disposition. A lion is a lion and as long as we can avoid dyspepsia we will never allow one to paw our face with all the intimacy which comes naturally to a born barber.

"The Lion and the Girl" gives Joe Jackson one of his best opportunities since becoming a Keystone comedian. No comedian could look more ragged than Jackson when he dons his tramp make-up. In the beginning of this comedy he appears in his customary rags but the story permits him to get dressed up later on and he proves here that his comedy is not dependent upon his rags.

This is a satisfying Keystone. There is more story to it than is usual in this form of picture entertainment. It remains faithful to the play it commences when the pawn-broker presents his wife with a watch. This is found by Joe Jackson, who returns with it to the shop and bargains for some stylish garments. We don't know where Jackson got the shave, but anyway when he dressed himself up he looked just as though he but an instant before walked out of a barber's shop. He rescues the pawn-broker's daughter from the ferocious lion and is to receive her in marriage as a reward. Despite the fact that the girl is pretty and a handsome dowry goes with her, Joe decides that he "does not belong" and changes his mind at the last moment.

Some very amusing stunts are done in mid-air and the auto chase is well done. The trick camera work is especially good. May Wells, Louis Morrison, Clarence Lyndon, Leo Kendal and Billy Hauber are others in the cast.

'Pasquale"

Morosco-Paramount Release Features George Beban Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

WHEN shown at the Exposition at Madison Square Garden "Pasquale," in which George Beban makes his first appearance on the Paramount Program, was found to be a splendidly produced picture telling a simple story with a deep human interest and notable mostly for the characterization rendered by the star. George Beban may always be depended upon to give an interesting performance and he is not disappointing in this picture. In fact, his acting as the kind-hearted, boyishly enthusiastic Pasquale is emphatically pleasing.

The story is by Mr. Beban and Lawrence McCloskey. It is a story that will hold the interest well and while lacking anything of a striking dramatic nature it is one that will meet with the approval of audiences in general.

A high character of support is given Mr. Beban by the cast that includes Helen Eddy, Jack Nelson, Myrtle Stedman, Nigel de Brullier and Page Peters. Next to the star, Jack Nelson has the most prominent role. He makes good use of his opportunities and his Charlie Larkin, the worthless chap who wins the girl Pasquale loves, is sufficiently "heavy" without being overdone. Helen Eddy has a part of more importance than she has had since becoming a member of the Morosco Company, and that is something to be grateful for, because Miss Eddy is a very capable actress. Nigel De Brullier is a convincing Italian-American banker and Miss Stedman gives a good account of herself as his weak-charactered wife.

The story is of an Italian grocer who has worked conscientiously to build up a business upon which he can look with pride. Just when he has paid up the last remaining note and is about to ask Margarita to marry him, he learns that she has become engaged to Charlie Larkin. Pasquale makes the best of his disappointment and before leaving for Italy and the war, he places everything in Charlie's hands. He returns to find his business run down and, worse in Pasquale's eyes, his beloved horse worked to the point of death. The Italian banker's wife has a harmless affair with the town's social lion which nearly ends sadly for her, but finally she and her husband and Pasquale and Margarita are happy.

Praise for the production belongs to Wm. D. Taylor, whose selection of settings and general direction has given "Pasquale" a visualization whose atmosphere is one of the noteworthy features of the offering. The battle scenes and the auto wreck are quite remarkable. The entire production of the story is remarkable, for that matter. "Pasquale" affords pleasant entertainment.

"The Mysteries of Myra"

"Mystic Mirrors." Third Episode of International Serial. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THAT the producers of "The Mysteries of Myra" are alive to the opportunities for the attainment of startling effects such as are possible only to the motion camera is again a remarkable feature of the third episode of this serial offered by the International Film Service. "The Mystic Mirrors" is the title of the release and it refers to the hypnotizing machine which Dr. Alden uses in connection with his studies of occult phenomena.

One of the chillingly thrilling spots in "The Mysteries of Myra"

"The Mystic Mirrors" gives the best acting opportunities to Howard Estabrook as the doctor who is working to defeat the Black Order and shield Myra. Estabrook utilizes all that his part gives him in this episode and renders a performance that is highly pleasing. Jean Sothern and Allen Murnane do what little they have to do splendidly.

The double exposure scenes, laid in the inner chamber of the Black Order's meeting place, help to give the picture the note of strangeness, even weirdness, quite necessary to the action if it is to have the proper effect upon the spectator. These scenes are double tinted and remarkably effective.

This episode is filled with unusual happenings. When Alden explores the mysterious chamber in the Maynard home he is confronted by the ghost of Myra's father, and warned to protect the girl from the Black Order. While he is examining a document he finds in a secret drawer there, different objects, even the lighted candle on the strangely decorated table dance about. Alden's man-servant succeeds in becoming a member of the Order and that there is a traitor in their fold is discovered by Arthur Varney. Neither Alden nor Myra suspect that Varney, their frequent companion, is a member of the order of devil worshippers.

By using a huge spinning wheel with its myriad mirrors which dazzle the eyes of the person seated in front of it and renders him subject to the hypnotic suggestion of another, Alden liberates Myra's astral body in the hope that it will venture forth and learn something of those who plan her destruction. In spirit Myra visits the chamber of the Black Order and Varney discovers her spiritual presence. An attempt is then made to sever the thread which connects her astral body with that of her material form. This is to be done by the united will of the members of the Order. When his science fails him, Alden resorts to prayer and Myra awakes from her cataleptic trance.

There are occasions when one finds it a bit beyond the limits of imagination to accept events as they happen in this chapter of the story, but the episode is like its predecessors in the series in that it has moments that are tensely interesting. There are moments that thrill one, and if the interest is maintained to the end as it has so far the picture-goers will be grateful to the exhibitor who offered them such entertainment.

"The Test of Chivalry"

Three-Reel Selig Play Released May 22. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

FRITZI BRUNETTE again has a "weepy" role in this play, a part which recalls her work in "At Piney Ridge." She plays the young wife of a mountaineer who is cruel to her. She is protected by a surveyor who has come from the east. Her husband dies, her baby dies, and at last she falls in love with the surveyor, only to give him up to a girl he had formerly loved.

For its story, the play makes use of old material. It progresses rapidly but without any unusual twists. It is, however, clearly told and will hold the interest. The forest settings add beauty to the play.

When Jack Ashton (Edward J. Piel) learns that his love for Pauline Grey (Vivian Reed) is hopeless because he is not wealthy enough to win the approval of her parents, he goes west, leaving Pauline to marry a man whom she does not love but who has the necessary gold. Ashton, in the west, aids Eve Wilson, whose heartless husband drives her out into the rain. Later this husband falls down a mountain side and is killed. About the same time Pauline's husband takes his own life when he has lost his fortune, leaving Pauline free to offer her love, which has never died, to Ashton. This places Ashton in an awkward situation, since he knows that Eve is also in love with him. It seems that chivalry is to receive a severe test, but Eve happens to read the letter from Pauline and she solves the problem by going away, leaving a note in which she pretends to have returned to her husband, for neither had known that he was dead. Ashton gladly returns to his first love.

Other players in the cast are James Bradbury, William Scott, Frank Clark and Lillian Hayward. William Robert Daly directed the play, which Elizabeth R. Carpenter wrote.

"The Ordeal of Elizabeth"

Blue Ribbon Feature Released by V. L. S. E. on May 15. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

PUTTING no particular emphasis on characterization and making but little effort to procure dramatic effect the writer of "The Ordeal of Elizabeth" delivered into the hands of Director Wilfrid North a scenario which goes smoothly along the line of a novel. This Vitagraph Blue Ribbon feature released May 15 by V. L. S. E. is more the picturized novel than the screen play. There is nothing dramatic about it, but this is not because the plot itself is inadequately told. It is developed after the fashion of the novel and it is interesting.

"The Ordeal of Elizabeth" is interesting for two reasons. The first is found in the person of Lillian Walker as Elizabeth and the second in the production given the piece by Mr. North, all the attractiveness of which is brought to the spectator via the best of photography. The settings for the action are in no sense only ordinarily good. They are both singularly appropriate and wholly pleasant.

Miss Walker, need we say it, brings much beauty to the role of Elizabeth. Also she brings much charm and a great deal that is human to the part. The featured player gives a performance that stands far above those in her supporting cast; furthermore she rises above the story whose central character she enacts.

The six reels of this picture tell the story of a country maid who marries a visitor from the city and immediately after the ceremony she goes back to her home and he leaves for Europe to finish his study of music. This act is youthful, for neither holds any deep affection for the other. Elizabeth then comes to the city, where she is a great social success and much sought by a wealthy and famous young man named Julian Gerard.

A year later the musician returns and with threats of making the secret marriage known, forces Elizabeth to give him money and help him by persuading her rich friends to have him perform at their social affairs. Hallock is a wretch. He deceives a young girl and she sends him some poison. Circumstantial evidence points to Elizabeth and there is a long session in the court room in which the spectator is confronted with such legal bickerings as "objection sustained," or "objection overruled" and "Where were you on the afternoon of December 23?" All this leads to a verdict of not guilty, which comes in the nature of a surprise for it seemed as though the district attorney had built up a good case against her. The girl makes a death bed confession and Elizabeth and Gerard look to a blissful future as man and wife.

One detail which pleases is that no policeman walks into the home of a society woman and places a heavy hand on the murder suspect. Elizabeth and her immediate relations come to the office of the district attorney and the formal arrest is made there. Evart Overton is Gerard, Denton Vane is Hallock and L. Rogers Lytton is the district attorney. Mrs. M. Storey and Ollie Walker are other members of the large supporting cast.

"Ray Comedies"

Four One-Reel Reserve Photoplays Company Offerings. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE first four Ray Comedies produced were shown to exchangemen, exhibitors and the trade press last Monday morning at the Broadway theater. These single reel comedies with Johnny and Emma Ray, known well and fondly wherever vaudeville entertainment is known, as the principal fun-makers, are offered by the Reserve Photoplays Company of which C. Lang Cobb, Jr., is the manager of sales and publicity.

The releases shown are entitled "Casey's Dream," "Casey's Kids," "Casey's Servants," and "Casey the White Wing," which titles render it unnecessary to state that the main character is Irish. Johnny Ray is Casey and in the four pictures mentioned above one can see reasons why he will go onward and upward in the film world. His characterization of a droll Irishman has won him fame on the vaudeville stage and the same humor and pleasantness are to be found in certain phases of his Casey of the screen.

"Casey's Dream" is the picturization of the interesting events crowded into one day of this humble hod-carrier's life. He is sent off to work early in the morning with instructions not to steal the mucilage off his pay envelope, forthcoming that day. His work is exciting but not so much as the dream he has while sitting at a table in a near-by saloon. In this dream he is a rich man, with butlers, dress clothes and several other things which prove quite entertaining in Ray's hands.

"Casey's Kids" tells a story with more continuity than the other three. Casey has seven, or eight, perhaps there are nine children, but at any rate he is a good hearted father and when he is attacked by the Italian who lives up the street the children, all of them, take their places in line and are led to the fight which follows the brick-throwing attack.

"Casey's Servants" is one of the most amusing of the four. Two butlers who look exactly alike and each under special orders to Casey and his wife, while neither of the latter know that more than one man-servant is in the house, are the elements which bring on some diverting situations in this picture. "Casey the White Wing" is another dream story. Casey this time has a wonderful dream. This picture has some good comedy moments.

Though entirely new to the picture comedy the Rays register many mirth provoking moments. The pictures are very well produced and photographed and they will please. One easily accomplished improvement would be a better arrangement of subtitles. To begin with there are too many and while several of the lines would be funny if spoken from the stage they fail as titles for a picture. The only effect of a pruning out of titles would be for the better, most of them have nothing to do with the action which, be it said in favor of the comedies, is entirely clear without titles in the majority of cases.

"The Market of Vain Desire"

Triangle-Ince Offering. A Drama of Social Comparisons. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

DIRECTING some very pointed thrusts at the rich American women whose social ambitions lead them to stifle true mother love and strive to contract a marriage between their daughters and foreign nobility, "The Market of Vain Desire" is a theatrical but strongly interesting picture. This story by C. Gardner Sullivan (there goes that name again) is ably enacted and finely produced, but where the latter comes to the spectator unhampered and in all its effectiveness the efforts of the players have to contend with situations that are not free enough from stagey qualities to be impressive.

The minister who rebels against the curb his wealthy parishioners have put upon his utterances from the pulpit and brings a girl of the streets on the platform to enforce his contention that the mother who barters her daughter's beauty and wealth for a title is no better than the woman who stands before them, is played by H. B. Warner. The above development seems a bit far-fetched.

Speaking of the street woman brings to mind a scene in which the director showed bad taste. This is the scene where the minister meets Belle. For a character who is introduced by a title as a street woman to open her coat at the throat and display undraped shoulders to the solicited gaze of a man apparently going about his own business, is highly unnecessary; just as unnecessary as it is for us to add that the scene is offensive.

Clara Williams plays opposite Mr. Warner. She is cast as Helen Badgley, the girl who bows to her mother's determination that she marry the Count. She is fair to look upon and she plays the part with unaffected charm. Charles Miller is a Count Bernard d'Montaigne much after the fashion of those we encounter in light operas, and Gertrude Claire as the socially ambitious mother is good.

When the minister of the fashionable church learns that the only member of the congregation he has faith in and admiration for, is to marry a man she does not love merely because of social advantages, he decides to end his distasteful insincerity and speak what he believes. The sermon he delivers brings down the wrath of the congregation upon him but it serves to break the engagement. The assault upon the minister eliminates the count with his threats of legal suit with the embarrassing publicity and the circumstances standing between Helen and Armstrong.

H. B. Warner and Clara Williams in "The Market of Vain Desire"

The treatment of the story by the director is very artistic.

In the arrangement of sets and lighting he has procured many pictures that have beauty and charm. The effect of the whole production is one of marked beauty. Mr. Warner's acting deserves praise. He is sufficiently active in the quiet moments and subdued in the dramatic ones to be both pleasing and real.

"The Feud Girl"

Hazel Dawn in Famous Players Paramount Romance Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THOUGH she does not wear a fashionable gown in a single scene, Hazel Dawn is a fascinating Nell in the mountain romance told of in the latest Famous Players offering. In "The Feud Girl" Miss Dawn is, as usual, pretty and pleasing and as usual she is satisfied to be these things and nothing more, not even an impressive screen actress.

The mountain girl and the young engineer

"The Feud Girl" tells a story of love and the differences of lawless mountain folk who are keenly on the look-out for each other with guns that are long of barrel and menacing of appearance, and while it will not leave an imprint upon the memory of the spectator, it is not unpleasant. It is an acceptable sort of offering.

The scenery is nice and the photography is of a fair brand and Hazel Dawn is pretty These are the things that make "The Feud Girl" all that it is in the way of being a good picture. Nell Haddon is the central character in the story. The Haddens and the Bassetts are mountaineers and they believe in settling their differences with guns. The trouble existing between these two factions is the result of the disappearance of Dave Bassett, the latter group believing that Judd Haddon knows something about the mystery.

Between them they own some valuable iron mine property and the surveyor who comes to investigate for his company is displeased when he learns that an attempt will be made to bring about peace by marrying Nell to one of the Bassetts. He is in love with Nell and he comes forth when she asks one of her own faction to marry her and save her from a marriage to one of the hated Bassetts.

It transpires that Rand is the missing Dave Bassett and Nell upon learning this spurns the handsome surveyor husband. But her love for him is great and the last scene finds them united and peace declared by the Haddons and the Bassetts.

Irving Cummings is Dave and he plays the role well. Hardee Kirkland as Judd Haddon gives a performance that stands out from the rest of the cast, which includes Arthur Morrison, George Majeroni and Edna Holland.

"Prisoners of Conscience"

Three-Reel Lubin Drama Released May 25. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A CAST which includes Alan Forrest, Cecil Van Auker, George Routh and Adda Gleason interprets this play, but even they are unable to make convincing the story or the characters in this release. A number of the Lubin three-reel dramas of recent date have contained plots which, though improbable, have been so interestingly woven that they have been easy to follow and have contained "human interest" which held. Unfortunately, this one is an exception. It is well photographed, and the settings are interesting. The actors strive sincerely to make the characters real but have been defeated by the improbable things the story asks them to do.

Two young physicians, Dean Carroll and Earl Bond, played respectively by Cecil Van Auker and George Routh, begin their careers with different ideals. Bond, who is unscrupulous in his dealings, makes the most of a fortunate accident which throws a wealthy man into his care. Later he marries the millionaire's daughter. Carroll's inclinations lead him into charity work in the slums and there he meets a social worker, Maude (Adda Gleason), whom he later marries.

Some time later, Bond's father-in-law becomes dangerously ill, and Bond, who has little ability as a physician, is forced to call his former partner, Carroll. Bond by mistake gives the patient the wrong medicine, but throws the blame on Carroll, who, although innocent, runs away, leaving a message for his wife, Maude. Bond leads Maude to think that Carroll has committed suicide and also, by means of a threat, keeps Carroll away. Believing her husband is dead, Maude goes back to her former work of charity and in this connection meets and grows to love a young minister, played by Alan Forrest.

Meantime Bond has quarreled with his wife and left home. Later he becomes ill and before his death confesses the plot against Carroll and tells the minister where Carroll may be found. The minister is in love with Maude, but he goes in search of her husband and brings him back. Although she had been about to marry again, Maude's early love for Carroll returns.

The balance of the cast of players includes Lucy Payton, Evelyn Page and Ben Hopkins. Melvin Mayo directed the release under the supervision of Captain Wilbert Melville from a story by L. V. Jefferson and Josephine McLaughlin.

"The Reclamation"

American Mutual Masterpicture Released May 25. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE rights to the water supplies in the arid regions of the West mean life itself to the people who live by the land in this section. While irrigation systems are being worked out with more or less efficiency, there is still cause for struggles between rival land owners. Kenneth B. Clarke has chosen a theme which has dramatic possibilities for the story of this play. As Edward Sloman has produced the picture, the emphasis, particularly in the first part, is directed toward this general situation and attention is called to the hardship to land owners because of the slow workings of legal machinery. A number of beautiful scenes in the irrigated districts add to the interest of the first part.

While the theme itself will be interesting to those who know something of this western problem, the story which the play contains will be the chief concern of the majority of picture audiences. Winnifred Greenwood and Franklyn Ritchie head the cast of players, and the story is interesting and in some respects unusual. It is rather a long time in getting started, however, and in some places it is not so very clear. It increases in interest as it progresses and the closing scenes contain a number of thrills.

These ranchers are led by Louise's father, and she keeps them informed regarding Powell's efforts against them. She begins to admire Powell, personally, and at times tries to show him the point of view of the ranchers. Unconsciously he is influenced by her arguments.

The lawsuit goes against Powell and Phelan and the ranchers are triumphant. Phelan then tries to rob them by diverting the course of a stream. Powell refuses to be a party to the deed and gives his aid to the ranchers. There is a battle between the men of the opposing factions. Powell and Louise arrive in the midst of it. Powell destroys the fuse of a dynamite bomb which Phelan's men had set. The sheriff arrives in time to check hostilities and the ranchers enjoy their victory. Powell and Louise discover that their mutual admiration has deepened into love.

"A Child of the Paris Streets"

Triangle-Fine Arts Offering Is Delightful Entertainment. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

ENTIRELY French is "A Child of the Paris Streets," a Triangle-Fine Arts offering with Mae Marsh in the leading role. Not only are the settings startingly true, the atmosphere properly French, and the acting convincing but the story laid in Paris is French in its construction. Considered from all angles, this is an unusually good photoplay offering. Containing a story that sustains interest from the beginning, delightful humorous moments, fine character portrayals and all that is best in the visualization of a story, "A Child of the Paris Streets" carries an appeal that has as much breadth as it has strength.

Tense melodrama held well within the bounds of conviction is here combined with humorous moments and entertaining action. Though finely constructed the story is not of particular import, but as produced and enacted by a cast headed by Mae Marsh, who is here seen in the full bloom of her most charming self, the picturized tale is fascinating. It has the interest compelling and light, but pleasant entertainment properties of the popular French novels. Audiences will enjoy "A Child of the Paris Streets."

The story, much like many other screen stories, tells of a woman who vows revenge on the judge who sends her son to prison. Like herself, both of Mme. Dufrane's sons are vicious, but she sees no reason why her boy should be locked up even if he is a criminal. She abducts the Judge's little daughter and rears her to be a pickpocket. Julie meets a young American who lives in the Latin Quarter and plays at studying painting. For him she deserts the Apache band. Just when things are darkest for little Julie her own father is restored through the offices of the old nurse and a melodramatic rescue follows.

Mae Marsh, looking much like a girl on a "Vogue" cover only she sparkles with animation and charm, makes Julie one of the most delightful and engaging characters who ever moved about on the screen. Miss Marsh scores a personal triumph in this picture and long will her Julie live in the memory. Robert Harron is good as the artist and Tully Marshall's performance is one of the picture's outstanding features. Loyola O'Connor, Jennie Lee, Carl Stockdale and Bert Hadley complete a fine cast.

Lloyd Ingraham, who directed the picture, must not be forgotten when praise for "A Child of the Paris Streets" is being dealt out. The exterior scenes and the interior scenes and the carnival scenes are all quite wonderful. Mae Marsh, Lloyd Ingraham and a few of the players in the supporting cast have made "A Child of the Paris Streets" a picture that is a joy to see.

"The Iron Claw"

Twelfth Episode of Pathe Serial Entitled "The Haunted Canvas." Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

TO SAY that "The Iron Claw" is the most finished serial production Pathe has offered is speaking high praise for this vastly popular continued photoplay written by Arthur Stringer and so ably scenarioized by George Brackett Seitz. Yet the fact remains that "The Iron Claw" has been thus qualified. No episode since the first manifests so pronouncedly the inspiration for this remark than "The Haunted Canvas," which is the latest release.

While the scenario writer and the cast are undoubtedly responsible for much of the splendid melodramatic entertainment contained in this episode, the director, Edouard Jose, deserves much commendation for the part he played in producing it. Cases where a cast can make a poor story good are rare but not so with the director. Given such scenarios as constitute "The Iron Claw" Mr. Jose is doing remarkable things in photoplay production.

"The Haunted Canvas" tells of the rescue of Janet O'Mara, who has aroused the anger of the Iron Claw. She is posing for an artist when Legar and some of his followers enter the studio, overpower the artist and are making Janet a helpless captive when the Laughing Mask, now known as the foe of evildoers, secretly comes into the room and from a position behind a canvas on which there is a man pointing a pistol, shoots poisoned darts at her captors. To the awe of the villains, the darts apparently are proceeding from the gun pointed by the man on the canvas.

Margery Golden accompanies the police to the studio, but they arrive to find both the Iron Claw and Laughing Mask gone. Margery follows Legar in her motor and in the chase her chauffeur is killed. However, she learns something of Legar's plans and hurries to Janet to give warning that a bomb explosion will occur in her home. Margery arrives late. There is danger for both girls but the opportune appearance of the Laughing Mask is directly responsible for the failure of Legar's villainous scheme.

Pearl White seems to grow more beautiful as the "Iron Claw" advances, and more charming. The Legar of Sheldon Lewis in "The Haunted Canvas" is as crafty and as impressive as ever and whoever the Laughing Mask is, he finds little difficulty in taking a firm hold upon the spectator's attention every time he enters the picture.

"Gloria's Romance"

"Caught by the Seminoles," Part Two of the George Kleine Film Novel. Reviewed by G. Harris

THE second installment of this serial featuring Billie Burke deals with Gloria's adventures while lost in the Everglades. At the close of the first chapter we left Gloria Stafford (Miss Burke) asleep in the forest after her escapade in which she had gone joy-riding in her brother's car and wrecked it in the surf. In trying to find her way back to the hotel where she lives with her father, brother and governess, she wanders into the Everglades and becomes lost.

In the morning, when Gloria awakes, she continues her wanderings and at last arrives at the dwelling of a poor white family. In the meantime Gloria's absence has been discovered and her father and brother are joined by their friends in the search for the runaway. A large reward has been offered for her recovery. Among the searchers are Dr. Royce (Henry Kolker), who is very fond of Gloria, and Richard Freneau (David Powell), a young broker who is led by the hope of reward.

Gloria, at the hut to which she has wandered, exchanges her dress, now badly torn, for the more practical outfit of a boy. The young son of the family goes with Gloria part of the way as a guide, but they have a quarrel and the boy intentionally misdirects her. As a result she wanders into a camp of Seminole Indians.

By this time the wrecked automobile has been discovered and Gloria has been followed into the jungle by Dr. Royce and by Freneau. Freneau arrives at the Indian camp in time to be threatened by the young chieftain, who has decided to marry Gloria. Freneau, a coward, runs away. Gloria, overcome by fear, has fainted. Almost at the same time Dr. Royce arrives on the scene from another direction. He struggles with the Indian and overcomes him, but during the battle Freneau has returned, revived the fainting girl and taken her away. Dr. Royce follows their trail and arrives in time to hear Freneau praised for his noble rescue of the girl. Freneau calmly accepts all credit, since Gloria herself does not know to whom it is justly due.

The photography and the settings of this installment are unusually pleasing. The events of the story are interesting and the snspense is managed well. But the main attraction, and it is a powerful one, is due to the magnetism of the leeading lady. The close-ups are effectively used and a number of them are of exceptional beauty.

"Tangled Fates"

A Five Part World Film Production. Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman

THERE are two extremes of life set forth in this production that show the wide contrasts and differences under which people live. It is the story of a girl who was raised in a narrow-minded home in a village where gossips were far more frequent than horned toads on an Arizona rock pile. In the strange course of fate she eventually finds her future settled in a rough gold mining camp in far-off Alaska, where the men were all radically different in their ways and ideas from her overly religious father who raised her strictly according to the Book.

Alice Brady once more appears to striking advantage in the part of this girl who was cruelly dealt with by everyone whose word she accepted as true, and finally came to marry the fellow whom she first thought was a bad man. In her early life she had lived properly, but she was as cruelly treated by those who pretended to pattern their lives after the life of the Saviour. The slightest breath of suspicion served to turn the narrow-minded villagers against her, even to her stern father, who turned her out of doors for going out rowing with a traveling salesman.

Later she tried to do what was right again by accepting matrimony as one of the proper things for a woman who has no one to give her orders. The state of matrimony she found to be as unhappy as being a demure country girl in a straight-laced family. So she suffered again. Her real misfortune was in the men with whom she was associated. Her father was a pious tyrant, and her husband was an irresponsible spendthrift. And between them her existence was anything but desirable, all the way to the end of the picture, when she finally began to do her own thinking and married the man she should have married in the first place.

It is an interesting story showing how a girl's life is generally so dominated and influenced by others that by the time she is able to shake off their influence there isn't much time left to enjoy life before the gray hairs begin to put in appearance. It gives Miss Brady a wide range for the use of her acting abilities and provides a splendid vehicle for the wearing of handsome gowns, and of showing off Miss Brady's beautiful person. Arthur Ashley, for a change, appears as a leading man instead of a heavy, and it is needless to say that he does his work with his usual skill. Mr. Ashley not only knows how to act with his head, he knows how to act with his hands, and feet, and body, so that whether he is playing a lead or a heavy, one is almost certain of seeing good acting as long as he is on the screen.

Remarkably refreshing are the Alaskan scenes which are rugged and true to life. They abound in delightful snow scenes, Eskimo dogs, and the general atmosphere of the crisp winter outdoors in that mysterious land. There are many human touches in the story, ranging from the doings of the village gossip in an American town, to the actions of a concert hall woman in an Alaskan "honky-tonk."

It is the kind of a feature that American audiences understand. One that contains a lesson, not only to young women who consent hastily to marriage, but to over-zealous fathers who drive their daughters into doing things that they might not do if there was less parental meddling.

"The Tight Rein"

Second Release in Pathe's "Who's Guilty?" Series. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

ONE admirable feature of the new Pathe "Who's Guilty?" series is that there are no concessions made to sentimentality in ending the plays. The desire to end photoplays happily has spelled failure, as far as the dramatic effect is concerned, to entirely too many good screen dramas. Of course if the "Who's Guilty?" plays went out of their way to bring about a tragedy they would be little more commendable than those whose natural course is warped to bring the hero and heroine into a fond embrace in the closing scene. But the fact is they do not. At lease the first two plays in the series do not.

"The Tight Rein" is the second of the "Who's Guilty?" series of fourteen two reel screen dramas. In it is found the same fine artistry in production, effective acting and the usual amount of material for two reels, which characterized the first of the series. "The Tight Rein" handles its theme effectively and it is a powerful offering in which the care in Arrow Film Corporation's selecting its stories, thoroughness in preparing the scenario and intelligence in visualizing them are pleasing to those picturegoers who seek pictures presenting stories of some consequence and appeal to one's intellect.

The play centers about a young man who works in his father's silk mill. The youth is an efficient worker but he receives no stated salary, his father dealing him out a few dollars as necessity for such philanthropic actions arise. The father insists that his son shall marry the daughter of his competior. Jack prefers the friendship of a girl who works in the mill. His father determines to put an end to this by having the girl discharged.

Amy then is forced to leave the town for the city to find employment. Her experiences are the same as those encountered by most of the girls who, not equipped for any particular employment, come to the metropolis. Finally Jack decides to leave his father's employ. He appropriates some of the private safe's holdings, an amount less than he would have received had he been paid the minimum salary for the time he worked in the mill, and leaves for the city. This is the beginning of a course which leads both Amy and Jack to an end which society might call natural to people of "such character."

Anna Nilsson brings much appeal to the girl whose downfall can hardly be charged up to any wrong she has done, and Tom Moore's playing as the son is very good. Arthur Donaldson makes much of his part as the father. "The Tight Rein" is a quick moving and appealing drama.

Charlie, a-burgling, is surprised by the daughter of the house.

as soon as he is released from prison, and who finds this a hard, cold world in general, Chaplin is at his best. Exhibitors do not need to be told how strong the Chaplin following is, and this is a comedy which will appeal to many who do not as a rule care for Chaplin. The "rough stuff" and slap stick is not emphasized, and instead there are a number of clever, satirical twists to the situations.

Charlie, released from prison, meets a missionary, who exhorts him to "go straight." After he is made to understand that "straight up" is not meant, Charlie is quite affected and weeps for his wrongdoing, which gives the man a chance to steal Charlie's last five dollars. Thereafter, when Charlie is urged to "go straight," he becomes suspicious.

Having no money, he gets in various kinds of trouble. He tries in vain to pose as a consumptive in order to get a night's lodging. Finally he meets his old cellmate and goes with him to rob a house. As a burglar he is hardly a success, and makes so much noise that the daughter of the house is aroused and begs them to be quiet. Charlie is moved by the girl's plea not to disturb her sick mother, and has a disagreement with his partner over the matter. At last the police arrive to break up the party, but the girl saves Charlie from arrest. He gives her back the rings he has stolen and proceeds on his way to other adventures.

The supporting cast in the play is very good. This includes Edna Purviance, Wesley Ruggles, Billy Armstrong, John Rand and Leo White.

"Sins of Men"

William Fox Play Released May 15. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS drama is enjoyable particularly because of its unusually well presented pictures of very common things. Its title is to some extent misleading, for instead of a harrowing tragedy, the play is more of a comedy. Its most interesting feature lies in the many faithfully portrayed scenes of family life in the household of a German author, who is very well acted by Tom Burrough. The story begins during the Christmas reunion of the family and a large part of the picture is given to a depiction of the amusing incidents which take place on this occasion. These give a realistic impression and are overdrawn only enough to make them effective. All the members of the family and relatives are clearly drawn and there are a number of amusing bits of character acting.

The author, Schumann, disheartened because his books are not successful, determines to write one which will rival a famous erotic novel written by an English woman. The publishers are delighted with the first draft of the work, but his wife is horrified at the sentiments contained therein and urges him to burn the manuscript. At the family reunion, the proud author shows his work to his relatives and there are a number of amusing scenes as the various types of people read the manuscript. Extracts from the book are shown on the screen from time to time, but they seem scarcely more dangerous than lines from Emerson's essays.

At the end of the holiday, after the guests have departed, the wife again remonstrates with her husband about publishing the book. The book is published, however, and then the terrible effects of its teachings are shown on everyone who comes in contact with it. The author's son and daughter become rebellious and finally take the road to destruction. The publisher's happy family is broken up. Of course the author becomes very wealthy, but loses all happiness. At last it seems that he is to lose his life because of it. Then he wakes up to find that it was only a dream, and he at once burns the manuscript, much to the delight of his wife.

This ending is not wholly unexpected, because the tragic events were handled in a swift manner as they might really occur in a dream. They also had a little touch of exaggeration which under the circumstances was justified. The elements contained in the play, with this ending, make a very acceptable offering. I had the advantage of watching the effect of the play on the audience, which thoroughly enjoyed the entertainment, particularly the humorous episodes.

The direction of the play, for which James Vincent is credited, is excellent. The photography is very good. The sets add much to the play, being typical of a household of this sort. A good touch is given by the over-elaboration of the furnishings of the home after the family become wealthy.

Dorothy Bernard and Stuart Holmes are the featured players, but the honors of the play go to Tom Burrough and Alice Gale as the author and his wife. Others in the cast are Stanhope Wheatcroft, Hattie Burks, Louis Hendricks, Florence Ashbrook, H. Marriam, Lillian De Vere, Stephen Gratten, Pauline Barry and Kittens Reichert.

"Nancy's Birthright"

Signal Mutual Masterpicture Released May 22. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS play seems to have been produced with one type of audience in mind, and the most remarkable thing about it is the consistency in keeping its general tone of appeal to this class. It should not be offered to an audience too sophisticated or too skeptical. But there are people who find problem plays unpleasant, "thrills" tiresome, who will be interested in the story of this girl, Nancy, deserted by her brutal father, adopted by kind neighbors in the tenements, where she was born, and brought up to virtuous young womanhood, to discover at last that she is an heiress, the granddaughter of a millionaire. And she marries the youth who was responsible for her rescue when a child.

There are a number of villains in the play who conspire against both Nancy and her lover. In the end, though, they are either defeated or converted from their evil ways, for Nancy is as remarkably good as the malefactors are bad.

The story is told in a clear, straightforward fashion, very easy to follow considering the complications. Murdock MacQuarrie directed the drama and plays the role of Nancy's grandfather. Edythe Sterling is featured as Nancy and fills the role pleasingly, while Norbert A. Myles is well cast as Leslie Warner, Nancy's sweetheart.

The wife of Jake Levine dies soon after her baby is born. The child is cared for by Mrs. Warner and her young son Leslie. Before death, Mrs. Levine had sent a note to her father, a wealthy manufacturer, begging forgiveness for her runaway marriage and telling of Nancy's birth. The manufacturer is not able to trace the child, and years later, after Nancy is grown up, he decides to adopt an orphan. A band of crooks, hearing of the scheme, try to find a girl sufficiently attractive but sufficiently docile to be adopted by the millionaire and still to work for their interests. They select Nancy and kidnap her. She escapes, through the aid of a hunchback, and goes to the rich man's home to tell of the scheme. There he recognizes her as his own granddaughter through her resemblance to her mother. "The Isle of Love"

Five Part Gaumont Mutual Masterpicture. Released May 15. Reviewed by George W. Graves

IN "The Isle of Love," written by Paul M. Bryan, Gertrude McCoy makes her initial Gaumont appearance in the role of a whimsical, tantalizing coquette which she plays with a great deal of snap and charm. The picture was directed by Edwin Middleton and in respect of production it ranks with the best of the Gaumonts, desirable atmosphere being obtained and realistic wreck scenes being handled with an amount of skill. The story is not new by any means but it embraces some new developments. The "desert island" idea is used into the plot, but it is handled in an attractive manner. All in all, the story is strong enough to fulfil its mission—that of making good entertainment for the audience and providing it also with some humorous diversion. Able supporters of Gertrude McCoy are Earl O. Schenck, Robert Clugston and Iva Shepard.

Gertrude McCoy in her Gaumont-Mutual debut.

Helen Arthur, an actress who has come to a fishing village incognito to study up a fisher-girl role for the next season, completely ensnares Rex Bristol, a young fisherman and inventor who is already in love with Nettie Lea. The latter insults the actress and Helen, to avenge herself, makes a complete conquest of Rex. Before leaving for New York and the stage she repulses the impassioned young man and imparts to him the news that she was only playing with him.

Later Rex becomes master of a yacht owned by John Leonard, a worthless spendthrift. The latter plans to take Helen Arthur and a party for a sail, but plans miscarry and Helen is the only one to board the vessel. Rex saves the flirt from Leonard's brutal attack but is not convinced of the girl's innocence in the matter.

Next we see Helen Arthur leaving on an ocean voyage to recuperate. Rex is a wireless operator on this same ship. Then come the wreck, the rescue and the desert island. After being on the island some time Rex can control himself no longer, and, making use of his authority as a former sea captain to perform a marriage ceremony, he marries himself to the girl. Naturally Helen rebels against this forced marriage. A few years later Helen and her child are rescued by a passing ship. She tells the captain that she and her child are the only survivors and the ship sails away, leaving Rex in solitude. After trying to enjoy her old life Helen realizes where her heart is and the story closes with her return to "The Lsle of Love."

"The Suspect"

V. L. S. E. Blue Ribbon Feature Stars Anita Stewart. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A VIVID picturization of the romance dealing with Russian political intrigue by H. J. W. Dam brings Anita Stewart back to the V. L. S. E. Program in a part which makes great demands upon her ability as an emotional actress. Miss Stewart's portrayal lacks no power and is finely artistic. Throughout the play she exercised a repression which adds immeasurably to the effect of her acting.

"The Suspect," a Blue Ribbon Feature in six parts, is an adaptation of "The Silver Shell" and in many particulars the picture proves that the novel contained good screen material. The story is clearly told. This is of vital importance in a story carrying such a weighty plot.

S. Rankin Drew produced "The Suspect" and he deserves the highest of praise for the amount of color and atmosphere this picture contains. In securing the atmosphere, however, Mr. Drew added nothing to the story itself. An exceptionally entertaining and beautiful picture it is, but there are scenes which, enhancing as they are to the realism and artistic beauty of the picture, have no distinct bearing on the story. The action does not move quickly enough to suit the best interests of the play. Long scenes in which the characters concentrate on one point to give it power are too numerous.

Overbalancing any shortcomings "The Suspect" may have is a production of singular excellence. It is an overwhelmingly realistic picture of love and political conflict. Most of the action is laid in Russia but the scenes in Paris and London are equally effective.

The story is of a young woman who takes a prominent and active part in a revolutionary movement. The cruelty and despotism of the Russian aristocracy made her mother one of its victims and she is determined upon revenge. The son of one of the most despotic of Russia's royalty wins her love and she marries him secretly. One of her adherents is in love with her and he makes an attempt upon the Prince's life. His memory gone, the Prince is taken into the home of a revolutionist who teaches him to hate the Government.

The father of the Prince himself enters the organization of which Katherine is the leader and the net he spreads is rapidly being drawn about her when the Prince again meets his wife and little son. The Prince is shot and when Karatoff learns that Katherine's son is his legitimate grandson he gives her leave to part from Russia and takes the boy to his home. Katharine then weds the Englishman she consented to marry when she was free.

The honors which belong to the cast are captured by Miss Stewart. She is ably supported by Mr. Drew as the Prince. Anders Randolph, George Cooper and the other players who have important parts are entirely satisfactory. There is little doubt that this picture will prove a certain success. It shows Vitagraph production, photography and acting at its best.

"My Country First"

Six Part Drama Produced by the Terriss Film Corporation. Reviewed by George W. Graves

A WELL written, well produced and well acted detective drama is a thing which motion picture audiences seem to greet with the greatest enthusiasm, just as much as it is a thing which they do not all the time have a chance to witness. A detective drama of this nature is "My Country First," produced by the Terriss Film Corporation under the direction of Tom Terriss and distributed by the Unity Sales Corporation. This engrossing story is clearly interpreted by a large and effective cast headed by Tom Terriss and including John Hopkins, Alfred Heming, Harold Vosburgh, Joseph Sterling, Joseph Baker, Jill Woodward and Helene Ziegfield.

Most of the settings are carefully arranged and good photography is prevalent, the double role played by Tom Terriss as both Draper and Morton, necessitating some clever double exposures. Some of the present spirit of preparedness is injected into the denouement of the plot when Draper, at the mercy of his enemies, choses death rather than that a foreign power should obtain the wonderful instrument of preparedness which he intends to present to the United States. All in all, "My Country First" is a six-reeler which affords much in the nature of keen interest and excitability. It is the kind of picture that is destined to meet with the approval of the average movie fan.

Alfred Henning, Tom Terris, Joseph Baker, John Hopkins and C. Stacey Fleming in "My Country First"

Frank Draper, an ingenious young American inventor, about to perfect a marvelous explosive which he intends to place at the disposal of his country, is hounded by agents of a foreign power. In an effort to save a girl from the brutal attacks of a sensualist Draper becomes involved in and accused of a murder of which he is entirely innocent. The old chemist engaged by the foreign agents fails in his attempt to analyze a stolen specimen of Draper's invention and is killed afterward in an accident.

Now the plotters realize that they can do nothing until Draper ends his long term of imprisonment. In a sensational and realistic way they help Draper to escape by causing an explosion in the prison stone works, and in the excitement virtually kidnaping the inventor and spiriting him away by automobile and aeroplane. Draper is disguised as old Morton, the deceased chemist, and thus kept safe from detection. He is, however, in secret communication with the girl whom he saved and she in turn helps to put the detectives on the right track.

The foreigners soon get tired of Draper's obstinacy and give him the choice of sharing his invention with them or suffering immediate death. But "My Country First" is Draper's absolute rule and he is about to be put to death when the rescuing band arrives. Then America becomes the recipient of the explosive and Draper receives his nation's gratitude and the love of the girl he saved.

Fine Arts Film in the Making

Fay Tincher's initial two-reel Fine Arts comedy is full of humorous complications. Miss Tincher plays the part of a salesgirl, Edward Dillon, in addition to staging the picture, enacts the role of her true admirer, Frank Bennett characterizes a floorwalker, Max Davidson plays a man about town, and Jack Cosgrove plays the husband.

In "Nan," the schoolma'am Dorothy Gish plays the title role. She is supported by the Fine Arts children. Chief among the juvenile players are George Stone, Carmen De Rue, Violet Radcliffe, Francis Carpenter, Ninon Fovieri and Fern Collier. C. M. and S. A. Franklin are co-producers. Supporting Miss Gish appear Elmer Clifton, Josephine Crowell, Jack Brammall, Hal Wilson and G. M. Blue.

Douglas Fairbanks will play the stellar role in the picturization of Bret Harte's California novel, "In the Carquinez Woods." In this play Mr. Fairbanks will enact a new role, that of a halfbreed Indian, who is a botanist and a man of fine instincts. In the supporting cast will appear Sam de Grasse, Jewel Carmen, George Beranger, Alma Reuben, Tom Wilson, Art Rosson and Frank Brownlee. Allan Dwan, who is directing this play, made a location tour to select the proper backgrounds for the picture. In the lumber districts of Santa Cruz, Sequois National Park and Yosemite Valley he discovered forests of big trees that answer almost the exact description of the setting described by Bret Harte.

De Wolf Hopper's next appearance on the Fine Arts-Triangle program will be in an original comedy drama written by Anita Loos. In this play Mr. Hopper will portray the role of an old actor, whose humane qualities gain him great admiration from his associates. The star is well fitted from his wide stage experience to interpret this character. Bessie Love will play the most prominent feminine part in this play. The balance of the cast will include Frank Bennett, Loyola O'Connor, George Pearce and Carl Stockdale. Lloyd Ingraham is directing the production.

A prologue artistically staged in picturesque outdoor settings, followed by a tense dramatic story including all the members of the prologue, will be a feature of the next film in which Lillian Gish will star. W. E. Lawrence will play opposite Miss Gish and Spottiswoods Aitken will also appear in her support. The production will be under the direction of William Christy Cabanne.

"The Dope Fiend" is the title of the film in which Norma Talmadge will next appear. In this production she characterizes a drug victim with very satisfactory results. Playing opposite her is Tully Marshall, who is also a drug fiend. Chester Withey is co-author and director of "The Dope Fiend."

Film Advertising Possibilities

A hint to manufacturers is given by one of the leading New York hotels that caters especially to foreign visitors, which has sent two representatives on a tour through South America with a film of pictures showing views of life in New York calculated to arouse the "Wanderlust" spirit in the minds of their audience. These films are given to the owner of the theater free of charge.

Manufacturers seeking foreign trade would do well to follow this example. The possibilities of this kind of advertising have not been realized.

In the case of wearing apparel, for instance, a film showing every step in its evolution from the raw material to the finished product, and bringing out at the same time the high degree of specialization and sanitary working conditions in some of the largest plants in the United States, would make a lasting impression on the minds of an audience, and if this impression were tied up with the manufacturer's trade-mark, which could be shown at the ttop or bottom or in the corner of every picture, it would be a species of advertising that would appeal as no printed matter can.

ABOUT BUDDING PLAYS, AND NEWS OF THE TRADE

Metro Annexes Directors

THE Metro Pictures Corporation has enlarged their staff of directors by the addition of Henry Otto, John H. Collins and Eugene Nowland.

Henry Otto in directing the plays in which Harold Lockwood and May Allison are starred will be with old friends, as he has been associated with Mr. Lockwood for several years in other companies, both as a co-actor and as director. Before his screen debut Mr. Otto played with Richard Mansfield and was stage manager for his company. He was also with the original Henry W. Savage company and appeared for a while in vaudeville.

John H. Collins was formerly with the Edison company, and is one of the youngest directors, being but twenty-three years old. Mr. Collins not only directs the features, but also writes the stories from which they are made. He is the author of "The Flower of No Man's Land" and is writing another feature for Miss Dana. He has written more than one hundred scenarios during the five years he has been in the business and was one of the first directors in the country to make talking pictures. Mr. Collins will direct Miss Dana, and these two also have worked together before under another company.

Eugene Nowland also comes to Metro from the Edison company. He will be assistant director with John H. Collins, and his first work on this program will be seen in "The Flower of No Man's Land."

Another addition to the Metro family is Harry Brown, who has been engaged to play the role of the big Westerner in "The Flower of No Man's Land." Mr. Brown played the heavy with Miss Dana three years ago in the stage production of "The Poor Little Rich Girl." In addition to his studio work Mr. Brown is appearing in a prominent role in "The House of Glass," the Broadway play.

The New York Metro Film Service, Inc., has removed their offices from 110 West Fortieth street to quarters in the Godfrey building at Seventh avenue and Forty-ninth street. The new offices are in charge of Edward M. Saunders, general manager of the branch.

Star Hates Bathing Suit

Annette Kellermann, the beautifully figured Fox star, says she despises her black one-piece bathing suit. Although she knows she owes her fame to this she would like to be considered something besides a beautiful statue.

Miss Kellermann is well worth knowing personally and is a woman of unusual worth. It seems hard to believe that in her childhood she was puny, with weak semi-malformed legs, and it was to overcome this affliction she took up swimming. She has an indomitable will, her pluck is almost incredible and she never has been bothered with an undue idea of her own importance. Miss Kellermann is not foolishly intrepid, but she possesses a calm faith in her strength, her presence of mind, and her accomplishments. Thus feats that would be called foolhardy if attempted by others, become mere proofs of her great skill.

Miss Kellermann's success was brought about by consistent hard work, that eliminated the word "can't" from her vocabulary. In addition to all her other gifts, she possesses a pronounced sense of humor. And, what is still rarer, she applies it to herself. She insists that when she loses the art of laughing at herself, she wants to kick off the mortal coil.

Annette Kellermann is today the most pronounced example of what a woman can accomplish by sheer grit and application. She is internationally famous—and internationally loved.

Three New Stars for Morosco

The Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company has enlarged its acting force by the addition of three more stars who are now all working on pictures to be released on the Paramount Program.

Juan de la Cruz received his first stage training in drama and opera the Royal Opera House in Copenhagen. He has appeared before in Morosco films and Pallas pictures as well as the productions of some other western producing companies.

Katherine Griffith has played in stock, vaudeville, musical comedy and dramatic productions before her appearance on the screen. In Morosco productions she will appear in heavy character parts.

Colin Chase comes to the Morosco studios with three and a half years of picture work behind him, having been with Essanay, American, Eclair and Universal before joining the Morosco.

George Beban was present both in person and on the screen at the Motion Picture Board of Trade Exposition in New York. "Pasquale," Mr. Beban's latest photoplay, about to be released on the Paramount Program, was shown and then the actor appeared and addressed the audience. Mr. Beban concluded his remarks by saying he was in motion pictures to stay and would soon start on a new screen production for Oliver Morosco.

"The American Beauty," in which Myrtle Stedman will portray the title character, will be her next play on the Paramount Program. Supporting Miss Stedman appear Elliott Dexter, Howard Davies, Edward Ayers, Adelaide Woods and Jack Livingston. William D. Taylor is directing the production, which contains some unusual scenes. One of especial note is an ocean liner on fire, with the passengers leaping overboard in wild panic. Another feature will be the presentation in the course of the play of beautiful models of French, German, English, Italian and American nationality.

New Policy in New Firm

One of the most important recent events in the film history is developed by the formation of the Unity Sales Corporation, which may, without exaggeration, be said to mark a new ideal in the film industry.

The company is headed by Charles W. Allen, president and treasurer; Andrew J. Cobe, vice-president and general manager, and Arthur Rosenbach, secretary.

The policy of the Unity Sales Corporation is in a measure a distinct departure from the methods of distribution previously employed in the film business. It stands for "economy, general efficiency and facility of operation."

Briefly stated, the main purpose of the Unity Sales Corporation is to bring independent producers and independent exchanges together on a basis of general betterment.

The firm occupies a suite of offices in the Godfrey building, at Seventh avenue and Forty-ninth street, New York, and are constructing a laboratory.

The primary feature of the purpose of the new corporation is to insure the producer a fair price for his product, at the same time give the exchangeman a continuing line of high-class features at prices he can afford to pay.

The Unity Sales Corporation is now distributing "The Pursuing Vengeance," with Sheldon Lewis. Another presentation of the new firm is Tom Terris in "My Country First," a Terris Film Corporation feature.

Other productions in contemplation are "The Marathon Mystery," "The Gloved Hand" and "The Destroyer."

New Knickerbocker Star Features

H. M. and E. D. Horkheimer, directors for the Knickerbocker Star features, are congratulating themselves on having just issued four of the best features they have produced under this brand.

In "The Millionaire's Son" Richard Johnson plays a double role, with Myrtle Reeves in the feminine lead. In "Something in the Past" Lucy Blake and R. Henry Grey are co-stars. "Broken Fetters" is featuring Margaret Landis and Richard Johnson. The strongest of the four, however, is claimed to be "When Might Is Right," in which Henry King and Margerite Nichols play opposite.

E. D. Horkheimer is emphatic in his statements that the public wants clean pictures, and the cheerful and wholesome always has the first call on the public's affections. This does not mean that all seamy sides of life should be omitted, for it is often necessary to inject sombre bits for contrast's sake, but this must not be done wantonly. He believes that the average person's life is dark enough and he goes to the motion picture theater for diversion, so it pays to give him something inspiring rather than discouraging. Mr. Horkheimer claims that this theory is proved by the vogue of the film "Little Mary Sunshine," in which little Helen Marie Osborn is featured, which has been so popular that many exhibitors have booked it the second time.

Mr. Horkheimer wants to go on record as saying that certain publications which are holding out encouragement to would-be photoplaywrights by printing synopses of scenarios for them and submitting them to producers for sale are using false methods. He urges the inexperienced to save their money and not listen to false promises of petty grafters, for they cannot sell your scenarios as well as you can sell them yourself.

Mutual Film Corporation: Latest reports of contracts booked on the Charlie Chaplin series are about $1,600,000; number of prints in circulation, 222—26 of which are in Chicago. Chaplin's popularity apparently is as strong as ever and the Mutual organization has scored the biggest hit in its career by getting him back with his original company. The 30 per cent of earnings to the Mutual for distribution now runs close to half a million dollars on these bookings alone. Market on preferred and common has very considerably broadened during the last ten days and stock is now actively quoted in Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Chicago.

American Film Company, Inc.: The attempt to stop running the "Secret of the Submarine" has apparently resulted in an unlooked for bit of publicity. This serial has scored heavily and promises to bring in a very large revenue to the company.

Lone Star Corporation: Sales have been reported at various prices during the last week. Some of the preferred stock (carrying with it 100 per cent in common) was sold several days ago and there have also been sales of common alone between 35 and 25.

Thanhouser Film Corporation: This stock, which was almost impossible to secure under par several weeks ago, has become considerably easier and offerings of from 500 to 1,000 shares ($5 par value) may now be had at $4 per share.

New York Motion Picture Corporation: Was conspicuously weak, stock being offered at 40 without any takers.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company: Stock is wanted at 205. The company reports splendid earnings for the last two months.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than clsasification by maker, Motography has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

One Film Show a Year Is Plan

CHICAGO CONVENTION HEADS WORK TOWARD CONCENTRATION

IN the future one big, national motion picture show once a year; concentration by all persons connected with the industry—exhibitors, manufacturers, distributors and accessory men—to make that one exposition a gigantic success and that show to be held in conjunction with the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

This, apparently, is one of the results of the visit to New York of the Chicago committee from the Exhibitors' League. It is one of the proposals to bring efficiency to one end of the motion picture business.

William J. Sweeney.

William J. Sweeney of Chicago, chairman of the committee, and other members, have been in New York for three weeks for the purpose of interesting the motion picture men of Gotham in the convention and show of the Exhibitors' League which is to be held at Chicago, July 10 to 18, exclusive. The convention opens on July 10 and the show on the 12. The latter is to be held at the Coliseum, Chicago's tremendous convention hall. The members of the committee who accompanied Mr. Sweeney were Louis H. Frank, Fred W. Hartmann and Fred Schaefer.

The committee arrived in New York just at the time the two motion picture shows were being held in that city. They had to call upon but one manufacturer to discover that the men who make the films were tired of shows when they came in too rapid succession. The committee immediately decided that for the good of the entire industry, all efforts should be concentrated on having but one show a year and that show to be fostered by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and with the hearty co-operation and advice of the manufacturers.

It was on the plan of "one show a year" that the committee called upon the rest of the manufacturers. When they broached the subject they were met with open arms. The manufacturers became enthusiastic, notwithstanding that they then were standing the expense of two shows, and every film manufacturer and distributor of any recognized standing with headquarters in the east signed up for floor space at the Chicago show.

Mr. Sweeney, affectionately regarded as "Big Bill," in discussing the New York trip and the "one show a year" idea, said:

"When we arrived in New York we found that the manufacturers and other persons in the industry were just a little tired of the constant financial drain caused by too many trade shows. We appreciated just how they felt as we had seen two shows where one show would have served all business purposes.

"We found that the manufacturers were willing to give us their hearty co-operation in a campaign to have but one show a year and to have that show held in conjunction with the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

"In order to make the plan feasible, all of the large manufacturers decided to forget that they had stood the expense of two large shows and agreed to give the coming show at Chicago their most hearty support to prove that but one show is necessary and to pave the way for the prevention of all other annual exhibits that purport to be of a national character.

"The manufacturers realize that the best element in the motion picture business attend the conventions of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League and that by combining convention and show they will get in close touch with the showmen of the country."

With the birth of the "one show a year" idea it is probable that Chicago will make another step toward being the center of the film industry of North and South America. Chicago is the geographical center of the business of the United States and is the natural shipping point for the film companies. There now is a movement on foot to have the annual conventions, which carry the show with it, held at Chicago every year instead of changing the convention place each year. This proposition will be placed before the delegates at the coming convention.

No doubt there will be some radical opposition to the "Chicago-all-the-time" plan by some of the showmen of New York and other eastern cities, but it is believed that this opposition will fade away when the advantages of Chicago are placed before the opponents to the plan.

In connection with the making of Chicago the film center of this hemisphere the committee reported that the two largest film distributors in the world, now having their headquarters in New York City, declared that they were about to head Chicagoward. Both of these men had deserted Chicago in the past but since changing to New York, apparently have made up their minds that the big city on the shores of Lake Michigan holds out more promises for the future of the film business than does the rival city on the Atlantic coast.

With the committee back from New York the business end of the convention is coming in for considerable discussion. One of the most important matters to be determined is the closing of all motion picture houses in the country for one month each year during the summer months. This step already has been taken by the showmen of Cleveland and the men now controlling the destinies of the Exhibitors' League seem to feel that the closing step is a move in the right direction.

In discussing this subject for both himself and his associates, Mr. Sweeney said:

"A great many of us feel that the public sees all the pictures demanded in eleven months in the year and that it would be a mighty good move to close all the motion picture houses of the country during the month of July. There is nothing radical in this proposal as practically all of the amusement theaters of the country close their doors during the warm months.

"The 'legitimate' houses close to give the performers as well as the public a rest. We should do the same thing.

"Some exhibitors may feel that they cannot afford to close their doors for a month but if their experience is the same as mine was they can afford it. When I was an active exhibitor I closed my house during the warm weather and I found that the closing whetted the appetities of my patrons. The increase in my receipts following the closing period more than offset the money not taken in during the time the house was dark.

"It might be thought that the manufacturers and distributors are against this closing plan but I believe they will favor it. The four weeks the houses are dark will give the producers a chance to catch up with their work and the result will be a much improved class of films. My own opinion is that the manufacturers will welcome the closed period as many of them realize that the progressive showmen of to-day are demanding better films and that it takes time to make good pictures. They cannot be slapped together on short-time notice.

"Of course this hot weather closing movement must have the hearty support of the majority of the showmen. I wish MOTOGRAPHY would endeavor to get expressions from the showmen of the country on this movement."

According to the leaders in the organization, there seems to be an impression in some quarters that the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is a pro-exhibitors and anti-manufacturers organization. They wish to make every effort to eradicate this impression.

"We are not an anti-manufacturers organization and we are a pro-exhibitors body," said one of the officers. "We are not going around with a chip on our shoulder inviting that some manufacturer knock it off. We are essentially an arbitration body prepared to stand between the exhibitor and the manufacturer and see that the rights of both are respected. If an exhibitor has a grievance against a manufacturer, or distributor, it is our function to discuss that grievance and have the matter adjusted in a friendly manner. If the manufacturer, or distributor, is not willing to meet us as the representative of our membership, then is the time to talk of drastic measures. But drastic measures never should be even thought of except as a last resort.

"But the exhibitors of this country must realize that we cannot accomplish a great deal unless the great majority of them join the League. Some of them appear to think that the initiation fee of five dollars and the annual dues of ten dollars is not justified for the service they receive. They do not realize the influence of the League until they need its assistance. They wait until they get into trouble before joining, but then they are mighty willing to join. These non-members should join immediately. They should come to Chicago and take part in the convention which will be the most important one ever held in the industry."

The suggestion of the name of Frank J. Rembusch, of Shelbyville, Indiana, for president of the League is another step in the co-operative plan to bring the exhibitors and manufacturers in closer business communion. Not only is Mr. Rembusch an exhibitor, but he is a manufacturer. He knows both sides of the industry but he is an exhibitor first. During the past week, sentiment for Mr. Rembusch has crystalized, especially among the exhibitors of the west and middle west. Indiana, Ohio and Illinois are behind him almost to a man and the organizations in each state are working hard to increase the state membership in order to elect him by an overwhelming majority.

Fred Herrington, of Pittsburgh, incumbent in the presidential chair, is making strenuous efforts to retain office. Reports from his home city indicate that the exhibitors of Western Pennsylvania will give him their support, but Eastern Pennsylvania exhibitors are holding aloof from the Herrington boom and many of them appear to feel that Rembusch is the man for the place.

New York may spring a "favorite son," or one New York exhibitor may attempt to usurp the office of "favorite son" and nominate himself. Also the New York boom may be killed in its infancy.

"National Censorship Bill Unconstitutional"

PENDING BILL FLAYED BY CONGRESSMAN DALLINGER

By Thomas O. Monk, Washington Representative of Motography.

CONGRESSMAN FREDERICK W. DALLINGER, of Massachusetts, at the request of other dissenting members of the House Committee on Education, has drafted and filed with the House of Representatives, a report containing the strongest arguments yet advanced against the Hughes pre-publicity censorship bill. Even those who favor the Hughes bill admit that the Dallinger report is an able one, and motion-picture men should read every line of it. Mr. Dallinger points out the unconstitutional features of the bill, and he asserts that in principle it violates the principle of the constitutional guarantee of a free press. In connection with his opposition to the bill and the report drafted by him, Mr. Dallinger says:

"There is nobody who is more bitterly opposed than I am to the exhibition of indecent and immoral pictures. I believe, however, as is pointed out in the report, that the proper exercise of the existing police power of the several states supplemented by an amendment to the Federal Criminal Code prohibiting the interstate transportation of objectionable films, is more than adequate to remedy any evils that may exist. That the regulation of local amusements by national legislation is entirely unnecessary and unjustifiable is, in my opinion, too plain for argument.

"Having been engaged all my life in reform work, I cannot understand how the official representatives of organizations which are striving to remedy some of the evils in our American life can advocate this legislation. From the beginning of time the most effective weapon of reform has been the portrayal of the evils of existing conditions, whether that portrayal has been by word of mouth as in days of the prophets, through the printed page of poet and novelist, by means of the artist's canvas, or upon the stage. The motion-picture art affords the most effective means of propaganda yet devised, and to cripple its usefulness as is proposed by this bill would be most unfortunate and dangerous.

"The effect of Harriet Beecher Stowe's 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' in bringing home to the American people the evils of human slavery is a matter of history. How much more quickly and more effectively the same result would have been accomplished if the moving picture art had been in existence at that time? And yet does anyone doubt if such had been the case and a Federal censorship board had been in existence with the slave power in control of the national government, that the film depicting the scenes portrayed in 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' would have been refused a license on the precious ground that it was inhuman and tended to corrupt morals?

"I am firmly convinced that if this bill should become a law it is not only possible but extremely probable that under the same conditions, motion picture films setting forth the need of national preparedness or portraying the evils of the white slave traffic, of intemperance and even of child-labor might be refused a license. In my opinion those who are interested in progress and reform are the very ones who should be most vitally interested in keeping absolutely free from arbitrary control this latest and most powerful instrument of free thought expression.

"The enactment of the alien and sedition laws utterly destroyed the greatest federalist party in the early days of the Republic. These laws, however, merely punished the author of objectionable written or spoken words after they were written or uttered and then only after a trial by jury. This bill seeks to set up in this country pre-publicity censorship, one of the most effective instruments of European military despotism and I cannot believe that any political party is willing to assume the responsibility for its enactment."

The report drafted by Mr. Dallinger is signed by himself and Representatives William W. Rucker, Caleb Powers, and Edmund Platt. It is as follows:

This bill proposes to reguate by a federal commission the principal amusement agency and what is rapidly coming to be one of the chief educational agencies of the people of the United States. It is not proposed to censor the plays or operas produced at the high-priced theaters throughout the country, but it is proposed to give five men at Washington the absolute power to determine beforehand what the great mass of the American people shall be permitted to see depicted upon the motion-picture screen.

Before the national government undertakes to thus exercise the local police power hitherto reserved to the states, and to regulate purely local amusements, thus stretching the implied power of the interstate-commerce clause of the federal constitution to the breaking point, it is incumbent upon the proponents of such legislation to show that a widespread evil exists with which the state and local authorities are unable to cope.

At the hearings before the committee practically no real evidence was introduced tending to show that any significant proportion of the moving-picture films now being exhibited in the United States are objectionable. In the last analysis it appears that what the proponents of this legislation really desire is to prevent the exhibition through the agency of the motion-picture film of any book or play which in any way depicts crime or immorality, or paints the evil side of human life, on the ground that such scenes tend to corrupt morals and incite to crime.

It is obvious that any such test as this would prevent the great mass of the American people, whose limited means will not permit them to patronize the high-priced theaters, from seeing depicted on the motion-picture screen practically all the great works of literature from the beginning of time. Judged by any such standard, most of Shakespeare's plays and even many parts of the sacred Scriptures would be barred. That there are occasional indecent and obscene motion-picture films exhibited here and there, is perfectly true, just as there are obscene and indecent plays produced in high-priced theaters and indecent and immoral books published. Such productions, however, are already prohibited by the laws of the several states, and their transportation from state to state is also prohibited by federal statute under severe penalties. In our opinion, an amendment to the United States penal code including motion-picture films in the list of objects barred from interstate transportation will answer every purpose and is as far as federal legislation should go. Such an amendment is proposed in a bill introduced in the present Congress and now pending before the Committee on Judiciary.

Moreover, there was no evidence whatever before the committee that local regulation of the exhibition of motion-picture films has proved ineffective where it has been tried. It is entirely within the power of the several states to provide that the executive or police authorities of the local communities shall have absolute power to grant and revoke licenses for all places of amusement within their several jurisdictions, and in many communities this power is now being effectively exercised. Furthermore, most of the states already have laws making it a criminal offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to exhibit any obscene or indecent picture. Where the local police power is thus ample to effectively deal with whatever evils exist in the motion-picture business, regulation by the national government is manifestly uncalled for, unnecessary, and unjustifiable.

The overwhelming weight of opinion amongst those producing motion pictures is against the proposed censorship bill. The opposition to the bill represents more than 85 per cent of the total number of motion-picture films produced. Those manufacturers who favor the bill represent a very insignificant proportion of the output. The attitude of this inconsiderable minority is naturally and frankly selfish and commercial. They believe that it would be less expensive and troublesome to deal with and perchance control a single federal censorship commission than to deal with or to control the several state authorities acting under their already ample police powers. The notorious effectiveness of the prepublicity censorship of theatrical productions in England has undoubtedly influenced this minority of the moving-picture manufacturers to believe that a like national prepublicity censorship as provided in this bill will have a similar effect in this country. ¶

In England the evidence produced before a special parliamentary committee which made a very exhaustive investigation and report in 1909 has established the following facts:

(1) Prepublicity censorship "tends to hinder the growth of a great and serious drama" by discouraging distinguished authors whose time is valuable from jeopardizing their time by wrting plays which might be destroyed by the whimsical opinion of a censor.
(2) It fails to prevent the production of immoral plays.
(3) It atrophies the exercise of the local police power over local production of immoral plays because they have been licensed by the national censorship authority.
(4) The censorship authority falls under the influence of the large theater interests and tends to exercise its censorial powers with undue consideration for box-office receipts.
(5) The large theater interests favor the continuance of the censorship bureau because it gives questionable productions immunity from prosecution by the local authorities.
(6) The great literary lights of England are almost unanimous against prepublicity censorship.

These considerations led the special parliamentary committee to recommend the abolition of prepublicity censorship in Great Britain.

The great majority of the motion-picture interests oppose this prepublicity censorship bill because it is in their judgment a bill that will tend to stunt the natural development of the usefulness of the moving-picture art and will tend to confine it, as it has the English drama, to the lighter forms of mere amusement when its potential utility lies in the far wider field of information and propaganda. They believe that they are consulting an enlightened selfishness when they seek to keep the moving-picture film from the stunting influence of arbitrary power, for this development of the potential utility of the art means a tremendous increase of business. They also frankly say that they are unwilling to enter into an inevitable political contest for the control of the censorship commission to be established by this bill. They fear the power of the censorship under a rival's influence, because it is a power over their business of life and death. The elaborate productions which are now being presented represent enormous outlays—sometimes more than half a million dollars—before they can be exhibited to the proposed censors. A censorship commission under the influence of a rival could thus absolutely ruin a producer by exercising corruptly or even with unconscious partiality the arbitrary power vested in this commission to condemn the film.

But we regard the balance of interests between those several small producers catering to high-priced houses who believe in censorship because it will relieve them of the necessity of deferring to local standards of decency, on the one hand, and these large producers who want to leave the industry free to develop still greater fields of usefulness, on the other, as of little moment compared with another and very grave phase of this question.

The most serious objection to this bill lies in the power it seeks to give an executive commission to trammel the moving-picture art, the propagandist power of which is already marvelously developed, and the potential power of which seems limitless.

It is in this rapidly developing power and use for propaganda that the moving-picture film has taken its place beside speech and press as a thing to be kept free from arbitrary control in the interest of free institutions. The essence of free speech and of a free press is the power for propaganda as the media of intelligence. It was this power which reactionary authority in the old days sought to repress and which the guardians of free institutions struggled to keep free. In the beginning the attack was made upon free speech and upon free drama before the development of the printing press gave writing and printing also an effective power of propaganda. Before the influence of the press upon public opinion became effective, and before it was recognized as a possible aid to the discussion of political, economic, and social questions, the drama was largely used as a propagandist instrumentality. Down even to the time of Walpole's ministry in England the drama was a very effective means of stirring public opinion, and the early laws providing for the censorship of the drama were political devices to muzzle it as an instrument which might be used against those in power. Walpole, whose government was the most corrupt England ever knew, found his power threatened by a popular play exposing the venality of his political followers and he learned that another play was about to be produced. It was to stop this second play that he caused to be enacted the present censorship law in England. It was effective. All attempts to arouse the people of England to the shame of Walpole's government through the medium of the theater ceased immediately.

Thus, we see that the original and dominating purpose of the censorship of the drama in England was distinctly political, as was demonstrated by the parliamentary investigation of 1909. But the rapid development in the art of printing soon so overshadowed the drama in the effectiveness of its propagandist power that the struggle to free the drama from censorship was forgotten in the more important struggle to keep the new power—the power of the press—free. For the moment that place and privilege recognized the power of the product of the printing press to effect public opinion, they began to seek means to control it by the device of prepublicity censorship. The struggle to keep the media of intelligence free from the restraint of arbitrary power was thenceforward waged around the question of free speech and a free press until these institutions won their final victory, and became firmly planted in the unwritten constitution of Great Britain and in all our own written instruments. Our federal constitution, in article I of the amendments, says:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

If we keep in mind the important fact that the vital thing in speech and press which was sought on the one hand to be restrained and trammeled, and on the other hand to be kept free, was the power of propaganda, we shall understand more clearly the importance of bringing the moving-picture film within the constitutional guaranty of a free speech and a free press, because the analogy in principle and necessity is complete. Indeed, the history of the attempt to censor moving-picture films bears a close analogy to the history of the attempt to abridge the freedom of speech and of the press.

In Ohio, for instance, one of the four states which has a censorship board, it appeared in evidence before the committee that a motion-picture play depicting a manufacturer bountiful in charities which advertised himself, but hard on his employees, was suppressed on the ground that it tended to excite class feeling.

In Pennsylvania the power of the censor was invoked to suppress The Battle Cry of Peace upon the ground that it tended toward a breach of neutrality and to incite military spirit.

In Massachusetts an organization to ameliorate the conditions of child labor has been exhibiting moving pictures of actual conditions in certain manufacturing plants, and the representatives of these manufacturers attempted to stop these exhibitions. If Massachusetts had had a board of censors, who knows what its action would have been in this case?

In Massachusetts also, moving pictures have been recently used to illustrate the workings of savings bank insurance, an institution very bitterly opposed by the old-line insurance companies.

In France the moving-picture films were credited with the tremendous success of the recent French loan, the greatest the world has ever known.

In our opinion every resonable protection to the public morals can be secured by the proper exercise of the local police power supplemented by the amendment to the federal penal code already suggested. The extraordinary power vested in the commission proposed to be created by this bill will not only prove ineffective to protect public morals, as experience has shown, but it is utterly un-American in its character and in the highest degree dangerous from every point of view.

As previously stated in MOTOGRAPHY, the bill cannot be brought forward for discussion in the House until sometime the latter part of June. Meanwhile those who oppose it should lose no time or spare no effort to let the members of the House know what they think about the bill and the effect of its enactment into law would have on the motion picture industry.

Chicago Express Strike Playing Havoc

EXCHANGES USE DESPERATE MEASURES

THE strike of the drivers for the express companies with offices at Chicago has disarranged the distributing facilities of practically all of the film distributing organizations and has caused much friction between exhibitors and exchangemen, especially where the exhibitor has refused to be even partially reasonable.

Reports have been received at the office of MOTOGRAPHY that several Chicago theater owners have cancelled their bookings on serials, because the films were not delivered in time for them to put on the show at the time it was advertised. Representatives of the exchanges make a general denial of these cancellations, declaring that they are making deliveries on schedule wherever possible and when the situation makes it impossible for them to keep their part of the agreement they have attempted to find some substitute film for the exhibitor.

MOTOGRAPHY, as the unbiased representative of the exhibitors and distributors, suggests that the exhibitors make the best of a bad situation over which the distributors have no control. A careful investigation by the representatives of MOTOGRAPHY has proven beyond all doubt that the distributors are doing everything in their power to make deliveries and that in numerous cases the making of these deliveries is costing them more than they receive for the rental of the film. A little patience at this time on the part of the exhibitors will save much friction in the future and the good feeling existing between the exhibitors of the Middle West and the distributors in that territory will not be ruptured.

Just as soon as it was seen that the delivery proposition might become critical, the distributors ordered that instead of shipping film by express they should be checked as baggage. In order to do this it was necessary to purchase first-class railroad tickets from the point of shipping to the point of delivery and to mail the baggage check to the receiving exhibitor. This plan worked splendidly on the start of the film originally from the distributor, but the exhibitor in many cases did not co-operate and as a result the second exhibitor scheduled to receive the film was disappointed. The disappointed exhibitor should blame his fellow-exhibitor for not obeying instructions on the re-shipping and should not attempt to hold the distributor responsible.

Immediately after the express companies at Chicago proved their inability to make deliveries, every exchange in the city engaged a corps of boys and chartered automobiles for the purpose of making deliveries as rapidly as possible. The boys were stationed at the railroad depots of the city and suburbs and rushed all film shipments to the waiting automobiles which delivered in a radius of fifty miles of Chicago. In many cases the branch exchange managers personally piloted the automobiles in their efforts to satisfy their patrons. Hardly an exchange manager at Chicago has averaged three hours of sleep in twenty-four since the express strike started and all acknowledge that they do not expect to get much sleep until it is settled.

Not only have the films been delayed in many cases, but the advertising matter has been lost entirely. Many exhibitors have become educated to the fact that they cannot have a show unless they have their posters and many of them have complained that so long as they have received the film they do not see why they could not receive the advertising matter.

The branch managers all acknowledge that there is some friction, but say they are making deliveries. They report as follows:

Pathe—H. C. Holah: "We are making deliveries on schedule. I start delivering at 6 o'clock every night by automobile and continue until my schedule is cleaned up."

Mutual—A. J. Normal: "We run our shipping wagon all night. Two nights we had some trouble, but now everything is running smoothly."

Triangle—R. C. Seery: "We are making delivery by automobiles to our nearby offices and are sending messengers by train to farther out-lying points."

V. L. S. E.—F. W. Redfield: "We have had no trouble and are guaranteeing shipments. We have forgotten costs and get the films to our customers by special messengers and automobiles."

Fox—John E. O'Toole: "By a system of boys at the depots and a fleet of fast automobiles we have been able to make all deliveries to date."

Metro—J. S. Skirboll: "Our trouble has been in getting the films back. We are doing everything in our power to please our customers and apparently are succeeding by breaking all speed limits."

World—E. Mordeu: "We are absolutely guaranteeing all deliveries. We are running our 'flivver' night and day and have not disappointed a single customer."

George Kleine—William H. Jenner: "We have absolutely no trouble, making all deliveries by automobile."

International—John F. Bowman: "By keeping a constant day and night service, we have managed to keep all of our agreements. We are making all deliveries as far east as the Ohio river by train messengers. We lost one film, but immediately replaced it. Not an exhibitor who contracted for our serial 'The Mysteries of Myra' has been disappointed."

General—W. R. Scates: "We are making all deliveries by automobile and are having all our films shipped to suburban points from where we pick them up and deliver, regardless of expense."

CENSORSHIP BILL VETOED

Governor Whitman Stamps His Disapproval of the Cristman-Wheeler Censorship Bill—Screen Men Victorious

Screen men all over the country are rejoicing in the fact that Governor Whitman vetoed the Cristman-Wheeler censorship bill. Everyone in the industry has been watching the outcome of this bill and strenuous efforts have been made on all sides to show the governor that the bill was not a just one. The governor sustained his action on the ground that the framers of the bill disregarded two very important considerations.

Part of the big anti-censorship delegation of film men at the capitol at Albany to protest against the state censor bill.

First, where a tax is imposed upon an industry in which our people are engaged, under ordinary conditions such as prevail to-day, great care should be taken in determining the amount of the tax, to the end that the industry itself shall not be crippled or its development hampered; or that those who use or enjoy the product of the industry shall not be deprived of such use and enjoyment as a result of excessive taxation. Second, that in all legislative acts imposing a tax, the right of redress or appeal in all cases should be preserved to those who will be affected and who may be aggrieved.

The governor also called attention to the fact that the Hughes bill in Congress being now favorably reported out of committee, may be assumed to have an excellent chance of becoming a law at this session, and the establishment of a national censorship of moving picture films would undoubtedly make any special legislation in the state for the same purpose unnecessary.

Sweeney at Omaha Convention

William J. Sweeney of the League left Chicago for Omaha Wednesday, May 24, to attend the motion picture convention and ball given under the auspices of the Omaha Screen Club and Photoplay Managers Association in the Omaha Auditorium, Thursday, May 25. Needless to say, "Brother Bill" will do all a man can to boost the big Chicago convention next July.

The Chicago Convention Committee has placed in the suburban trains of the Illinois Central and the Chicago Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroads 400 cards. 14 by 48 inches, calling attention to the July convention.

OTIS SKINNER PREPARES

Noted Stage Planet Watches Michelena at California Motion Picture Corporation Studios to Get Tips for "Kismet"

During the San Francisco engagement of "The Cock of the Walk," Otis Skinner has given several mornings and early afternoons to acquaint himself with the technical requirements of motion picture craft. This is in preparation for his forthcoming appearance in the big film dramatization of "Kismet."

The California Motion Picture Corporation, under whose producing supervision "Kismet" is to be made into pictures is located at San Rafael, Marin County, which is just across the bay from San Francisco. It is here that Mr. Skinner has been assiduously gathering his stock of "tips." Beatriz Michelena, the celebrated prima donna, is now appearing there in "The Woman Who Dared," and through observing her methods of registering effectively before the camera the famed impersonator of Hajj, the Arabian beggar has made his first intimate acquaintance with the artistry of the picture profession.

"The Woman Who Dared" is the type of production, according to Mr. Skinner, from which he can gather the most practical suggestions for "Kismet." While the two pictures are cast in atmospheres entirely foreign to each other, they resemble in their demand for pretentious sets and properties. The method by which the effect of magnitude and grandeur is achieved in the one must be essentially the same in the other.

In this respect "The Woman Who Dared" is easily the most ambitious production yet attempted by the "California" producers. Its whole atmosphere is one of wealth—of the Paris and the Rome before the war in their hey-dey of glory and pleasure. To accommodate the extensive sets the big open air stage at the "California" studios was enlarged to over twice its former capacity before work was begun on filming the picture and other improvements of like magnitude were made.

Several of the biggest scenes of the production were filmed while Mr. Skinner was paying his visits.

Programs for the Kiddies

BY E. C. DIVINE

President of the Strand Theater Company, Chicago, and Originator of the Children's Program.

IT was my love for the kiddies and my pleasure in seeing them enjoy themselves as much as anything else, I believe, which led me to experiment with performances for children. There are so few regular programs which especially appeal to the child, and so many that it is much better for them not to see, even though they do not bear the pink slip, that I conceived the idea of presenting a program which was chosen entirely from the child viewpoint.

When I started out to make my bookings, however, I found it was much easier to decide to compile suitable juvenile programs for fifty-two weeks than it was to get the material for those programs. My first step naturally was to send to the film companies and ask for a list of the films they had released which would be good for a little folks' program. I received promptly very elaborate lists which led me to believe that I could easily select material enough for three years—but my hopes were soon dashed when I came to look into the subjects more thoroughly. Evidently what the manufacturers considered suitable for, and pleasing to the children was not at all what I thought. From these lists I chose a number which seemed promising and asked that they be sent to me for a trial showing, and the companies were very willing to grant my request. Also I employed a young lady who spent all her time watching for appropriate films, either in the projection rooms of the film companies or in the theaters. Another method which saved the great amount of time spent in viewing a picture which too often proved not available after all, was to send for the heralds on the picture. These gave me a clear enough idea of the play so I could judge whether or not it would do.

Also quite often I would ask to see the scenarios from which the film was produced. These scenarios in many cases would appear very promising until I had read about half way through and then I would come upon an incident or scene which would immediately condemn the film from the child's standpoint.

I never show films in my theater either for the children or the grown-ups, which I have not first seen myself. As I have my own projection room the companies send the films for me to try out before showing.

Another source which I found quite prolific of good material was the Clearing House, and there I dug up some old films that were thought to have seen their best days, but they were not too old for the children and many of the best subjects were discovered in this way, and at a very small cost. It is easier to find appropriate films now than formerly because the manufacturers are realizing that there is a market for films which appeal to the rising generation, and the idea of holding special performances for the children is growing and the demand must be met.

My kiddies' performance is held on Saturday mornings when the children are home from school, and at the same time it in no way interferes with my regular program. The performance lasts two hours and every minute of that time is enjoyed by the children. The program includes a feature, which is usually an adaptation of a fairy story, an educational and a comedy. Also I introduce child actors, who either sing, dance or recite, and find that the children enjoy immensely seeing their little friends perform. This makes a break between the pictures and helps to vary the program.

In gathering my material I base my selection on the very little child, taking those from three to five years old as an average. Of course there are many older than this in attendance, as anyone up to fifteen would enjoy the program—in fact, I believe that the grown people who come with the children enjoy it just as much as they do—but my idea is primarily an entertainment for the youngest members of the family. Therefore my program must contain material which can be understood by the very little tots and be enjoyed by them.

I have not tried any definite method of checking up which class of films they like best except by observing them during the performance. And let me assure you right here that no one present gets more enjoyment out of these Saturday mornings than I do, and no matter how busy I may be I always am among those present at the "kiddies' show." They have such a good time that it is a pleasure to watch them. I can't say that any one class of film is received more heartily than another, but they certainly do love the cartoon comedies. Every child who is big enough to look at pictures always demands that the "funnies" be read to them, and when they see on the screen these same people with whom they are familiar in the "funnies" it is like meeting an old friend, and much exclaiming and squealing is heard all over the house when the familiar characters appear, and their laughter rings out at the funny antics of the figures.

No matter how tiny the child is he can easily understand the capers of the pen and ink sketches. They are so simple of construction that there is little for his small mind to grasp and when the cartoon is ended you will hear voices piping up all over the house with "Oh! Isn't he coming back?" Well, don't you think he will be back next week when I come to my theater?" And I try to see that they do "come back" very often, for on Saturday morning at the Strand the child reigns supreme and every wish is gratified as far as I am able to do so.

When I first started these special programs—and in fact the rule still holds—I hung out a big sign in the lobby of the theater which said "No adults admitted unless accompanied by children." It was amusing to watch the children when they found out what this sign meant, and their importance when they informed their elders "you couldn't get in if you didn't come with me." It was an evening up of old scores, of the many times when they had been told they could not go to the theater because "the picture is nothing for you to see," or the forbidding sign of "No children admitted" barred them. No wonder they felt that at last they were being appreciated and treated with the respect due them. This sign gave rise to some very laughable situations when the grown-ups did come with no children to chaperone them, and try to buy a ticket for the performance. I sometimes had to forget my rule when there were seats enough to accommodate all because some of the older ones had come way downtown to see the film and I disliked to send them back home with their trip all for nothing.

During the winter months, with the theater in the heart of the business district, as the Strand is, it is not always practical to run these shows because of the great distance from the residence districts, and during the severe weather the mothers think it safer to keep the little ones at home. This is a condition which would not affect the theater located in the residential district. As soon as spring comes, however, the house is filled and in many cases I have played to capacity houses when the grown people were only allowed to occupy a seat when they would hold a child on their lap—for this is the children's hour and they are not to be crowded out by their elders. It has become quite a fad for the children to give theater parties Saturday mornings and the boxes are usually all taken by these little hosts and hostesses, which makes quite a society event of these breakfast matinees.

My experience with these juvenile programs has been entirely with a downtown theater and conditions in many ways are different from those which would be encountered by a manager in the outlying districts. I charge an admission of ten and fifteen cents and every one has to pay no matter how young the children are. I run only the very best pictures and spend a good deal on advertising, my newspaper bill alone being about one hundred dollars a month. Running such an expensive program there is not a great deal of profit in it for me, but I don't care as long as the children are having a good time, and also managers will find that pleasing the children means pleasing the rest of the family and you gain much from the increased popularity of your house and also these performances advertise you extensively.

There is no reason whatever why the manager of the smaller local theater could not run a program on Saturday morning or afternoon especially for children and make a good profit on it. He can get so many films for five dollars which may be old but still are fascinating for the little folks. He does not need to book an expensive program and he can easily run to capacity house every Saturday with a little judicious advertising. Very often some of the films which are run for the children can be included in the program in the evening as the older people will like them just as well. It also often happens that many of the films which are primarily produced to please the grown-ups will make very fine additions to the children's program, and after they have grown old they can be obtained for a very small sum.

The far reaching scope of this plan for the child's theater is shown by the number of letters I received from all parts of the country asking for information on the subject, how I started my plan, where to get the films, etc. I received a number of letters from mothers' clubs and women's clubs, showing their interest and their intention of starting some such scheme in their own cities.

Editor's Note: Mr. Divine's splendid article marks the opening of Motography's department of Films for Children. Information regarding programs for the kiddies will be given, secured from sources other than producers. The wisest exhibitors are coming to realize more and more the value of bringing children into their houses, and that the youngsters of today are the grown-ups of tomorrow.

SPECIAL PLAYS FOR AMERICAN

Specially Selected Stories for Specially Selected Famous Stars Is the Slogan of the American Film Chief

Samuel S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Company, is planning to have stories especially selected and adapted to the capabilities of the respective stars in his company, and he will personally make these selections and supervise the productions from beginning to end, as he believes this is the best and only way to secure the best results.

Mary Miles Minter, Kolb and Dill, William F. Russell, Richard Bennett, Audrey Munson and Helen Holmes will each be presented in a series of plays under the best direction obtainable.

Aaron Hoffman, the playwright and author, has been engaged to write a series of multiple reel comedies exclusively for Kolb and Dill. The first of these is "A Million for Mary," and will represent an innovational thought in comedy production.

In "The Man Who Would Not Die" William F. Russell has a strong dual role, that of twin brothers. Mr. Russell and his company have returned from Long Beach where they made the water scenes for this play, which was written by Mabel Condon. Charlotte Burton, Harry Keenan and Leona Hutton are the other principals in the cast. Jack Prescott is co-directing the picture with Mr. Russell.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the Signal and American companies, has returned to Los Angeles after a prolonged visit in Chicago and New York. He stopped over at the Signal studios for a running of "Whispering Smith" and "Medicine Bend" before going to the American studios in Santa Barbara.

MOTION PICTURE CONVENTION

All Exhibitors and Fans in Nebraska Attended Convention and Ball Held at Omaha on May 25

A most extensive advertising campaign was inaugurated to exploit the motion picture convention and ball which were held at Omaha, Nebraska, on May 25.

Every theater throughout the state, as well as those in Iowa, Dakota and Kansas, ran slides advertising this event, and announced that tickets could be obtained at the box office. A great number of posters and circulars were gotten out and everyone in any way interested in the motion picture industry helped the good cause along by using stationery calling attention to the convention and the date.

The convention was held in the Omaha Auditorium. All the local people interested in the film business had booths, as well as a number of the manufacturers. A number of speeches were made by prominent people, also there were demonstrations of machines and exhibitions of a number of special features. The music was furnished by a band composed of one hundred pieces.

In the evening an entertainment was arranged by a number of vaudeville actors and actresses, and this was followed by the big film ball.

The Merit Film Corporation was recently organized in New York and will be the distributors of Ivan productions in New York state and New England.

Mr. Exhibitor: Miss Love

INTRODUCING A DAWNING PLANET WHOM YOU SHOULD KNOW

Miss Love is the proud possessor of one of the slyest, toughest winks on the screen.

PERHAPS you have met Miss Love before, in "The Aryan" or "Acquitted" or "The Flying Torpedo." Perhaps she has sent her dramatic soul into your very house to blossom forth upon your screen.

At any rate, judging from the saucy wink on the left, she seems to be well acquainted with somebody.

In spite of her affectionate name, Bessie Love is not usually so forward. In fact, she is the incarnation of modesty—until she slips before the camera into a scene which calls forth all her innate "pep" and fearlessness. She is an actress only when she is not acting at all. In her plays she is the person named on your program. Great painters are said to mix their oils with brains. This little dawning Fine Arts planet mixes her work with love.

"Some are born great; some achieve greatness and some have greatness thrust upon them." This same may be said of fame, and Miss Love, this recent young screen luminary, is one who belongs to the latter classification. Miss Love's few, but remarkable, characterizations in Triangle plays of recent months have firmly established her as one of the "finds" of the season and paved the way for a brilliant future.

She is an actress OFF the screen.

Probably most of the 15,000,000 daily worshippers before the shrine of the screen became acquainted with this girl with the romantic name when she appeared with Wilfred Lucas in the Fine Arts play, "Acquitted."

Those fortunate dwellers in small towns were those to particularly enjoy the accuracy and strength of that drama—they along with those who passed their early days in this or that village and then were consigned by Nemesis to the Siberia of the city. In short all those kindred souls who know life in the diminutive hamlets of Uncle Sam's land extracted a keen pleasure from the work of that consummate actor, Wilfred Lucas, and Miss Love, his wonderful little helpmeet of the play.

Perhaps this old step-ladder, used in a Douglas Fairbanks play, is a prophecy of the mystic ladder of fame.

In "Acquitted" Miss Love made her minor part of the daughter of Lucas' old bookkeeper stand out like the bit of pigment the painter puts on his canvas just at the point of interest to furnish the contrast and the color. The story was "small town" through and through. Miss Love was the small town girl, with the small town lover, and was courted in a deliciously honest small town way. Do you remember the proposal? Daughter and beau on bench. Mother, sewing, father, reading, little sister, playing, all in a family circle with the bashful lovers. He whispers the question. She, frightened, whispers it to her mother. And so on to the father, who emits a surprised "I gesso."

And so Miss Love registered her first engagement—all in the play, of course.

The advent of Miss Love into the real of motion pictures was made under simple circumstances. She was paying a visit with her mother to the Fine Arts-Triangle studios in Hollywood. D. W. Griffith noticed her watching the players at work and was impressed by the wistful charm of the little caller. He requested a brief interview with her and at its conclusion instructed his lieutenants to make some tests of the child. Recognizing her gifts, Griffith selected her to play an important part in "The Flying Torpedo," with John Emerson.

Her work shone so brilliantly that Griffith's confrere in the production of Triangle plays, Thomas H. Ince, "borrowed" her for the part of Mary Jane in "The Aryan," in which William S. Hart was starred. This performance has been declared by the critics to be one of the most ingratiating characterizations seen on the screen in many years.

Miss Love appeared in "The Good Bad Man," and "Reggie Mixes In," with Douglas Fairbanks. She is now appearing under the Griffith supervision, making daily strides toward a success which her admirers predict is inevitable. Since the completion of her last picture with Douglas Fairbanks she has been working with De Wolf Hopper in "The Old Legit," a circus play.

Tom Moore of Ireland

Tom Moore, who is co-starred with Anna Nilsson in the Arrow Film Corporation's production of "Who's Guilty?" the newest Pathe series, was born near Kells, County Meath, Ireland, about twenty-six years ago. He was thirteen years old when his parents came to America and settled in Toledo, where Tom, with his brothers, Owen and Matt, was placed in school. But adventure got the better of Tom's schooling, and he visited his brother Owen in Chicago. Owen landed him a job as a super in the stock company's performance of "Secret Service," and for twenty-one consecutive days Tom was a stage hero in a Yankee uniform. Then the juvenile of the company left, and Tom got the juvenile's place.

Tom Moore, Pathe Arrow.

After a short season with the Wilfred Varney stock company Tom Moore came to New York and joined the Poli stock company. First he went to New Haven and then to other Poli theaters, breaking a two years' engagement with Poli long enough to play fifteen weeks in a New Orleans stock company. There he met George LeSoire, who prevailed upon him to try picture work with the Kalem Company.

The picture work at first failed to hold Tom, and, though in his Kalem engagement he had met Alice Joyce (whom he was destined later to marry) he went back to the Poli players. Kalem sent for him and so did Miss Joyce. He talked it over with her and finally summoned all his Irish courage and wit and proposed —no, not to Miss Joyce—to Kalem that if he were permitted to play opposite Miss Joyce in all her pictures he would stick with them. The proposition appealed to them. So in 1913 Tom became a permanent screen player.

After he had played with Miss Joyce for more than a year, appearing with her in nearly forty photoplays, he was made a Kalem director. He acted in his own company as well, with Marguerite Courtot as his leading woman. With her he played in more than fifty pictures. Many of these he wrote himself, as well as directing and acting in them. Among them were some of Kalem's most successful one-reelers, including "Prejudice," "The Secret Room," "The Adventure at Briarcliff," and "In Double Harness."

With three years' service with Kalem to his credit, Tom Moore left that organization, shortly after his marriage to Miss Joyce. For a while he took the rest he so well had earned. When he returned to the screen it was to join the Arrow forces for the "Who's Guilty?" series.

Ray Representative in Europe

Mr. Prieur of London and Paris was a pleased attendant at the initial presentation of the Johnny and Emma Ray comedies at the Broadway Theater in New York last week.

Immediately after the showing, Mr. Prieur went to the offices of C. Lang Cobb, Jr., manager of sales and publicity of the Reserve Photoplays Company and insisted upon a three-year contract to represent Ray comedies in Europe and Australia. After a presentation of facts regarding the enormous business accomplished for Mr. Cobb on his Ramo features, the genial manager of sales agreed to appoint Mr. Prieur once more his European representative—only this time for Ray comedies.

Mr. Cobb made the Ramo a by-word in every part of the globe and there is little doubt but that he will make Ray comedies just as popular.

Other Beach Films Coming

"The Barrier" will probably be chosen by the Lubin company for the first of the Rex Beach photoplay features with "The Silver Horde" and "The Iron Trail" following in the order named. Definite decision on this selection will be made within the next fortnight. Meanwhile preparations are progressing in an effort to make each production represent a new epoch in elaborate photoplay achievement.

Cheap film, like cheap jewelry, always looks the part.

Owners and managers of moving picture theaters have their share of tribulation, and the obtaining of suitable electric current at reasonable prices is not the least of their troubles.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

A FACT was brought to my mind last week which makes me feel that I must have a "Dutch Uncle" talk with my fellow-exhibitors. It was this: A friend was traveling in the northwest at the time of the convention at Minneapolis and so stopped over to take in the exposition. He was loud in his praise of the people who had the exposition in charge and the beauty and extensiveness of the exhibits, but most condemnatory in his remarks regarding the exhibitors. For he stated that the exhibitors were not among those present. At least they were present in such very small numbers that they were hardly noticeable at all.

To my mind this is a most deplorable state of affairs. The exhibitor—the man who would receive more benefit than anyone else from the convention and exposition—did not think it worth attending. He probably was "too busy getting his house in good running order," or he was "having rather poor business just now and could not afford it." Perhaps if he had attended the exposition and become familiar with all the latest ideas in exhibiting, the modern appliances and new methods, and met his fellow exhibitors and had a chance to talk over his problems with them, and to in turn hear what they were doing, he might not have had so much trouble with the running of his house, and there would not have been such poor patronage, because he would be operating a theater which would be alive and up-to-date.

How does the exhibitor expect to be able to meet competition if he is not constantly on the alert for the new and better material and methods? How can he secure these easier or more pleasantly than at these expositions? This is a century of progression, and the man who does not constantly forge ahead along new and improved lines is soon going to be left far behind in the race—and may I add deservedly.

If you do not support your own Exhibitors' Leagues, who is going to support them? I wish that in some way I could impress it indelibly upon the mind of every exhibitor that his future advantage, his monetary reward and success, will come only through keeping constantly in touch with the newest and best, and that he can gain the greatest help from meeting with and co-operating with other exhibitors.

32.—I have been reading MOTOGRAPHY and take the liberty of writing you to see if you will give me some information on the line of the moving picture theater business. We have been advised and are considering it somewhat to enter this field in Chicago but know little of it. Would like to get into some good residence district. Will you give me some idea of amount of capital required, also names of reliable firms?

This question is rather a staggerer as you have practically asked me to tell you all there is to know about the establishing of a motion picture theater. Perhaps, however, I can give you sufficient information to show you how to start in this business.

The first thing to be considered is the location of your theater, and in deciding upon this you must take into consideration the class of people in the neighborhood—whether they will support a five cent, ten cent or fifteen cent theater. In the average neighborhood if you established a price of ten cents you could run to a full house but a fifteen cent admission price would kill the theater from the beginning. On the other hand if you choose an exclusive wealthy neighborhood start with a fifteen to twenty-five cent house for otherwise the patrons will consider that it was not first class.

Next you must make an estimate of the population of the district on which you would have to draw for your patronage to get an idea of how many people would attend a motion picture theater. If there are already picture houses in this district you can judge by their attendance. In a new territory where there are no other theaters practically the only method of estimating the probable attendance is that used by the street car and interurban railroad companies, that is by counting the people passing the proposed location and dividing this number by a suitable factor, determined by experiments on other sites. This count should be made every day for a week during the time that the theater would be open, and should not be made during holidays or other times of unusual activity. The factor, or number by which the total is divided depends upon the location, the time of day and upon the general character of the town, and varies anywhere from eight to twenty-five, that is, under ordinary circumstances, from one out of eight to one out of twenty-five of the passers-by can be depended upon to enter the show.

After you have decided on your neighborhood the next thing to be taken into consideration is the choosing of the site, and here you will have to be guided by the city ordinances governing moving picture theaters. In Chicago the ordinance reads:

> Buildings for the exhibition of moving pictures only, with a seating capacity of over three hundred, but not to exceed one thousand, shall be located so that they adjoin at least two public thoroughfares, one of which shall be a public street and the other may be a public alley not less than ten feet in width. Except as hereinafter otherwise provided, the audience room of such building shall have either a public thoroughfare or an open space unobstructed from the ground to the sky on each side thereof. Such open space when the audience room has a capacity not to exceed six hundred seats, shall be five feet wide, and six inches shall be added to the width of same for every additional one hundred seats in said audience room up to the maximum of one thousand seats. In all cases where there is a public alley in the rear of such building, said open space must connect directly with the alley.

Also there is an ordinance regulating the placing of your theater in the vicinity of churches, boulevards, parks, etc., which must be taken into consideration. This states among other things that a theater cannot be placed within two hundred feet of a church. All these points must be taken into consideration in choosing your site, and after this is decided you must thoroughly acquaint yourself with all the city laws governing, the building, the lighting, seating capacity, etc.

The amount of capital required really depends upon your own finances and also will be governed to a great extent by the class of house you are planning to run. If you select a neighborhood which can be counted on to uphold a fifteen cent theater then your original output can be much greater because your profits will be greater. A rough estimate would be anywhere from $5,000 to $150,000 required for the building and equipment of the theater.

As to the reliable firms you will have to consult a good many before your house is equipped. There are firms which make a specialty of building fronts for motion picture theaters, there are others which will furnish your projection machine, another will attend to your interior decorating and another to your seats, etc.

All these answers have been given you on the basis that you are contemplating erecting and furnishing your own theater. Of course there are other ways of entering this business. You can rent a theater which is already established and in good running order, or you can take a theater which has been closed because of lack of business and build it up and make a success of it. In these cases it would simply be a matter of seeing the owner and arranging a monthly rental basis. Or you can rent a store or other building and remodel it and turn it into a motion picture theater. If you can find just the building in the location you want this is a very easy way to start a theater.

If after you have studied into this matter a little further and have a little more definite idea as to just what you want to do you will send me more specific questions pertaining to the points which are puzzling you, I may be able to give you some more definite and personal information.

33.—I have been subscribing to MOTOGRAPHY for three years. The first thing I read every week is the reviews, but before I know if a film will suit my house I have to take advantage of MOTOGRAPHY'S Service Department and get the information by mail. Why does MOTOGRAPHY fail to give all the information necessary in the reviews?

I rather like your attitude of feeling that the reviews in MOTOGRAPHY should be written just for you and with all your requirements in mind, for that is just the spirit of close relationship that should exist between the trade journals and the exhibitor. But you must also look at this from the standpoint of the trade journal and realize that while it does want to give you just the service and information which you require, at the same time it has to take the ten thousand other subscribers into consideration. And the other subscribers might in turn complain that the reviews did not give what they wanted. There are a good many exhibitors to please and keep informed, and the best that can be done is to strike an average and try to meet the exhibitor half way in this manner.

The reviews are written with the aim of letting you know the theme of the play, the class of offering—that is whether it is a thriller, a problem play or a heart-interest drama. Also to give information as to the production and to call attention to anything out-of-the-ordinary or unusual in photographic effects or any especial merit in the direction and the acting is commented upon to show you which actor or actress brought out their role most prominently. The reviewer strives to give an idea of the appeal the play will make to the theater audience, and through comparison to give the exhibitor some idea as to whether the stars are as good in this play as in others in which they have been very popular.

The fact has to be taken into consideration, however, that this is only one person's opinion and that every picture is liable to impress everyone in a different way. Even the reviewers do not always agree in their criticism of the films. So the picture would appeal differently to different audiences. The best the reviewer can do is to give you a criticism with the points mentioned in mind and leave it to you to decide whether or not this particular play will appeal to your patrons.

It was because of this necessity of giving a general review which would help everyone to a degree that MOTOGRAPHY established its Service Department where exhibitors could obtain specific information. This Service Department is always within reach—at the end of a telephone or telegraph line, or through the call of the postman or a personal call from the exhibitor. If you will send in a description of your house, the class of people to whom you cater, and other individual information the Service Department is ready and willing to give you very definite and personal advice as to which films will be appropriate for your use.

Iowa Exhibitors Convene

The annual convention of the exhibitors of Iowa was held at Des Moines from May 22 to 25. The exhibitors from all over the state were in evidence and very interesting and beneficial sessions were held. Perhaps the most practical information which could be taken back home and put to every day use was derived from the meetings in which the different exhibitors told their experiences and shared with the others the benefit of clever and economical advertising ideas which they had worked out and found worth while. This interchange of ideas is the best way to keep alive and alert, and to bring out new viewpoints and suggestions.

Among the photoplay features which were shown to the exhibitors and afterward thrown open for general comment and discussion from all practical points of interest to the exhibitors was the Jesse L. Laskey Feature Play Company production of Geraldine Farrar of "Maria Rosa." This discussion of the film brought out many good points and clever suggestions for advertising purposes not only for this film but also for all angles of the business of management.

Jack Sherill Visits California

Jack Sherill, son of William D. Sherill, president of the Frohman Amusement Corporation, New York, is making a visit on the coast and is an addition to the film colonies. Mr. Sherill played Steve O'Mara opposite Alice Brady in "Then I'll Come Back to You," the Frohman Amusement Corporation's last release. Although this juvenile actor has been before the camera a little more than a year he has made an especially excellent reputation for his ability in "young boy" roles. He belongs to the Ernest Truax type of actor who never grows old, and there are but few of this type in the picture profession. Mr. Sherill has made personal appearance at several theaters in Los Angeles and Venice, where pictures featuring him comprise the program.

He attended a cowboy dance given by Douglas Fairbanks in Los Angeles, at which numerous other screen celebrities were present.

Mr. Sherill has had several offers from producers in California, and while there will investigate their possibilities.

Stanton and Powers Jump

Sanford Stanton, formerly editor of the Metropolitan section of The World and more recently with Selwyn & Company, has joined the publicity department of the Triangle Film Corporation, succeeding Wallace M. Powers. Mr. Powers, who has been associated with the Triangle since last summer, will rejoin his old chief, Henry MacMahon, at the National Drama Corporation, sponsor for the Thomas Dixon-Victor Herbert opera-cinema, "The Fall of a Nation," which opens at the Liberty Theater, New York, on June 6.

The Problem of Official Regulation

IF we were prepared to concede that pre-publicity censorship of any kind were necessary or unavoidable, it would need no argument to convince us that federal censorship was desirable. If we must be arbitrarily regulated, obviously one master is better than forty-eight or more. That is the purely practical viewpoint.

Picture producers have observed the multiplication of effort and expense involved where many censoring boards, differing only geographically, all do the same work, and the prospect of "each member of a family of forty-eight," as Mrs. Peck expressed it, "sweeping the parlor rug each week." The only good argument for a federal board is that it would tend to eliminate some, if not all, of the local boards.

Perfect justice is as rare as any other perfect thing. It is difficult for a producer whose taxes are paid and money spent in one state to gain the friendliness of a political censor board in another state. Foreign corporations are natural political prey wherever they are unfortunate enough to be vulnerable. The combination of opportunity, power and irresponsibility would demoralize stronger minds than those ordinarily found on a censor board.

We have always prejudged the workings of a national or federal censor board by the examples we already have in local boards. Some of these, we know, are particularly vicious, even though the laws creating them may seem reasonable; and in the case of the New York bill just vetoed by the governor the proposed law itself was bad. The situation naturally leaves room for differences of opinion. The very unsatisfactoriness of the local regulation is regarded by one faction as a reason for federal regulation, by the other faction as a reason against it.

There is no guarantee that a federal commission would eliminate any local board. Logically, however, it would have that tendency. As a parallel case, practically all the states have commissions with jurisdiction over all public service companies. The operations of these state commissions cannot run counter to the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the federal board. The state utilities commissions exist and are useful because many public service companies operate wholly within their state, and so are not under the jurisdiction of the federal commission. But the motion picture business is practically all interstate. Did a federal censor board exist, no local or state board could hope to continue successfully in a course antagonistic to it. Since a course parallel to it would be obviously a duplication of effort without reason, the elimination of local boards would necessarily follow in time.

From all this we may deduce that a federal censor board would be much the lesser of two evils. That is about all we can say for it. We are still unalterably opposed to the principle of censorship in any form; but it is neither equitable nor wise to condemn without thorough consideration of all the logic in the case. That we are not, however, opposed to a fair review of the products of our industry is shown by our consistent support of that voluntary censor, the National Board of Review.

We still contend that pre-publicity censorship is intolerable, unless it be by mutual consent and arrangement. We do believe, however, that federal regulation without pre-publicity censorship is not only possible but feasible. Furthermore, we are convinced that such regulation would be welcomed by all reputable producers of pictures.

There is no pre-publicity element in the present operations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor the Federal Trade Commission, nor any other official body for the regulation of our industries and commerce. There need be none in the regulation of the motion picture industry.

On the subject of regulation without censorship we have put much thought, as doubtless have many others. The problem is not an easy one, since we have no exact precedent for it. The best we can offer so far is a suggestion for a motion picture court, competent to hear all complaints both by and against film representatives.

Such a court would deal wholly with cases involving pictures already released and presented to the public. Action brought before it against any film would be subject to the usual formalities of court procedure, and therefore would not be undertaken without a sufficient apparent cause. Its decisions would be subject to appeal to higher federal courts.

When such a court condemned a picture, the cost to the producer would be much greater than the cost of a pre-publicity elimination. Perhaps for that reason the scheme is impracticable; but we believe it would develop a degree of caution among producers that would make adverse decisions rare. It would doubtless develop a new profession, that of "film lawyer," and probably one of them would be on every producing staff.

This suggestion is a mere outline. We have not investigated the legal objections to it, and perhaps there are many. But if bright minds can work it out, it would solve the problem of regulation, which is desirable and welcome, without pre-publicity censorship, which is undesirable and unwelcome.

The Efficient Conduct of a Convention

TO MAKE a convention worth while, to make it return dividends to its visitors and its supporters, more is necessary than merely entertainment and a pleasant gathering place. A trade convention is, first of all, a business meeting, in which all may participate. Particularly is it desirable that visitors have opportunity to express their grievances and problems to those who can remedy them.

The way these things are handled in the conventions of practically all industries except this one is by papers, prepared and presented by representative members of the organization. For some reason or other this highly effective system of presenting information and arousing profitable discussion has not yet been developed to the extent it deserves in motion picture conventions. It is not too late now to assign subjects to a number of able exhibitors, who, with a little intelligent co-operation from a papers committee, can cover practically the whole field of present-day exhibiting problems.

The representatives of the big distributing companies will find at the convention a rare opportunity to meet the consumers of their product—an opportunity that can occur nowhere else.

Full advantage of it cannot be taken at the exposition booths, crowded as they are with sightseers. Accessible rooms at some downtown hotel would give more opportunity for conferences and the settlement of disputed points, resulting in a more cordial sentiment all around.

While we write this the National Electric Light Association is holding its thirty-ninth annual convention in Chicago. There are some six thousand visitors in attendance, which puts the event numerically in the same class with the motion picture convention. There is much to be learned about the efficient conduct of conventions from a study of this old and successful society, whose meetings are always profitable to its treasury as well as to those who attend its sessions. Such lessons as we are able to draw from it we intend to present briefly next week, believing that exhibitors who are interested in the success of the coming convention will not disdain an opportunity to observe the methods that long experience has proven good.

The Big Four's Summer Schedule

MANY BUSINESS-GETTERS FOR WARM WEATHER

THE Big Four is co-operating with the exhibitors in their effort to keep up their attendance during the summer months by releasing some features which will assure a full theater.

Vitagraph has contributed four features to the June program. The first of these, "The Destroyers," is a dramatization of James Oliver Curwood's novel, "Peter God." In this play Lucille Lee Stewart, the new Vitagraph star, will make her debut. The production is under the direction of Ralph W. Ince.

The other Vitagraph releases will be "The Redemption of Dave Darcey," in which James Morrison is featured supported by Belle Bruce and Billy Billings; "Winifred, the Shop Girl," in which Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno appears; and "Fathers of Men," which features Robert Edeson and Naomi Childers.

Edgar Lewis has also produced a powerful drama, "The Toilers," written by Daniel Carson Goodman, and featuring Nance O'Neil. This will be released in five parts.

The Selig edition to the June program will be "The Valiants of Virginia," a heart appealing southern drama.

Essanay offers "That Sort," in which Warda Howard takes the leading role, assisted by Ernest Maupain, Duncan McRae and John Lorenz. This film contains some very beautiful scenes of the Riviera and Monte Carlo.

N. W. Redmond, manager of the Imperial Theater, Jacksonville, Florida, received three petitions signed by hundreds of Jacksonville's best citizens asking him to secure a return engagement of "The Raven," with Henry B. Walthall in the leading role. Speaking of the petition, Mr. Redmond said:

"It is no unusual thing to see petitions circulated for things that deal with public questions or improvements, or for the enactment of desired legislation; but a petition that asks a manager of a theater to get a return exhibition of a certain feature picture is a rare thing."

In line with its policy of promoting its members from the ranks so the exhibitor will be dealing with the same people whenever he comes into the office V-L-S-E has made the following promotions:

H. E. Stillwell has been promoted from bookkeeper for the Atlanta branch to salesman covering the territory in Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee.

L. E. Schaffer, who has been connected with the Denver branch and has covered the territories in Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Colorado, New Mexico, Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, Montana, west Nebraska and western South Dakota, has been promoted to assistant branch manager of the Denver exchange.

Patrick Doyle, who has had extensive experience with the Fox Film Corporation and the World Film Corporation, has been added to the force in the Montreal office.

Mr. Hayden, a former exhibitor and automobile salesman, has become affiliated with the Denver office of the Big Four.

V-L-S-E is constantly advocating and putting into operation a plan of co-operation between the exhibitors and the department stores in cities, which results in mutual benefit to both. While the "Ne'er-Do-Well" was showing in Chicago Rothschild's department store ran a lavish window display of the book by Rex Beach and advertised the fact that the feature could be seen at the Fine Arts Theater. The result of this co-operation was many added buyers and patrons.

With the completion of the "Mr. Jack" series featuring Frank Daniels, V-L-S-E announces another series of ten one-reel comedies which will treat of the escapade of Kernel Nutt in the person of Mr. Daniels. One of these comedies will be released each week. The first one, released May 15, was "Kernel Nutt, the Janitor," followed by "Kernel Nutt Wins a Wife," "Kernel Nutt, the Footman," and "Kernel Nutt and the Hundred Dollar Bill," with six others to follow.

ALICE JOYCE WITH VITAGRAPH

Gypsy O'Brien Is Also Captured by Vitagraph Company—"Lights of New York" Feature Among June Releases

Alice Joyce has returned to the screen after a year of private life and signed with the Vitagraph Company. Her first appearance will be made in the leading feminine role of this company's new film-masterpiece, "The Battle Cry of War," which is a sequel to "The Battle Cry of Peace." Miss Joyce started work on this film on May 29.

Another noteworthy addition to the Vitagraph forces is Gypsy O'Brien, who has been working as leading woman for Mr. Lyndharding in Henry VIII. Her first appearance on the scene will be made in "The Scarlet Runner," which will afford her every opportunity to display her talent.

Still another newcomer to the Vitagraph, Lucille Lee Stewart, will make her initial bow in "The Destroyers," under the direction of Ralph W. Ince. Huntley Gordon, John Robertson and Richard Turner assist Miss Stewart in this feature.

Other features on this program for the week of May 29 include "The Lights of New York," featuring Leah Baird. Others in the cast are Walter McGrail, Adele de Gardeis, Arthur Cozins and Don Cameron. The feature is under the direction of Van Dyke Brooke.

In "The Rich Idler," Mary Anderson and Webster Campbell take the leading roles under the supervision of William Wolbert.

"Kernel Nutt, the Footman," is one of the series in which Frank Daniels is seen. John T. Kelly and Alice Washburn assist in the fun making. C. Jay Williams produced the comedy.

Lillian Walker appears in "The Lonelies," under the direction of Wilfred North. William Shea and Edwina Robbins make up the balance of the cast.

Charles Kent, Mary Maurice, Walter McGrail and Belle Bruce portray the leading roles in "Carew and Son," while Harry Davenport is responsible for its production.

A record for endurance at the expositions was made by Rose E. Tapley of the Vitagraph Company, aided by Sara Charlton, Alma Morrison, Grace Francis and Emily Ruth. These five young ladies attended every session of both shows and were busy from eleven to eleven, wearing their finest clothes, answering thousands of questions, giving out pictures of stars and generally adding to the decorative effect of the booth. Their loyalty and endurance made an impression that was as complimentary to them as it was to the film company.

EFFICIENCY IN STUDIO WORK

Anna Nilsson Does Some Rapid Fire Changing of Make-Up, Costumes and Characterizations in Two Pathe Features

It is a common contention that the lack of efficiency in the studio as compared with the efficiency displayed on the legitimate stage, is deplorable. But there is no audience to be kept waiting in a studio and although quick changes are desirable no great harm is worked whether the player takes five minutes or fifty minutes for a change of costume.

This complaint cannot be made against the Pathe studio, however, nor against Anna Nilsson and Director McGill, for they certainly have established a record in efficiency and proficiency.

It all happened this way. Miss Nilsson had finished all her scenes in "The Tangled Web" of the "Who's Guilty?" series, under the direction of Director McGill, and had started work on the interior scenes of "The Tight Rein," under the direction of Howard Hansel. All was progressing nicely when a clerk approached McGill and broke the news that the negative of all of Miss Nilsson's scenes was burned up in a railroad wreck on its way back from the laboratories.

Directors McGill and Hansel called a consultation. They each had to have Miss Nilsson, the one for the completion of the scenes, the other for the retakes—so they compromised by "splitting her fifty-fifty." A special dressing room was quickly arranged on the studio floor placed half way between the two big sets, and just eighteen minutes from the time he was told of the loss Mr. McGill had Miss Nilsson doing a quick-change stunt in the stage dressing-room and he and Hansel were "splitting her fifty-fifty."

It was trying for both directors. But it spoke volumes for Miss Nilsson's dramatic ability that even the rush of changing gowns every few minutes did not interfere with her separating each role so nicely in her own mind that she re-acted the lost "Tangled Web" scenes without a rehearsal, thereby saving McGill valuable minutes. Two hours after the news of the loss was learned the needed retakes had been completed and were on their way to the laboratories.

While directing this same series, "Who's Guilty," Howell Hansel tells of a most unusual occurrence. While his back was turned Miss Nilsson and Tom Moore ate the "props" of the scene. They had been playing for five hours on a stretch without a stop for a bite of lunch and the tea table set with real cakes and tea was too much of a temptation, so Miss Nilsson consumed the cakes and Mr. Moore appropriated the tea.

For the first time in her life Miss Nilsson faced a live audience in Proctor's Palace Theater, Yonkers. The audience were so demonstrative in their applause that the actress was horribly stage-frightened and was not at all well backed up by Tom Moore, who appeared with her. They both lost their voices entirely when asked for a speech, but the audience seemed to rather enjoy this fluttering helplessness.

Exhibitors Buy Supplies Together

The new Brooklyn branch of the Exhibitors' League of America is certainly a "live member." It started out with great vigor and bids fair to continue along these same active lines.

The latest effort of the organization is the development of a co-operative idea by which theater supplies may be bought in bulk at a great saving in price. A committee consisting of Louis L. Levine and William Brandt has now arranged to buy coal for the 107 Brooklyn picture theaters at a much lower rate than would be granted to the individual exhibitor, and with the success of this step is planning to enlarge the scope of the co-operative system to include almost all of the supplies necessary to the running of a film theater.

At the same time the Edison Lighting Company has agreed to a tentative reduction in the electric light rate that is estimated to save the exhibitors a substantial sum each week. Under the supervision of another committee the advancing cost of advertising posters is being fought with considerable success.

Fort Lee Screen Club Born

With a charter membership of eighty-one members the Fort Lee Screen Club, Fort Lee New Jersey, has been organized. The election of officers resulted as follows:

Alex Shannon, president; Emile Chautard, first vice-president; Barry Whitcomb, second vice-president; L. M. Walker, recording secretary; W. M. Miller, corresponding secretary; Theodore Burkhart, treasurer; Lawrence Fisher, sergeant-at-arms.

At the next meeting the eight members of the board of directors will be chosen. The membership at present is limited to men in any department of the industry at Fort Lee, where there are eight motion picture studios. Later they will probably affiliate with the other screen clubs.

Editor Jack Wheeler, of the Selig-Tribune news films, has purchased a specially constructed automobile for the use of his cameramen in Mexico.

What Theater Men Are Doing

AN OPEN FORUM

The Manager's Ten Commandments

By George Van Alstyne,

Manager, New Glove Theater, Gloversville, N. Y.

WHAT constitutes management of an up-to-the-minute theater of today, is a question often asked of managers throughout the country today. Many persons interested in this vast industry, whether they be owners, lessees, managers, employees, or even patrons, wonder what comprise the essential credentials necessary to be a successful manager. The answer is, one who can make money for his house, and who can deliver the goods.

Deliver the goods! You will say that that in itself means making money, but, brother exhibitor, don't allow yourself to be fooled by this sentiment. It is one of the biggest mistakes confronting us today. While there is no stereotyped method of managing a theater, it is well to consult one who knows something about this end of the business. In fact, were all the managers of the country in convention, and were they to come out in plain English and tell how they made a success, I doubt if they could give you any definite reason or method.

First of all, there are a number of different difficulties confronting the manager at every point of the game, the most important of all is having the entire management on your own hands and having inefficient employees, perhaps favorites of the owner or lessee, in your employ. What can you do?

While a very important question in itself, it is only one of the very many that you will have to face. Let me give you a slight lesson in conducting a picture palace in as few words as possible.

We will take Theater No. 1. Mr. Jones, a hardware dealer, hearing of the vast fortunes earned by a few live wire exhibitors, builds a theater and tries to run it himself. After a year of weekly losses, he is told by a wise salesman to get a manager, one with a reputation. He engages a manager who, for sake of argument, will be myself. Upon my arrival at the scene of action I go into a conference with Mr. Jones, and insist that I have full control over the destinies of the theater until the expiration of my contract. This is absolutely necessary. Then I go to the editor of our paper, who is the best friend the manager has, and get him to co-operate with me by giving him some good press dope, not only for my theater but for every theater in town. I may be running one program of feature pictures, but, should I have a capital story of another release, I will give it to my friend, the editor, for we must please not him but his readers, who are our patrons. After obtaining his co-operation, I set about reorganizing my staff. I want an expert operator, one who knows his machines and can get the best out of them.

I give him to understand that he is superintendent of projection and that he must give me the best projection in town, no matter at what cost. Believe me, brother, he will do it or he is no operator. Then, after giving instructions to the rest of the staff, impressing indelibly upon their minds the importance of politeness at all times, I set about finding a program.

I have heard managers say that they were handicapped upon their expense account, and could not undertake to sign up for so-and-so's program, as their price was fifty dollars a week above the limit. Isn't that ridiculous? What care I whether a program cost me a hundred and fifty dollars or two hundred a week as long as I can please my patrons and they are willing to pay for the best that I can provide? I sign up for, say, Paramount Pictures. I then tell my patrons, through the medium of my friendship with the editor, that I have the program that they want; that my program offers them the best picture stars that are being presented in the city; that in keeping with my policy of clean pictures I am going to operate a clean theater; that I appreciate that music is essential to the enjoyment of the high-class features that I am presenting and to that end will employ an orchestra, the pick of the best musicians that the city has to offer; and that we are going to give them what they want at the price they want it.

I cut out the advertising slides on the screen. My patrons can read ads in the newspapers; they come to the theater to see pictures. I run slides (not more than eight) telling them of the pictures to be seen during the next week, and then some slides as follows:

The management appreciates your co-operation in aiding us to maintain quietness during the play.

Through our affiliations with the Paramount Corporation we are allied with America's leading theaters whose pride is clean pictures in clean theaters.

We are your servants in amusement. State your wishes and we will try to gratify them.

Should any feature we present be objectionable to you, tell us. Should any feature please you, compliment us. We want to know just what you want us to present.

The manager reads motion picture periodicals and is well versed in present doings. Should you want to know anything about your favorite star ask the manager; he will be glad to oblige you.

We want to become fast friends with you. Won't you visit us sometime in our office and let us acquaint you with ourselves?

And many more slides of a like nature, anything, in fact, that will give the patron the impression that he, by suggestions and criticisms, is running our theater. You know you don't have to accept every suggestion that comes your way, no more than you can run every feature that is released.

It is absolutely necessary that every manager should screen any picture that he intends running that is not included in a program. By screening his pictures, the manager knows what he is going to get when he books it, or he knows just why he will not play it and can give a positive reason for his refusal to anyone who suggests having it run.

It is not a bad idea for a manager to sign up with programs, leaving one day a week open for any special that may be on the market. There are many reliable producers, the best of which put their films on the market through the agency of a program, and it is the better way for the manager, for while there has been some controversy over the open market, I for one am against it, as I appreciate that any exchangeman handling a program will advise the manufacturer of the necessity of keeping up to the standard. By assuring your patrons that at certain periods you will give them pictures with their various favorites, and that these favorites can be seen only at your house, you gain that prestige which assures you good business at most every presentation of any feature on a reliable program. This you can hardly do on the open market, as competition controls the scale of rental prices, and while you may have Mary Pickford today, your competitor across the way may have her tomorrow.

Unique, catchy, up-to-the-minute advertising is necessary to the advancement of a theater. A newspaper space of two or three inches single column is lost, no matter what you have to say in it.

My favorite ad is one that covers three columns, and is two to three columns deep. I use two thumbnail cuts at the upper corners, thereby obtaining an attractive heading without having to resort to getting my own electroplate. Most manufacturers today supply cuts, but a manager who will look after his own ad work will find that he can do more with a good assortment of from 3 to 14 point type than all the cuts in the world can do for him. This is where your friend, Mr. Editor, is a handy man again, for he can advise you just how to use your space most effectively.

A manager must make his rounds every so often amongst his employees asking their aid and giving his, suggesting and receiving suggestions. His booth must receive his particular attention, for that is the actual root of the box office receipts. Poor projection will spoil the best feature ever made. I know it. An attractive stage or screen is also effective, though not absolutely essential. Should a man ask me how to build a photoplay palace, I would tell him to be sure to get a stage whether he ever plays any other attractions than pictures or not. A pretty setting, a nice screen with draperies over the shadowbox, and a good orchestra, with or without an organ, is an ideal setting for real entertainment. Say, Brother Manager, did you ever try a ladies' orchestra as a stimulant for business? It's worth while, if you know how to get the meat of the advertising this affords you.

Another matter that ought to be the aim of every manager is to keep in constant touch with your exchangemen and producers. I have received many suggestions from the advertising departments of many producers and exchanges and have profited by most of them. Never for one moment do they forget that your success means their continuance; your failure means for them bankruptcy.

To sum up the commandments of management, follow these rules:

1. Have your theater at all times clean, pure, heated and ventilated.
2. Make your program one that has appealing points in it.
3. Have features that will appeal to children and adults. Many mothers are bound to take their children, but won't allow them to see smut.
4. Obtain orchestrations for your orchestra; they help the picture.
5. Attention and politeness of your employees at all times, to all persons, means increased receipts at the box office.
6. In advertising use the same politeness; do not appeal to the baser passions of man. It may get you maney for a time, but in time it will mean putting the lock on the front door.
7. Make it your earnest endeavor to find out what your patrons want, then make sure that you give it to them.
8. Be on the best of terms with your competitor and try to obtain his co-operation rather than his enmity.
9. Build up a mailing list and give it especial attention. It's important, and while expensive, earns its own way in a short time.
10. Be honest with every one you come into contact with; in other words, don't try to put it over on anyone.

These rules are simple, aren't they? But they mean money.

An Artistically Arranged Theater

By C. G. Behrens,

Manager, The Family Theater Company, Davenport, Iowa.

We pride ourselves on the projection, as to the clearness and size of the pictures on the screen, on the lighting of our theater, and the general artistic effect of the interior. We have no stage in the theater but the screen is set back into a shadow box about twenty feet deep, with a black background border top and sides. Although the theater is sufficiently lighted so that one can readily find a seat or an acquaintance who may be in the house, or can easily read the program, this shadow box keeps all light from affecting the projection.

By the arrangement of the theater the front seats of our house are just as valuable as the back. In front of the screen is a sunken formal garden most artistically arranged. The garden is surrounded by a balustrade which is festooned with artificial flowers and vines and box trees are placed about the outer edge. In the center is a fountain which is always playing and the water is colored alternately with various shades and combinations of light. The side walls are painted in panel effect and in each panel is placed a box filled with flowers, plants and vines. From these boxes emerge the lighting fixtures from which the rays of light are thrown against the ceiling and side walls and all glare kept from the audience and from the screen so that although the house is light the clearness of the pictures is in no way effected.

We play Triangle five days each week and Metro two days, on Tuesday and Wednesday.

The Organization Is the Thing

By R. B. Wilby,

Manager Strand Amusement Company, Montgomery, Alabama.

I have been very much interested in reading your department, "What Theater Men Are Doing."

I have observed carefully the details of the experiences of other managers and studied the causes of their success. I have marveled at the positiveness of their opinions and the cleverness of their ideas.

With all due respect to the ability of all these good managers, there is one thing I know. The successful theater managers have been and always will be the ones with the best, most loyal organizations. But in all the experiences I have read in Motography's fine department, it has been the manager, and he alone, who has "put over" his house. If I succeed in the end it will be due to the men who are doing the actual work.

Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno will soon be seen in a five-part Mexican story.

American Studios Humming

Thomas Ricketts, Edward Sloman, Donald MacDonald, William Bertram, Frank Borzage, William Russell, and Carl M. Le Vinness comprise the crops of directors now at work on a number of feature productions at the American studios in Santa Barbara for release through the Mutual Film Corporation.

Among these will be included "A Man's Soul," a five-reel feature with Winnifred Greenwood and Franklin Ritchie in the principal roles, under the direction of Edward Sloan.

William Russell is the star as well as the director of "The Guide," a story written by Russell Smith and scenarioized by Edward J. Hungerford. Charlotte Burton appears opposite Mr. Russell and is assisted by Henry Keenana and Nell Franzen.

"The Power of Mind," a three-reel feature, under the direction of Thomas Ricketts, was prepared for the screen by Anthony W. Colewey. The cast includes Lizette Thorn, Edward Coxen, George Field and George Gebhart.

"Madonna of the Night" is another three-reeler written by Karl Coolidge, directed by William Bertram and enacted by Nita Davis and E. Forrest Taylor as stars.

Two-real features comprise "A Man's Friend"; "The Pilgrim"; "Repaid"; "Jealousy's First Wife"; "The Flickering Flame"; and "The Gentle Conspiracy."

"The Fate of the Dolphin," a story of the fisher-folk, will also be a two-reeler. The cast includes Edward Coxen, Harry Von Meter and Lizette Thorne.

Five feature productions, starring Helen Holmes and directed by J. P. McGowan, will be Signal-Mutual releases of the near future. "Whispering Smith," in five acts, will be the first release to be followed by "Medicine Bend," "The Manager of the B. & A.", "Judith of the Cumberlands" and "The Diamond Runners." To secure star and was engaged by the Thanhouser-Mutual studios some months ago. She will make her premier appearance in "For Uncle Sam's Navy."

A new record has been established in the motion picture industry with the first Chaplin-Mutual release, "The Floorwalker." One hundred and thirty-two prints of this film are shown in Greater New York and a total of $1,300,000 in bookings for the United States alone has already been reached.

Reports circulated to the effect that Edna Purviance, Charles Chaplin's leading lady, had left or was about to leave the Chaplin-Mutual company are denied. Miss Purviance is now at work at the Los Angeles studio.

The Mutual Film Corporation announced the postponed release of "The Secret of the Submarine," for May 22. The Mutual was victorious in the first skirmish of the legal controversy with Richard Barry, who sought an injunction against the release of the picture. Justice Hotchkiss decided that the injunction should not be issued in the event that bond be furnished to protect the plaintiff. Bond has been furnished by the American Film Company. The publication of the syndicated novel version of the story by E. Alexander Powell has been begun in several hundred newspapers.

MICHIGAN EXHIBITORS MEET

Michigan State Branch No. 4 of Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America to Hold Convention in Bay City

Michigan Branch No. 4, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, will hold its next annual convention at Bay City, Michigan, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 13 and 14. National President Herrington has advised through National Secretary James Delves of Pittsburgh, that he personally will be in attendance and it behooves every exhibitor in Michigan to be on hand at this particular time, as things of the most vital importance are coming up at this convention and ways and means are to be devised for combatting the various issues at hand, namely, the proposed state tax, federal censorship inspection, and numerous other things.

National President Herrington has a very particular message for every exhibitor and one that will be to advantage to every exhibitor, large or small. If the exhibitors of Michigan want to protect and enhance their business and keep up the enviable reputation of Michigan State Branch No. 4, they must attend and make this a banner convention. Bay City is making special arrangements for taking care of all visiting members, and while there will be plenty of business to be looked after and many things to be discussed, entertainment has not been forgotten.

Peter J. Jeup, treasurer of the League, has sent out a letter to the exhibitors exhorting them to "wake up" and attend the convention at Bay City and also the national convention at Chicago. Mr. Jeup says in part:

"The exhibitor is having all kinds of conditions imposed upon him and unles you organize the conditions will be growing worse instead of better. So I hope that every exhibitor in the state of Michigan will attend both the state and national conventions and convince yourself that organization is necessary.

"Your battles have been fought in the past by a few men at a great sacrifice of time and money, and if you expect these battles to be fought for you in the future you will have to give us your moral as well as financial support.

"Again I appeal to all exhibitors to attend as your very business and existence depends upon a solid organization. Remember that the legislature is to convene next January and all sorts of laws, such as high licenses, Sunday closing and other obnoxious ones are already being proposed.

"Again I say wake up."

Chicago Exhibitors Contribute

Nearly 400 Chicago theaters entered into the Actors' Fund donation, and Aaron Jones, chairman of the committee states that he expects Chicago and vicinity to contribute $100,000 of the $500,000 total.

In Detroit, John Kunsky, the big theater owner, is chairman of the local campaign committee. Big affairs were held in all the principal theaters, notably in the Garden Theater, where a mammoth Shakespearian festival was given under the auspices of the Drama League of Detroit. Mr. Kunsky went to New York and took back with him on a special train a delegation of screen favorites as his guests. The visiting delegation included Clara Kimball Young, Carlyle Blackwell, Emmy Wehlen, Valli Valli and Alice Brady.

Exhibitors Plan to Combine

Slowly but surely efficiency and co-operation are coming to the front in the exhibiting business.

Seven Kansas City managers have been holding conferences relative to forming a combine of their theaters, which are suburban houses of the best class. The idea would be to rent films on a seven-day plan and provide special music. The showing of features in the different houses on successive nights would eliminate first run difficulties, as the houses are separated so they do not compete. A combination program would also be issued.

The initial production of the Rialto Film Corporation of New York, "The House of Mirrors," by Frederick Chapin, directed by Marshal Farnum, will be released in two weeks.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

THE moving picture theater owners of Terre Haute, Ind., have asked the City Council to reduce the license assessment from $75 to $25 per year.

The Chestnut Street Opera House, Philadelphia, has been reopened with motion pictures.

The Wells' Bijou, Evansville, Indiana, is to be converted into a high-class picture theater. R. R. Russell, former manager of the Princess, will be manager.

The Savoy Theater, Hamilton, Ontario, has changed from a full-fledged burlesque show to a first class moving picture house. Bluebird features, Red Feather features and the Universal Service will be used.

V-L-S-E Pals is assisting the exhibitor in reading reviews of the Big Four releases by publishing each week a list of the names of the magazines giving these reviews, the names of the reviewers and the date each feature is reviewed.

Max J. Weisgeldt, manager of the Mutual exchange in Omaha, says that city is in need of a few live motion-picture theater managers, and he asks experienced hustlers who are looking for such a position to communicate with him.

At the official opening of the New Mission Theater, San Francisco, Manager Robert F. Abraham issued printed invitations to the opening which were good for two admissions. He opened his theater with Mary Pickford in "Poor Little Peppina."

Chief Drabell says that fewer arrests were made by the Orange, N. J., police department last year than in any year within the records of the department. He attributes this condition to the decrease in drunkenness caused by the popularity of the motion pictures.

G. N. Shorey, owner of the Queen, Knoxville, Tenn., has just purchased the Gay. This puts Knoxville's two biggest picture houses under the same management. For the present there will be no radical change made. The Queen uses the Paramount service and the Gay the Triangle.

The grand jury of Hudson county is planning to investigate the moving picture theaters of Hoboken and Jersey City. Reports have been made that minors are admitted to many theaters unattended by adults, and that in some places the films are not such as children should be allowed to see.

Announcement was made recently of the purchase by Ed. Colley of Birmingham, Ala., of the Trianon and Rialto motion picture theaters from H. M. Newsome, who has been identified with the business for many years. Mr. Colley purchased the Princess from Mr. Newsome about two years ago.

A moving picture theater of Fayetteville, North Carolina, recently ran a tin-can contest and 68,990 tin cans were collected by the boys of Fayetteville. The same theater conducted a campaign last year to rid Fayetteville of tin cans, but lacked 24,000 cans of coming up to this year's record.

Without in any way interfering with the regular business at the Strand Theater, New York, the entire stage lighting system of the theater has been reconstructed. This change was necessary to accommodate the new stage setting which was installed at a cost approximating ten thousand dollars.

It is rumored that the Metropolitan Opera House of New York will be used as a film theater this summer, and Samuel L. Rothapfel, managing director of the new Rialto, may possibly take over the artistic direction of this proposition. This would be the largest theater in the country devoted to pictures.

Ed. Coley, manager of the Princess Theater, Birmingham, Alabama, has purchased the Trianon and Rialto from H. M. Newsome, who is the pioneer motion picture manager of Birmingham. Mr. Coley purchased the Princess from Mr. Newsome about two years ago. Mr. Newsome still retains his interest in the Amuse-U.

The New Astor theater, Minneapolis, built for Ruben & Finkelstein, lessees of the New Palace, New Grand and New Garrick theaters, is completed. It seats 1,100 people and is arranged expressly for motion pictures. It is finely appointed, with a marble entrance. The cost of the building and furnishings is placed at $125,000.

"You Can't Resist That Little Twist of Quality" is the slogan printed on the program of the Lyric Theater at Coeur d'Alene. This applies to the program as well as the theater, for they issue a commendable vest pocket size sheet which shows the dates for two weeks. The name of the pictures to be shown, the star and the producing company are given in each instance.

Samuel Davis, proprietor of the Elite theater, San Francisco, had a good deal of excitement in his theater while he was showing "The Naked Truth." The film caught fire and filled the house with smoke. Al Bainbridge, the operator, was slightly burned, but the patrons succeeded in reaching the exits without trouble, and the blaze was quickly extinguished.

Mayor L. A. Fritsche of New Ulm, Minnesota, has created quite a hornet's nest of public opinion by putting a ban on the showing of the "Twilight Sleep" pictures. A private exhibition was given for the newspaper men and members of the armory board, and they were all in favor of showing it. Action may be brought against the mayor for prohibiting the showing of the film.

The manager of the Society Theater, Seattle, Washington, has conceived a most ingenious scheme by which crying babies will not disturb the audience, and yet the mothers can watch the pictures. He has established a rest room in his theater so located that one can sit there and watch the pictures and at the same time the noise of the baby cannot be heard. There is no doubt that the mothers will all patronize this theater.

The Bioscope of London, England, is responsible for the following:

A certain single man in the Midlands has appealed to the local tribunal for partial exemption from military service, and his appeal was refused. Suddenly a happy thought struck the appellant, and he begged for at least four weeks' exemption on the ground that, having already seen two episodes of the "Adventures of Deadwood Dick," he could not rest until he had seen the remaining four of the series. The veracious chronicler states that exemption was granted for one month.

Small and Whiteside Brothers, owners of the Majestic Theater, Corvallis, Oregon, issue a diminutive program two and one-half by three and one-half inches in size. It is just about the size of a business card and is very handy to slip into the pocket, but when it is unfolded it reveals the entire program for a month. On the back is given the prices both for the matinee and evening performances and also the "Different Producers' Nights."

Carr & Schad, Inc., of Reading, Pa., have added another moving picture theater to their large holdings.

The Palace, one of the largest in this section, will be closed for alterations for several weeks, after which it will be opened by them as a first-class moving picture theater.

This firm is building a large new theater at Seventh and Penn streets, and also has the Princess, Empire and Victor theaters.

John Hazza, manager of the Empress Theater, Edmonton, Canada, recently offered a large silver cup, known as the "Empress Theater Cup," for proficiency in miniature target practice among the various companies of military battalions stationed in Edmonton. This was a very good advertising scheme and gave much publicity to the theater. Considerable rivalry was aroused and "B" Company of the 51st regiment was announced as the winner.

The Colonial theater, Albany, N. Y., has been sold by Morris Kantrowitz, who built it four years ago, to Benjamin and Wm. Berinstein, who will continue it as a high-class picture house under the direction of the present manager, Walter M. Powers. Berinstein Brothers are also the owners of the Hudson theater, used for motion pictures. The purchase price of the Colonial named in the deed was $57,500, in addition to assuming certain mortgages against it, making the price to be paid about $100,000.

The management of the Frat Theater, Martin's Ferry, West Virginia, had a unique plan in view but the Board of Education decided not to give the children a holiday, so it had to be abandoned. They planned to have a special program for children on civic clean-up day and to offer free admission to every child who brought a string of five or ten tin cans gathered from their yards and alleys. Doubtless they would have played to standing room only.

R. J. Edenfield, president of the Dreamland Theater Company, Augusta, Georgia, sent us an editorial clipped from a local paper, entitled "Art—Movies—Censorship." This is a very interesting article which says that "Movies are not yet art. But they have a fair chance of becoming art if silly censorship under which they now operate is relaxed, or, better, abolished." The treatise ends by saying that "Any kind of censorship is un-American and a peril to free institutions." We are always glad to have live articles of this kind brought to our attention so we can pass them along to our readers.

Paramount Progress passes on an idea which we are in turn very glad to pass on for it is an original and good one. H. A. Wishard, manager of the Majestic and Wishard Theaters, Bloomfield, Iowa, is responsible for this clever scheme. He describes his plan thus:

I am sending one of our little programs for the week and I want to tell you the plan we have figured out to coax people to grab them: As you see, they are all Vol. 1, and this one is No. 18. Once every month we accept them as free admission to a regular 10-cent show. We do not let people know what number we are going to select nor what night; they must keep track of that by reading them. Our last number, you see, was 13. We will probably use 17 or 18 for our next night.

We only had about 18 free admissions the first time, next 35; next 60, and last 101, and it is amusing to see the people scramble for them as we hand them out at the door. We have printed 1,000 per week, and our ads more than pay for them at 25 cents per card per week, and as the merchants know our plan of making programs stick, it's no trouble to keep them filled with ads and by accepting them once a month for admission it hardly affects our cash receipts at all, as any one in a family having the correct number usually brings the balance of the family.

I think so well of this that I would like other brother exhibitors to get next to it, as I have tried almost everything and this is my best way so far to keep people in touch with my coming attractions.

The best all around program full of "punches" and good ideas which we have seen for a long time is that issued by the Empress Theater, Cleveland, O. The program is an eight-page folder and is called the "Time Table." The originality starts with the first page, on which appears each week a "Straight Talk," which is very clever advertising matter. A sample is given herewith:

STRAIGHT TALK

Many of my patrons know it to be a positive fact that when they ask me personally as to the quality of a show that I do not hesitate to say it is good, great, ordinary, or poor, just as the case may be. The same thing applies to any items in my advertisements appearing over my name. If I personally urge your attendance to see some particular picture that is one you should not miss, the invitation should be heeded.

Another thing: Are you in doubt sometimes as to whether one of our pictures is worth while? Worth leaving home to see? If you are, go to your telephone and call up this theater and ask how the show is. Any of my employees will give you dependable information—they are instructed to answer candidly and truthfully. Isn't this decidedly fair? Try it out.—Bleich.

A statement of this kind, followed out, will do much to add to the popularity of any house. Another noteworthy innovation in this program is stating definitely the time the pictures start. This does not mean the time each run starts but the time each separate picture on the program will appear, so that if a patron desires only to see one they will know just what time to arrive at the theater to see it from the beginning. This item is probably what suggests the name of the program itself. Besides the program for the week, which includes a concise summary of each picture to be shown, there is also a note announcing the coming attractions with a note about each.

Unusual Issues of the "Screen Magazine"

PARAMOUNT PICTOGRAPHS SHOW OPERATOR AT WORK

WE wonder why it hasn't been done before.

The large and growing body of fortunate folk who seek the picture houses for recreation have been shown almost every artist that this and foreign countries can boast. They have seen the wonders of every corner of the world unrolled before their eyes. They have lived again their own lives in the hundreds of dramas they have seen woven in the sunlight and shadow of the screen. Fires have raged, ships have sunk, and blood has spilled before the gaze of picture patron.

But has he ever been shown at work the man whose touch reveals all these wonders of the screen?

The innate curiosity of every man, woman and child in regard to "how it works" is satisfied at last by the Paramount Pictographs. The pictures transport "the man behind" and his mystic enclosure to the screen and the audience sees all the interesting mechanical processes of picture projection. They see the film threaded through the intricacies of the machine; they see the focusing, framing, and the un-canning of the dramas "canned" by the black box of the camera. Needless to say, release number 16 of the Pictographs will hold the attention of picture-goers glued to the screen with their usual interest, plus.

The man who makes 'em move. From "The Man Behind," in Pictograph release number 16.

Continuing its effective campaign for "Better Babies," the Paramount Pictures Corporation shows in the seventeenth release of the Pictographs the correct method of physical training for the boy who is in school. This feature contains the following lessons for parents:

How to teach kiddies to walk Indian-footed to avoid twisted joints and the common fault of broken or low arches in the feet. How the child should be taught to sit in the school room so that he will not become stooped. Round shoulders cause lung troubles. How the child should breathe, one of the most important elements of health and one which is sadly neglected.

In the Paramount-Bray animated cartoons, the twenty-second chapter of these drawings shows an exciting "fish story" in which Bobby almost catches a whale. Earl Hurd contributes this feature.

Paramount Pictograph Policies

"That world-old gap between the 'highbrow' and the 'lowbrow' has been bridged at last by motion pictures in the weekly Pictograph releases."

So declares the editor of the weekly Pictograph features. Future generations may well rate their culture from the completeness of screen curricula which place all humanity on the same intellectual plane, rather than the bulk of diplomas for the few, in the opinion of the versatile Pictograph editor.

Not the least of the claims which its editor makes for the Pictograph is that the book-loving public which has hitherto spent its evenings beside the library reading lamp with some favorite periodical is now found in the audiences of motion picture houses.

"The Pictograph is going into subjects which heretofore, of necessity have been closed books to the people," he asserts. "Three years ago I declared that Harvard professors would be writing scenarios for motion pictures. My prediction came true when Professor Hugo Munsterberg started his psychological tests in the Pictograph releases. Professors at Harvard and Yale have been propounding new ideas for years. The masses have usually scoffed at them because they did not understand what the college man was talking about. Intellectually, the world has been divided into two classes—the 'highbrows' and the 'lowbrows.' The Pictograph will bring these two brows together.

"The possibilities of the Pictograph can be developed so that it will become one of the greatest influences in the world," he continued. Hitherto much of the best thought has been accessible only to those who had access to colleges and universities or to those who are constant readers of the highest class of magazines. Motion pictures are going to reach a far larger audience than magazines and newspapers ever can. Pictograph releases—the first attempt ever made to take up various important subjects in such a manner—will take up all of the important topics of the day and show both sides of the question, so that the day laborer in the small country town will be just as conversant with it as the college graduate.

"There must be something in motion pictures which will take the place of the magazines. The Pictograph fulfills this need, but it appeals to a universal audience. Our policies on news are to be sharply defined. We will picturize subjects uppermost in the minds of the people as we have done in the 'Preparedness' films, which have attracted national interest, and in the 'Better Babies' releases, which are attracting the attention of every good mother.

Visiting Murderous Moros with Burton Holmes

Pirateland—pictured by generations of poets and novelists as the haunt of romance and adventure—is shown in a "close-up" view to motion picture audiences in the seventeenth release of the Paramount-Burton Holmes Travel-Pictures "Visiting the Murderous Moros of Mindanao."

A good fight is always more palatable than a good meal to the Moros from the sturdiest chieftain to the smallest boy of the tribe, but the traveler in these "easy chair journeys" going to Mindanao with the escort of Burton Holmes and Governor-General Cameron Forbes views without danger to life or limb the murderous natives in their every day life in the streets and in the markets, and sees the war-like and barbaric splendor of the war dances and naval evolutions.

The Moros are descendants of a villainous race of sea-roving pirates, who still cruise about in curious craft and make their homes in villages of queer huts built on stilts on the shores of Mindanao.

TWO WEEKS WITH PATHE

All Releases Up to June 17 Are Now Ready and They Include a Great and Interesting Variety of Subjects and Lengths

Pathe's releases for the next two weeks include eight reels of serials, two reels of slapstick comedy, a Goldberg cartoon, four issues of Pathe News and five split reel scenic and educational pictures.

The serials include "The Double Resurrection," the next episode of "The Iron Claw," and "Sold Out," the fifth drama in the "Who's Guilty" series.

A slapstick one-reeler ready for release in the week of June 5 is "Luke Laughs Last," featuring Harold Lloyd.

The "Fatal Pie" is the Goldberg cartoon on this program, and on the same reel is an educational film entitled "Some Fresh Water Fishes."

Another split reel is made up of "The Zinc Mines of Long Hit," an educational film of French Indo-China showing the oriental methods of taking zinc from the mines; and "Around Mount Fuji," a scenic picture of Japan.

Pathe News No. 46 and 47, released on June 7 and 10, complete the week's program.

For the week of June 12 another episode of "The Iron Claw," entitled "The Unmasking of Davy," is ready, and the next drama of the "Who's Guilty?" series entitled "Sowing the Wind."

"An Awful Romance" is the title of a one-reel slapstick comedy produced by the Mittenthal Film Company for release on the Pathe program. This features James Aubrey, of the old "Heinie and Louie" fame.

The split reel educational and scenic picture for this week includes "France's Canine Allies," showing the selection and shipment of hundreds of Alaskan dogs for use in the European war, and "The Gorges of Colorado."

Pathe News No. 48 and 49 will be released on June 14 and 17.

Pearl White, the girl of the Pathe "Iron Claw" serial, tells a very funny one. Last week, Miss White had occasion to hire a woman to come in and do work by the day. She was an English woman, and her references and appearance were all in her favor. Everything was settled but the consideration of wages. "What is your price?" asked Miss White. "If I eats myself, two dollars and a quarter," said the woman; "if you eats me, one seventy-five."

Another good one is told by Larry McGill, who is directing the "Who's Guilty" series featuring Anna Nilsson and Tom Moore.

In one of the latest dramas of the series Director McGill instructed Miss Nilsson and Mr. Moore to stand in a very difficult, straining position, the while the 'old clock on the stairs' struck nine. It was one of those comfortable, easy grandfather clocks that lead you to believe each stroke is its last, and Anna Nilsson is highly strung. Result: By the time the clock had struck six Miss Nilsson's position became unbearable and she moved. "Once again," said McGill. "Nothing doing," replied Miss Nilsson. "For the love of my nerves, get a Big Ben. This thing is so slow it's ten o'clock before its finishes striking nine!"

Hint for Your Operator

Perhaps you have been having the same machine trouble for which this brother operator has found a solution. He had been having trouble starting his machine, using two or three alternately. The machines used direct current which was rectified on the spot. When the carbons were warm the current was 40 to 45 amperes, and the machines would blow their fuses when the amperes mounted above 50. The operator found much trouble in starting on cold carbons, the current rising to the point where the fuses would go out.

He tried first switching on the alternating current so as to warm up the carbons on the second machine. In this way the danger of the fuses blowing was eliminated and the warmed carbons made a much better light, so that the pictures thrown on the screen were bright and clear from the outset.

Story of the Fox Million Dollar Picture

GIVING SOME GLIMPSES INTO THE PLOT

ALTHOUGH the public has been given many statistics about the number of people appearing in the play, the time it took to produce it, the location in which the production was made and hints of the wonder and grandeur of the spectacle, the William Fox Company has not before offered any information as to the plot around which the "million dollar Kellerman picture" was woven.

The prologue shows little Katherine, a Roman child, and her canary which she idolizes. She releases this unhappy bird to join a joyous sparrow living free in a nearby wood. One day the sparrow falls victim to a barn dog and the canary, desperately in love, flies out to sea and dies on the waves. Little Katherine dies of grief.

Sunrise on a palm-fringed beach reveals a flock of mermaids arising at the sound of a morning call sounded by their queen. As they glide into the sea they carry with them a baby mermaid with the face of a little angel. This little mermaid is the child who had died of grief over the death of her bird. The sparrow that died is transformed by a fairy queen into a youth and the canary, by the wave of a wand is made into a perfect woman of great beauty. She is borne shorewards on a wondrous shell by the mermaids. Over the universe the good spirit waves her wand and then into the picture comes a garden in an Eastern kingdom where these two fairy-made creatures (William E. Shay and Annette Kellerman) are to enact this mighty drama.

After the mermaid and mythological scenes you pass into the episodes dealing with the Sultan and his harem of Oriental beauties.

You see the loss of his four-year-old son at sea; of his terrible anger and melancholy that later makes him known as the Mad Sultan. Then into the picture comes Dragona, the witch, who will make evil descend upon the land and who plots to wreak the downfall of the dream-maiden.

8,000 Feet of Film

As soon as Director Brenon can reduce this film from 20,000 feet to 12,000 feet, it will be released to the public, for not until it reaches its 12,000 length can the musical score be adapted to the film and made to synchronize perfectly with the pictorial action.

As the great battleships are always christened before they start on their first voyage, so Mr. Brenon decided not to be outdone and last August when the million dollar spectacle was first started it was christened by little Katharine Lee, who taking her sister Jane by the hand, walked up to the tripod of the first camera set up and smashed a bottle of champagne on one of the legs supporting the instrument.

Five-Reel Fox Every Month

To boost exhibitors' summer business William Fox is planning to release one five-reel subject a month featuring his stars. This means that Theda Bara, Virginia Pearson, Mme. Bertha Kalich and William Farnum will have to stay hard at work all summer. Miss Pearson has recently been working under three directors in three five-reel features at the same time.

To the Fox Film Corporation was awarded the silver cup which was offered for the most novel and excellent booth at the Third International Exposition held in the Grand Central Palace, New York. John Zanft and his assistants who designed the booth felt well paid for their efforts.

Jose Collins, who starred in "Alone at Last," is claiming the honor of starting the fad for the high-cut boots. Her costmue in this play, in which she does some strenuous mountain climbing, included these high boots, and the ladies in the audience were so captivated by them that they immediately demanded their shoemaker produce some for them, and so helped to create the fashion.

Exhibitor Sues Express Company

Dr. J. L. Reich, of the Wagoner Amusement Company, of Wagoner, Oklahoma, has brought suit in justice court against the American Express Company for failure to deliver a shipment of Paramount films.

The amount of the film rental and estimated amount of the business loss sustained was $35.00.

The express company proposed to settle on a basis of film rental only, which was refused. It seems the case was clearly one of carelessness and oversight on the part of the express company, which has been in the habit of referring these claims to headquarters, thus deferring the settlements for months, then settling with the exhibitor on its own terms. Usually the exhibitor is glad to get his film rental, or nearly that amount. Often the exhibitor does not sustain a serious loss by the failure of a film delivery, as he usually has emergency reels on hand. But in the case of an advertised feature there should be some established basis of settlement.

L. W. Brophy, secretary of the Oklahoma branch of the M. P. E. L. of America, states that the Wagoner Amusement Company has asked the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Oklahoma to assist in making a test of this case. A conference is being arranged between the officers of the Exhibitors' League and representatives of the leading express companies of the state in an endeavor to arrive at an equitable basis of settlement for such claims out of court.

What Citizen Censors Approve

An unofficial motion picture censor board of Oak Park, Illinois, a suburb of Chicago, composed of Lloyd E. Peddicord, Mrs. C. C. Wilmot and Mrs. Charles Westcott, have submitted to all theater managers a set of rules to insure a higher grade of pictures. They ask that patronage be withheld from those who do not comply.

Wild western stuff with the free use of firearms, "eternal triangle" dramas, films showing drinking, card playing and cigaret smoking scenes; the "crook" plays, in which the officers of the law are circumvented, and slapstick comedy are eliminated. Clean plays of adventure or comedy; plays of home life, showing affection among members of the family; historical and travel films and kindred subjects are approved.

Gertrude McCoy, the Gaumont-Mutual star, was one of the exceptionally interested visitors at the recent motion picture exposition in New York.

AUDIENCE SEES FILMING

Portion of "Jess," Featuring Beatriz Michelena, Filmed in Theater by California Motion Picture Corporation—School Campaign Growing

The enactment of a motion picture play on a specially lighted theater stage for a screening on the same evening before the same audience which had seen it in the making is a decidedly new departure in motion picture affairs, but one that was worked to success

Scene from "Jess," parts of which the California Motion Picture Corporation filmed before the audience at the Tivoli Theater, San Francisco. Beatriz Michelena plays the leading role by the California Motion Picture Corporation at a monster benefit given for the preservation of the Fine Arts Palace on the Exposition grounds by the San Francisco Examiner.

This benefit, staged at the Tivoli Theater, boasted a notable galaxy of stars. De Wolf Hopper, May Robson, Fannie Brice, Trixie Friganzi are but a few of the many stellar lights that twinkled.

The feature of the evening was the motion picture "Jess," with Beatriz Michelena in the leading role. Several of the big climaxical scenes had been saved for production before the audience that jammed the theater, and these were hurried through the developer and printing machine and inserted in the reel for projection at the evening's end.

The interview which Beatriz Michelena, celebrated prima donna and motion picture star, had recently with Governor Hiram Johnson of California concerning official legislation against fake schools of motion picture acting has started what promises to be a really effective crusade against the profession's parasites.

The movement which Miss Michelena, with the promise of Governor Johnson's support, is furthering in California, will undoubtedly become nation wide. This is best indicated by the fact that the influential newspapers of practically every state in the Union have seized upon Miss Michelena's proposal for a commission regulating the alleged schools and are insisting upon its clauses for their own statute books.

Letters of inquiry about the proposed legislation are being addressed from every quarter to Miss Michelena at San Rafael, where she is now playing the leading role in a seven part film adaptation from C. N. and A. M. Williamson's "The Woman Who Dared." Some of these are from California legislators who are in sympathy with the movement, some from other states, and a great many from parties who have been victimized by the fake schools and wish advice as to legal recourse.

"Film Hospital" in New York

In room 1003 of the Candler building in New York is a unique institution—a film hospital. Edward Roskam is "house physician" and is always busy cutting or titling some single reel or feature production, closing printing contracts or selling negatives and positives on subjects for which he is the authorized selling agent.

Roskam, who is really one of the pioneers of the film industry, understands every branch of the business thoroughly and his expert services and advice is of great value to feature film producers or anyone contemplating entering the motion picture field.

Exhibitor Buys Special Screen

The Minusa Cine Products Company of St. Louis has received an order through Ludwig Hommel and Company, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for a specially constructed Minusa Gold Fiber Screen for Ira M. Owen, an exhibitor of Barnesville, Ohio.

Mr. Owen made a special trip to Pittsburgh to place this order, and while there had a consultation with Nat. I. Brown of the Minusa Company, in order to obtain a surface that would give him the desired results.

Mr. Owen is a very prominent exhibitor in his territory, and Minusa is greatly pleased to add him to its long list of satisfied customers.

American Films for South America

The Famous Players Film Company and Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company have just completed arrangements with the African Film Trust, Ltd., whereby the productions of these concerns will be handled in South Africa by the latter company. By the terms of this agreement all productions of these two companies made since their formation will be marketed through the African organization.

Photoplay Novices to Be Protected

To protect the thousands of young girls who come to Los Angeles to seek employment in the motion picture industry and to remove the source of the charges of immorality against the thousands of persons engaged in that industry, Judge White of the Woman's Court, Chief of Police Snively and Mrs. A. Gilbert of the City Mothers' Bureau, have appointed Anita King, Lasky star, as the head of a bureau to take special charge of these cases.

War Veterans Replace Operators

The operators in the five theaters of Calgary, Alta.—the Allen, the Monarch, the Bijou, the Princess and the Isis—went on a strike at 11 o'clock one Monday morning not long ago. It happened that a group of soldiers returned from Europe had been studying the operation of motion picture projectors with the idea of taking up the work as a means of livelihood. Within an hour the theaters were provided with "veteran" operators.

The Photoplay Scenario

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT
Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

NOTE—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of MOTOGRAPHY, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

The Followers of the Rubber Stamp

WE have just learned of a most interesting cult out on the coast with an all powerful High Priestess whose symbol will give her followers admittance to the Holy of Holies and an audience with the all-powerful Deity Himself.

Thus cult worships at the shrine of photoplay writing; the symbol of the High Priestess is a most prosaic and unethereal rubber stamp bearing the name of the founder of the cult; the followers are free-lance scenario writers; the Holy of Holies is the office of the scenario editor; and the all-powerful Deity is the Editor himself.

This High Priestess (real name deleted by the censors) teaches her followers that there is no chance for an amateur writer without some help from a higher power, and she has been especially endowed with this power. She claims that at first she was unable to sell any of her scenarios, nor could her followers, so she took the matter up with the scenario editors of various film companies and they explained to her that the reason for the non-sales was simply that the scenarios did not get to the right person, and thereafter if she would affix her rubber stamp symbol on all her work and that of the members of her cult the mark would carry the work past the readers and direct to the editor-in-chief. She also assures her fellow cultists that the readers actually—in spite of all the articles being written about nothing ever being stolen by the companies—sometimes do take the stuff. The companies never steal but the readers do. She argues that the plots in their crude state are no good and so the readers use them as the basis for other stories of their own.

In the list of Deities by whom this High Priestess is especially favored are the names of four of the largest film companies and the most influential men in those organizations (also cut out by the censors).

It is true that the human race is gregarious—they prefer to move in flocks or by tribes. There even seems to be in many a leaning toward the old patriarchy. They must have a leader to guide them, to rule them and establish their system for them. But it does seem in this age of enlightenment and intellectual development that most people would have more common sense and more individuality than to follow an elusive rubber stamp as a symbol of the divine inspiration of a writer. The members of this group evidently care nothing for the merit of their work, all they want is the money it may bring or the pleasure of seeing their name on the screen. They seem to have no pride in making their own name known and their own individuality recognized. They do not desire to know that they have won out above others, but simply to have a special dispensation of Providence which will give them what they want without any effort on their part.

Unfortunately this organization is not the only one of its kind in existence. We are constantly hearing of a person arising from the crowd and proclaiming leadership, and there always seems to be a number of gullible people ready to flock to their call. In the case cited the author loses his individuality entirely in that of the leader. It is a rubber stamp bearing the name and address of the leader which provides the open sesame to the editor's table. It is not the merit of the author's work, it is not the author's name, but the mark of the leader's name in the form of a rubber stamp.

It is natural and right that the young writer should desire to obtain help from someone who has had more experience than he, but that help can be given and at the same time the individuality of the author recognized and the merit of his work found and encouraged. Why sneak into the editor's office behind the skirts of someone else? Why not walk in with head up and establish your own individuality? Why let someone else claim all the glory of that which your brain has conceived? Cannot the young writer see behind this kind of leadership the seeking after personal aggrandizement or personal monetary gain?

This so-called High Priestess accuses the readers of stealing plots. Isn't she doing still worse in stealing individuality?

When the tyro awakens to the fact that there is no get-fame-quick road to success in scenario writing, that he must stand on his own feet, that it is merit alone which counts, then only will schemes of this kind be a thing of the past.

If you are not selling your plays make up your mind that the fault lies within yourself, that you lack merit in some respect. If your play is worthy of reaching the editor it will reach him, not because of a rubber stamp, but because of its own intrinsic merit. Your success will come to you because you deserve it, and your name will be recognized by the editors, and will be a pass-word denoting unusual merit, and will need none other.

Photoplaywrights Are Not Competent

JESSE L. LASKY, of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, voices the opinion of many when he says that the art of motion picture producing is not advancing but is almost at a standstill. But he goes a step further than the other critics and investigates to find out the reason for this. He goes right to the root of the situation and one by one eliminates the people who are responsible for the production of a photoplay and who are known to be doing the best kind of work. He finds the actors are doing splendid work, the cameramen are not to blame, the artists deserve words of praise rather than censure, and the directors can't be beaten, and are doing their full share toward advancing the art.

There remains but one factor to be considered, and that is you, Mr. Photoplaywright. Here, Mr. Lasky believes, lies the flaw in the industry. Here is the answer to the question, "Why is the art of motion picture production not advancing?" Mr. Lasky says:

The answer is in Shakespeare's famous line, "The play is the thing." As in the spoken drama, so it is with the moving drama, the play is always the thing, the foundation, the heart, the vitals, the very life of the motion picture drama.

And our dramatists, novelists, short story writers, scenarioists are not delivering real plays. They are writing manuscripts, yes, by the tens, hundreds, the thousands, but not 10 per cent are living, breathing, human interest stories, worthy of the name or of the noble effort the directors and associates are putting into this trash to make it possible of public presentation.

Therefore I say the motion picture dramatic art is at a standstill, as far as real progress is concerned, on account of the poorly constructed, quickly conceived stories or plays it is receiving from the majority of the authors who are writing for the screen. If the motion picture drama is to progress and strengthen the marvelous hold it already has on the affections of the public as a form of amusement, it will need better stories, far better stories, than it has been receiving of late.

The situation is critical. I need hardly refer to the unsatisfactory conditions prevailing in the industry at the present time; the need for better pictures is paramount. Yet the authors are not rising to the situation; they are not taking their work seriously enough. Mr. Dramatist conceives what he thinks is a good idea for a picture play and dashes it off in a week. It is sent to the hard-pressed producer and he, for lack of something better, and because release dates must be met, and expensive stars and stock companies get their salaries whether they are working or not, turns it over reluctantly and often apologetically to the director, who does his best, and our beloved art suffers.

This same Mr. Dramatist who writes his photoplay drama in a week is accustomed to spend from six months to a year, and often longer, in the writing of one play for the stage, and in this fact I think we have the root of the evil.

Our writers will not give the thought, take the time nor expend the energy necessary to write a really good play worthy of the name.

They complain that the reward is not enough, that they are not well enough paid. I am inclined to agree that they are not well enough paid, but they are receiving full value for the material they are at present turning out.

I predict that when our dramatists give us real plays, plays that will live on the screen and that the public will want to see more than once, the producers will gladly pay by outright purchase or royalties sums that will satisfy the most exacting demands of our greatest writers.

Plays of human interest, well motived, with well constructed plots and dramatic situations, characters that might have lived, doing things we could believe—good, honest, but clean melodrama—clean, wholesome comedies, with real plots and situation—these are the kind of plays we need, and not until we get them, and we need them by the score, yea, by the hundreds, will the great new art which has already advanced so far continue to progress until it takes first rank as the greatest of all arts, the place it is aiming for and the place it so well deserves.

Here is food for thought for the photoplaywright. You who have been complaining that if the film companies paid higher rates for work you would be willing to spend more time on your work, think of this from the other side. Is it not in your power to raise the prices paid by the film companies if you will give them plays which are worthy of larger compensation?

INTERNATIONAL INNOVATION

Pre-Showing of "The Mysteries of Myra" Arranged for Exhibitors and Press in New York and Chicago

An example of the Hearst policy of "service to the exhibitor," was given in the advance showing of the episodes of "The Mysteries of Myra," arranged in New York and Chicago by the International Film Service, Inc. Twenty-six hundred invitations were issued to the showing in New York, which was held in the New York Theater, and was one of the first of a series of feature entertainments to be inaugurated by the forces of the new Hearst company.

A large audience attended the advance showing of the fifth, sixth and seventh episodes at the Princess Theater in Chicago, and of the 903 exhibitors in attendance, 485 arranged contracts for the series. Much pleasure was added to the performance by a special musical program rendered by an orchestra under the direction of Warde Johnstone, whose services were rendered through the courtesy of the management of the Strand Theater.

J. K. Burger, assistant general manager of the International Film Service, made a special trip to Chicago to be present at this performance, and held an informal reception in the lobby of the theater following the exhibition.

Frank D. Stanton, manager of the Franklin Park Theater, Boston, filled his theater to its capacity through a unique method of advertising the "Mysteries of Myra." Suspended above the playhouse was a huge balloon kite with the title of the feature showing on all sides, and souvenirs in the form of toy balloons were distributed to all the children.

J. K. Burger, manager of exchanges, is responsible for the presentation to each of the branch managers of the International Film Service, Inc., of a loving cup in appreciation of their efforts in booking the "Mysteries of Myra," and to celebrate the great popularity of the serial which is attested by the fact that on release day it was stated to be thirty thousand dollars ahead of any previous photoplay series. The ten trophy cups were designed and manufactured by Black, Starr & Frost, New York city.

On International Day at the Motion Picture Board of Trade Exposition an unusual program was given. The inital episodes of "The Mysteries of Myra" were shown as well as split reel cartoons and comedies. A number of the stars were present, and Cartoonist George MacManus did a series of lightning cartoons. He was followed by George Herriman, Tom McNamara, Cliff Sterrett and Hal Coffman. Announcement was made of the winners of the new talent contest, who will receive positions acting for the International. The winners were Mary Cranston, Helene Montrose, Helen Raferty, Frieda Peterson, Julia Lorland and May Brown, all of New York City.

Harry Fox, of "Stop, Look and Listen" fame, will make his screen debut soon in a two-reel comedy entitled "The Gasoline Calloper." This is the first of a series of comedies in which Mr. Fox is to be starred on the International program. They will be called "What Happened to Harry." In the supporting company will appear Mabel Morrison, also from "Stop, Look and Listen," and Albert Riccardi. Cortland Van Deusen is directing the plays.

Estabrook Tells Experiences

When interviewed at the Wharton studios last week, Howard Estabrook, lead in "The Mysteries of Myra," told how he came to enter pictures. "I was in the far west and I needed quick money. An old friend worked me into a mob scene, in which the police were to raid a gambling house. They made me the 'lookout.' My business was to point out certain plays to the dealer and when the police broke in, to throw my chair out of the way and attempt escape. 'Now,' said the director just before the scene started, 'don't be afraid to throw your chair.'

"Swells in property dress suits drank champagne and gambled. Just then the police break in. Well—I jumped up and threw my chair out of the way and I 'wasn't afraid to throw it.' No sooner had the thing left my hand than a frightful crash rang out, and I knew that I had done some terrible thing. The only way I could figure, my chair must have landed in a bunch of dynamite and wrecked the studio. At last we were all hustled out by the police, and I had no trouble registering the disgust I felt at having broken up the party. As I was leaving the floor everybody was laughing and the director walked over to where my chair had landed in a huge basket of glassware. Something tinkled as he daintily lifted an unbroken champagne glass from the wreck with the remark, 'As I live, here's one that isn't broken.'

"I afterwards learned that my film debut had cost the company just eighty-five dollars for broken champagne glasses; a careless property man having left the basket right where I couldn't possibly miss it with my hurtling chair."

Frederick Warde, who is to star in a series of feature productions to appear on Mutual screens under the title of Thanhouser classics, is now at work on his first vehicle.

The picture of the Franklin Park Theater on the right shows how "The Mysteries of Myra" went on the day of release in Boston. In the center are the trophy cups awarded by J. K. Burger of the International Film Service to his branch exchange managers. At the left, the showing of "The Mysteries" to the trade and press at the Princess Theater in Chicago.

VITAGRAPH OFFICIALS NAMED

Albert E. Smith, President and J. Stuart Blackton, Vice-President and Secretary. Big Expansion Begins at Once

With the $25,000,000 recapitalization of the Vitagraph Company of America, Albert E. Smith is president and will devote himself wholly to the financial affairs of the company. J. Stuart Blackton will be vice-president and secretary. With the new order of things, Mr. Blackton will be in complete charge of all productions.

A great expansion in the scope and facilities of Vitagraph will take place at once. Several more producing companies will be put on and new directors and new stars engaged. Among those already engaged are E. H. Sothern, the great tragedian; Edna May, of the film success, "Salvation Joan"; Barney Bernard of "Potash and Perlmutter" fame; and Alice Joyce, who returns again to the films.

Larger accommodations are required at the Brooklyn studio and the building of additional quarters will commence at once. More equipment will be installed and day and night shifts run in the studios to permit of additional production.

The board of directors of the big new concern was chosen recently at a meeting at the New York V. L. S. E. offices. Three of the men chosen are prominent in the biggest financial circles of New York:—Herbert H. Vreeland, former president of the Metropolitan Street Railways; Benjamin B. Hampton, vice president of the American Tobacco Company, and Glendenning J. Ryan, son of Thomas Ryan, of 1 East Forty-fifth street. The other members of the new board are Albert E. Smith, president of the old Vitagraph Company; Commodore J. Stuart Blackton and Walter W. Irwin, general counsel for the enterprise.

When the corporation papers for the new enterprise were applied for it was referred to as the Smith-Blackton Company. However, at the last meeting the old Vitagraph company was merged with the new concern, and the old name automatically went over to it. The corporation therefore will be known as the Vitagraph Company of America.

Mr. Irwin will continue to act as the general manager and counsel for the company. He made the statement that none of the three new directors had ever before been interested in the film manufacturing field, and that their advent at this time was simply a financial move on their part—in other words an investment.

The new corporation will take over all the old company's plants—in Paris, London, Brooklyn, Bay Shore and Los Angeles.

Three Big Vitagraphs in Week

"The Big Four," as the V. L. S. E. is commonly called, has issued a special circular calling attention to three great Blue Ribbon features, namely: "Salvation Joan," with wonderfully popular Edna May, the former "Belle of New York," in the title role, which is in seven parts; "God's Country and the Woman," the picturization of the novel by James Oliver Curwood with the wonderful winter atmosphere of the Northwest; and "The Law Decides."

The first of the above is a special Blue Ribbon Feature while the two latter ones are the regular Blue Ribbon Features, but, if possible, of a little higher quality.

Each one is brimming with appeal and "punch," which every wide-awake exhibitor realizes is necessarily essential to his program in order to have it effective.

The fact that three features from Vitagraph should have thus been chosen to be "headliners," all in one week, is decidedly prophetic of the policy of "The Greater Vitagraph."

THANHOUSER HOUSE TALKS

Valkyrien, of the Royal Danish Ballet, Will Appear in Classics on Thanhouser Program—Other Notable Features

Valkyrien, formerly star of the Royal Danish Ballet, has just completed two feature plays of five reels each, "Hidden Valley" and "The Image Maker of Thebes," which will be part of the Thanhouser Classic program. Valkyrien has been in Florida for these productions, but is returning to the Thanhouser studio in New Rochelle, where she has been offered a two-years' contract by Edwin Thanhouser to be featured as his leading star in classic roles.

The first release of the new feature edition will be "The Fugitive," in which Florence La Badie is featured, supported by Ethyle Cooke, Hector Dion, George Marlo and Robert Vaughn. The play was written by Philip Lonergan and directed by Frederick Sullivan.

The second classic, to be released the end of June, will be "Hidden Valley," written by Emmet Mixx. In this Valkyrien (Baroness Dewitz) is featured, with Boyd Marshall her main support. The scenes of this play are laid in Africa, and Director Ernest Warde has done wonders in the way of local color in the film, which was made in Florida, and the manners and customs of the savage people are well managed.

Another five-reel release, which is not a classic, is "Other People's Money." This is an adaptation of Emil Gaboriau's story picturized by Lloyd Lonergan. Gladys Hulette takes the leading part and is assisted by Fraunie Fraunholt, J. H. Gilmour, Yale Benner and Kathryn Adams. William Parke directed the play and his legitimate experience was of great help to him in this, his first five-reel production.

The shorter releases introduce "A Flaw in the Evidence," "Brothers Equal," "John Brewster's Wife," and "The Window of Dreams," all two-reelers except the last, which is in three.

On June 17 will be issued the first of a series of comedies in which Riley Chamberlin stars as Conductor 786. The Oscar and Conrad edition, in which Claude Cooper and Frank E. McNish caper, will be released under the titles "Real Estaters," "Musickers" and "Romeoers."

Through an error the Thanhouser drama entitled "The Answer" was advertised as being in one reel instead of two. This production is the first release of Emmet Mixx, the short story writer, who has recently joined the Thanhouser scenario staff.

Eight Fine Arts directors are continually engaged in the directing of plays for the Triangle program. A large staff of scenario writers are under contract to supply these directors with stories. The studio is located at Hollywood, California.

Unique Ads for Billie Burke Film

Billie Burke's name is proving even a greater drawing card than the managers guessed when they booked "Gloria's Romance," the big new George Kleine motion picture novel from the pens of Mr. and Mrs. Rupert Hughes, in which Miss Burke is the featured star.

Trolley advertising at wholesale. The "Billie Burke Special," leased by the Piedmont Theater, Atlanta, Georgia, and operated over the tracks of the local railway company for two weeks.

May 22 was the date set for the general release of the picture throughout the entire United States and on this day and the day previous full page newspaper ads appeared in all the leading newspapers. As a result the public responded en masse and box office receipts soared.

All sorts and kinds of open air display advertising was done in various cities by the newspapers that are publishing the fiction version of "Gloria's Romance." In many big cities the delivery wagons of the newspapers were covered with bright colored banners announcing that "The Rupert Hughes novel 'Gloria's Romance,' starts next Sunday. Read it in the paper and see the film at the leading theaters." Down in Atlanta, Georgia, an even more unique method was taken of attracting the public's attention to the fact that Billie Burke was in town. A special street car, called "The Billie Burke Special," was leased from the Georgia Railway and Power Company and plastered with twenty-four sheets announcing Billie Burke's appearance at the Piedmont Theater. So lavishly was the paper used that nothing but the roof of the car and the trucks could be seen from the sidewalk. The rest of the display was all "Billie Burke" and "Gloria's Romance." The idea was hatched in the clever brain of Ralph de Bruler of the Piedmont Theater, and the Atlanta Journal ably co-operated in the display. The car traveled the tracks of the trolley line every day for two weeks and the Piedmont Theater has played to "S. R. O." business at every performance. A view of the car is given in the accompanying photograph. Some idea of the size of the throng that gathered before Ascher Brothers' President Theater, Fifty-fifth street and Calumet avenue, Chicago, can be obtained from a glimpse of the other picture, which seems to indicate that the tremendous business being done on "Gloria's Romance" is not all in the mind of the press agent.

Here's the way they answered the pull of the Billie Burke magnet at Ascher Brothers' President Theater, Chicago. The picture was taken on Tuesday night, May 23, the second day of the showing of Kleine's "Gloria's Romance."

A Really Fearless Film Star

Juanita Hansen, leading woman in "The Secret of the Submarine," is establishing a regular record for "almost" fatal accidents. The little leading lady has time after time successfully demonstrated her unusual daring and constant courage.

Recently while taking a scene she was required to hang on a grape vine over a most menacing quagmire. Although the vine gave no great evidence of its ability to hold her weight Miss Hansen hung grimly to her work until all but the last scene was taken when the vine suddenly snapped, precipitating the girl into the quicksand. Director Sargent rushed to her aid and the lasso which fell over her shoulders saved her from death.

Here are some stunts Miss Hansen has gone through in one week in the filming of "The Secret of the Submarine":

Remained within two minutes of certain death in a water-logged submarine (fainted when she later realized her danger).

Rode in a racing automobile when it leaped a thirty-five-foot gap in a bridge.

Dropped into a cellar with hands and feet bound when an exploding bomb wrecked the building. (Arm bruised.)

Stayed in a burning building while the walls tumbled down upon her, in order to get a "thrill close-up." (Dress caught fire.)

Rode in an aeroplane across a mountain chasm, the machine becoming uncontrollable and landing in a bunch of trees. (Face badly scratched and two fingers of left hand sprained.)

And despite this memorandum of exploits Miss Hansen is eager for more.

"Do I climb hand over hand on the cable stretched across the San Marcos canyon?" she asked Director Sargent the other day.

Informed that Tom Chatterton would have to undertake that hazardous task, she was quite disappointed.

"Then I am going to do it just for fun if I cannot do it for the picture," she announced. "There is nothing to a feature if it has not some out of the ordinary stunts in it, but these thrills must, of course, be connected with the plot logically and not tossed into the action just to make a person's spine kind of chill."

All the way through the big chaptered picture Miss Hansen, Mr. Chatterton, Miss Hollis, Mr. Johnstone and Mr. Tedmarsh are constantly involved in ever changing situations woven around thrills of the most stirring sort. These thrills punctuate a remarkably powerful story brimful of love, romance and adventure, enabling the specially engaged cast to develop the fullest measure of drama, picturing vividly the lights and shadows that come into the lives of those who search for "The Secret of the Submarine."

Farewell Feast for Lenore Ulrich

Representatives of the motion picture trade publications in New York and their friends were afforded a special opportunity of viewing the talents of Lenore Ulrich as displayed on the speaking stage in "The Heart of Wetona," recently when the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company tendered her a farewell party. The occasion marked one of the closing performances of this play which terminated a big season at the Lyceum theater on the following evening.

Leonore Ulrich, who has enjoyed a meteoric career.

Following her performance in "The Heart of Wetona," the guests were invited to dinner at the Hotel Wallick, where a sumptuous repast was served during the presentation of a midnight show given by the restaurant management. Upon conclusion of the show a surprise was affored the guest of honor and her friends when a spotlight was thrown upon a beautiful oil painting of Miss Ulrich which was placed in the honorary position on the stage. Toy balloons imprinted: "Lenore Ulrich, Oliver Morosco Photoplay Co." were distributed among all the diners present.

Everyone present was impressed with the unaffected charms of the "Little Sarah Bernhardt." That Lenore Ulrich has become a big favorite among patrons of both the screen and stage in New York, particularly during the past year, is fully evident. During her recent appearances in person at the Lyceum she has often played in competition with herself on the screen in "Kilmeny" and "The Heart of Paula," both films presenting her effective vehicles. From a Milwaukee school girl with twenty-five cents per week in pin money to a Broadway attraction, both on the scren and the stage is Miss Ulrich's record.

She will leave for her transcontinental trip to the Oliver Morosco studios immediately.

Among those present at her farewell party were: Mr. and Mrs. John Semler, Mr. and Mrs. Harold F. Rendall, Margorie N. Seagrave, Dickson G. Watts, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Blank, Des Moines; Mr. and Mrs. "Wid" Gunning, Estelle J. Murphy, Charles Condon, Pete Milne, C. P. Smancy, Bernard P. Fineman, Dave A. Levy, Margie Ganss, Pete Schmid, Julian M. Solomon, Jr., Irene Page Solomon, Mr. and Mrs. James Hoff, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Edwards, Wallace Thompson, Charles E. Moyer, Mr. and Mrs. Carl H. Pierce.

Several prominent stars were present to receive their admirers, including Mary Pickford, Anita Stewart, Pearl White, Mary Fuller, Jackie Saunders, Florence LaBadie and Buster Collier. The entire receipts on this day were added to the Actors' Fund.

The Grand Tribute performance held at the Metropolitan opera house was a great success and netted $9,000 for the cause. Every seat in the house was occupied and people were standing.

Another big event for the benefit of the cause will be held at the Rialto theater, New York city, starting on June 5 and lasting five days. The first two days will be motion-picture days with appearances of the most prominent screen favorites in costume of roles in which they are best known. Wednesday will be devoted to the appearance of leading actors and actresses of the stage, Thursday will be Musical Day, and Friday will be Allied Arts of the Theater Day.

Exhibitors Go In for Politics

Exhibitors can often take a hand in local politics to their advantage.

Chicago show men are coming out strong in support of Judge Fenimore Cooper, who is a candidate for re-election. The theater men are a unit in declaring he should be chosen for his office again on account of his loyal work for the films in rendering a favorable decision permitting the showing of "The Birth of a Nation" in Chicago.

Slides have been made boosting the judge as a friend of the picture people and will be shown in numerous theaters.

Theater Open Past Midnight

So anxious were the patrons of the Park View Theater in Brooklyn to see Mignon Anderson in person last week that they waited until after twelve o'clock for her appearance. She made a pretty little speech excusing herself for being tardy and two huge bouquets of roses were presented to her on behalf of Messrs. Thiele and Eichhorn, respectively proprietor and manager of the theater. After Miss Anderson left the theater, the film in which she was starring, "The City of Illusion," was run again and in spite of the late hour, almost the entire audience stayed through the rescreening of the play. So great was the crowd the management announced that they would hold over the film until the next day so that all might view it.

"SHERLOCK HOLMES" FACES LENS

Essanay Company Presents William Gillette, Powerful Figure of the Stage, Noted for His Detective Role

The name William Gillette is synonymous with Sherlock Holmes.

It immediately calls up a vision of a stage absolutely dark, with no action visible except that portrayed by the spark at the end of a burning cigar moving swiftly about.

While Gillette has since made many roles famous it was originally as Sherlock Holmes with his inevitable cigar, that he endeared himself to the public. When the news was published that he had signed a contract with the Essanay Company to give Sherlock Holmes to the public through the medium of the screen his admirers immediately began to wonder whether they would like him as a "film actor," whether it would be the same Gillette and same Sherlock Holmes who would come forth from the Essanay studios via the screen as the actor and play they had viewed on the stage.

But we are assured that they will be the same, for although this is Gillette's first venture into filmland he appears to be as perfectly at home before the camera as he was before the foot-lights, and has none of that shyness caused by the unfamiliar camera which so often besets even the veteran stage actors in their first work in the studio; and his sharp chiseled features, his aquiline nose photograph perfectly, while his large, mobile mouth and heavy eyebrows convey expression with extraordinary accuracy. Mr. Gillette's work before the camera is characterized by that same ease of manner and deliberateness of motion which marked his work on the legitimate stage. In other words he merges his personality into that of Sherlock Holmes so completely that he lives the part just as he always has done.

Mr. Gillette says, in speaking of his experience:

> It is natural for an actor to assume that playing for pictures requires that something more than stage portrayals must be supplied to offset the loss of the voice. But I am convinced that this is not so and that enacting Sherlock Holmes in the same manner as I would on the stage is entirely sufficient. Every act and expression is recorded so sharply in pictures, that I assume the spectator can carry the thread of the plot without missing the slightest detail.
> On the stage words forestall the chance that the audience may neglect an important point. In pictures the actor is brought closer, and the minor moves and expressions, frequently unnoticed on the stage, are fully apparent to the spectators.

Congratulations continue to pour in on George K. Spoor, president of Essanay, for obtaining Mr. Gillette. Not only is he being praised by business men for what they call a master stroke, but motion picture followers in America, England, and Australia write that they are anxiously awaiting an opportunity to see the famous stage plays in pictures.

Director Paul Powell is meeting with great difficulty in finding locations remote enough to enable him to work in absolute privacy on the new Fine Arts play. He has employed sentinels to keep watch while he is working, in case a stranger by chance might happen near at the time. The entire play, with the exception of one interior set, takes place in the open. Robert Harron and Wilfred Lucas play leading parts with Miss Marsh in her mysterious Triangle production. Director Powell's cinematographer is planning some unusual photographic effects in this Mae Marsh vehicle.

Clean Pictures the Great Demand

By William W. Hodkinson, President Paramount Pictures Corporation.

Good, clean and wholesome pictures; the best to be obtained from literature, art, science, travel and instructive matter are the great demand in the motion picture industry today.

It must be remembered that the motion picture is the psychological fulfillment of a human demand, which has, by reason of its rapid advancement, brought to bear upon the whole world, from which the industry draws its material, and particularly upon producers, distributors and theater owners, an absolute demand, a demand that has been the means of advancing the industry more than any other phase that has entered into it.

This demand in a few words is, clean pictures.

Clean pictures where quality appeals to people who demand the best.

Clean pictures that are representative of the desires and higher ideals of the great amusement-loving American people.

Clean pictures conducive to better theaters, those that will be in conformity with the standard and quality of their entertainment.

Clean pictures that will be the means of perpetuating and strengthening the wonderful qualifications of the fourth greatest industry of the United States.

Our Paramount business was founded upon those ideals. Our records have proved the soudness of our fundamentals.

Film Editorials Fight Censorship

The Fine Arts studio, which a number of months ago introduced the idea of presenting censorship editorials on its film productions, has decided to continue doing so, until the American public begins to realize that the continuance of motion picture censorship is a restriction of liberty, in addition to being detrimental to the successful film production.

The De Wolf Hopper play, "Mr. Goode, the Samaritan," carries the following censorship argument:

"Censorship is absolutely against public policy, against the spirit of the Constitution, against the very life and essence of true American and democratic ideas."

Proof that the censorship executives fear the solicitation of the public by the film manufacturers, in their strenuous fight for the abolishing of any form of motion picture censoring, was evidenced recently in the state of Pennsylvania, when the censor board ordered the elimination of a Fine Arts censorship editorial.

Exhibitors and exchanges have been writing in to the Signal Film Corporation very plentifully for the past weeks asking for a continuance of "The Girl and the Game" series, which has so successfully featured Helen Holmes. The latter, however, with the rest of the Signal Company, has been busy with the new feature "Whispering Smith."

Censoring the Censors

WHAT IS BEING DONE BY AND TO THE FILM REVIEWERS

Editor Attacks Kansas Censor

R. R. Booth, manager Paramount Theater, Nebraska City, Nebraska, sends us a copy of a very toxic editorial on censorship in Kansas, published in the Nebraska Daily Press, Nebraska City. This editorial attack was instigated by the censor of moving pictures in Kansas recommending that all scenes showing the use of tobacco be cut out as such scenes have a tendency to corrupt the morals of the youth. The editor satirically suggests that the said censor should "cut out all scenes which show a representative of the Holy Bible—for the reason that the Good Book contains words and descriptions which might bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the budding maiden; he will have the women cover up their faces, for the reason that in Turkey it is immodest for a woman to uncover her phiz in public; he will have all statuary draped, for is it not understood that the naked human body, either real or simulated, is a mark of indecency? He will go a step farther and require the actors to portray their art clad in bloomers, for the human form, clothed or unclothed, is quite likely to have a depressing effect on certain members of the audience who cannot look at bald-heads or bow-legs without a tinge of sadness and vain regrets. He will, if he does his duty, stop the publication of newspapers, the transportation of hardware (stoves) with uncovered legs, the uttering of speech in any form for fear the voice may slip and, by transposing sounds, utter some obscenity or profane thing. This self-centered moralist who has been chosen to say what is good or what is bad in Kansas ought to jump on to Uncle Walt Mason and make him revise some of his poetry because its feet are naked and unashamed. He ought to make William Allen White cover up his bald spot for fear some spinster lady may suddenly become stricken with angina pectoris."

Decatur Fights Censorship

The Federated Mothers' Clubs of Decatur, Ill., have requested censorship of the films shown in that city. In an ordinance presented to the City Council to meet the organized resistance of the exhibitors. Mayor Dineen is not in favor of this ordinance as he does not think the situation in Decatur warrants its passage.

The motion picture theater managers have organized under the name of the Exhibitors' League and Theatrical Managers' Association of Decatur and have elected officers as follows:

President, Ray Colvin, Orpheum Theater; vice president, Daniel Higgins, Paris Theater; secretary, Charles Dorgan, Strand Theater, and treasurer, Mrs. E. Striewing, Crystal Theater.

Stronger Censorship Requested

At a recent convention of the Kansas state bankers a protest was made against films which depict bankers in a wrong light, showing them robbing their banks, falling in love with pretty stenographers and running away with them. The bankers protested that they did not do these things in real life and they should not be allowed to be shown on the screen as it is detrimental to their business. After a spirited discussion on the motion picture and the evils of too liberal censorship, the following resolution was drawn up:

"That we are dissatisfied with the censorship law, because it does not provide strict enough censorship, and recommend to the members of the legislature who are members of this organization, that they work in the coming legislative session in order that objectionable pictures may be not shown in Kansas."

This resolution was passed without a dissenting vote.

Ohio May Bar Sunday Shows

As the result of a ruling by the Ohio Supreme Court motion picture shows may be barred on Sunday. The court held that film shows are "theatrical performances," and are therefore forbidden by the Sunday closing laws. The court's action came in the form of a refusal to review the prosecution started against Clarence Myers, Chillicothe theater owner. Myers was convicted of violating the state law but claimed that his show was a biblical picture, put on without actors, scenery or music, and for that reason did not come within the law.

Canadians Plan New Censor Board

An inter-provincial censor board is being planned for Saskatchewan and Manitoba, beginning June 1. Heretofore the censoring for these provinces has been in the hands of the government of the city of Winnipeg. At the same time an inspector and examiners will be appointed by the officials of Manitoba with a view to the establishment of a new system of inspection of theater buildings and examination of employes.

Important Films Imported

Harry Rowson, general manager of the Ideal Film Company of London, is the first European film manufacturer to see the value in adapting well-known plays and well-known fiction to the screen, as well as using the notable actors and actresses in the cast. Mr. Rowson reports that he had many difficulties to overcome in persuading the rest of the English manufacturers that the old fashioned film story was all that was needed to please the public.

Mr. Rowson is now in America and he has brought some very interesting films with him. They are "Caste," with Sir John Hare and Peggy Hyland; "The Great Adventure," with Henry Ainley and Esme Hubbard; "Still Waters Run Deep," with Lady Tree, the wife of Sir Herbert Tree; "The Fallen Star," with Albert Chevalier, which is a version of his monologues; "and "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," with Sir George Alexander and Hilda Moore.

"The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" is especially interesting as it was made under the personal supervision of the author of the original play. Sir Arthur Pinero and Miss Moore, who takes the leading part, is a niece of the playwright.

Earle Williams, the popular Vitagraph star, is still having numerous experiences in the C. N. and A. M. Williamson story which Wally Van has well under way. It will be released in fifteen episodes—one episode a week.

"The Mysteries of Myra"

Fourth and Fifth Episodes of International Film Service Serial. Reviewed by George W. Graves has the advantage of a cast practically made to order and a story, despite what the specator may not believe about spirits and the occult, that is highly entertaining. Both the fourth and fifth episodes reveal some surprising situations which make for genuine interest, but the last few scenes of the fifth episode make the spectator pine for knowledge of what is to follow.

In episode four, Dr. Alden (Howard Estabrook), with the help of his Hindu colleague, gains access to the underground home of the Black Order and escapes only after the effort has been made to bury him alive for trespassing upon their secrecy. Simultaneous with his death, the Grand Master informs Dr. Alden Myra will die also. Vernay, working in the interests of the Black Order in the face of his love for Myra, informs the Grand Master of the imminent danger and the latter blocks up two of the secret entrances to his domain. Dr. Alden's Hindu helper, discovered by the order to be a traitor, meets with a horrible death.

Myra receives a letter from the Black Order telling her that on its receipt Payson Alden will be dead. She begs Varney to hypnotize her so that her astral body be released and perhaps be of aid to Dr. Alden. To meet his own evil purposes, the Black Master hypnotizes himself and his astral body departs from him at the same time as Myra's. As a result of this mental contest, when Myra and the Grand Master awake from their hypnotic state, each is possessed of the other's soul. The wicked spirit of the Grand Master shows itself in Myra when she makes an unsuccessful attempt upon the life of Dr. Alden. The latter realizes what has happened, but his explanations fall upon deaf ears.

"The Man From Manhattan"

American Mutual Masterpicture Released May 29. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

SO MANY very fine stories have appeared in fiction, woven about the newspaper office of a small town, that one's expectations are aroused by the theme of this story. A broker's son who writes poetry, put on his own resources by his father, who cannot sympathize with literary tendencies, buys a bankrupt newspaper in a small town and proceeds to bring it to life. The theme suggests delightful possibilities for showing life in a rural community and its gradual awakening under the leadership of a progressive city man. Some of these possibilities are utilized in this story, and audiences will appreciate them.

However, for its plot, the play makes use of material which becomes so melodramatic that the character of the offering is changed from a "human interest" story to more conventional "thriller." It will perhaps be liked as well as the quiet tale it suggests, but by a different class of audience.

There is certainly enough excitement in the play, especially that furnished by the fire scenes in which the old printer is killed. There is no last minute rescue in this story, which is an unusual point. The printer, caught in the building, crawls into a vault and is smothered to death. Before he dies he writes on the wall a statement which later clears the hero of an unjust accusation.

William Stowell is well cast as the hero, Willoughby Whipple, the man from Manhattan. He is disappointed in the paper he has bought, but with the aid of Daddy Eggleston, a tramp printer (Perry Banks), sets about putting it on its feet. A spring poem submitted by one of the girls of the town, Virginia Winters (Rhea Mitchell) leads to her appointment as associate editor, and romance enters the story.

Trouble begins when the newspaper attacks Squire Benjamin Barton (Jack Prescott), an unscrupulous candidate for the office of mayor of the town. The candidate owns the building used as the newspaper office, and he at once turns the concern out. They continue to publish the paper, in a tent, still combating the corrupt politicians.

Squire Barton sets fire to his own building, intending to blame Whipple for the deed. But "Daddy" Eggleston, the old printer, coming home bewildered after a "spree," wanders back to the old office and sees Barton set fire to the building. Barton, although he sees the old man, does not rescue him, but leaves him to be burned. The man crawls into the vault, where he dies, after writing his message on the wall.

Whipple, accused of the deed, is about to be punished by the excitable townspeople, when the message is discovered and the populace, finding him innocent, decides to make him mayor. So that when his father, called by a telegram from Virginia, arrives to save his son from mob violence, he finds him the hero of the day. Then, as a token of his new regard for his son's ability, he offers to build him a fine newspaper office as a wedding present, for Whipple is to marry his associate editor.

While much of the story lacks plausibility, it holds the interest and is clear. The photography is very good. The leading players are acceptable, although the villains in the play and many of the town characters are overdrawn. The cast includes Charles Wheelock, Jo Taylor, Warren Ellsworth, Otto Nelson, George Baily, Harry Edmonson and William Tedmarsh.

"Fate's Boomerang"

A Five-Part World-Paragon Feature. Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman

ANYONE who loves nature is going to love this picture, because it abounds in wild life and scenery and glorious backgrounds that extend for miles and miles into the dim distance. The freshness of the mountain forests seems to breathe its very fragrance out of the screen, and one can almost hear the ripple of the waterfalls and rapids that frequently appear in the many beautiful scenes.

It is a picture of strong contrasts, part of it being laid in the rugged Carolina mountains, and part of it having to do with the luxury of New York's idle society women and men, who make a fine art of self-indulgence. It is a story showing a husband and wife separated for business reasons. He is sent to the south to take charge of a large railroad construction work. She refuses to go with him because she prefers the society life of New York.

While they are separated, the husband meets a mountain maid and falls in love with her. At the same time, his wife is having a heavy love affair in New York with a society man. In the end she loses her life by falling over a precipice in North Carolina while in quest of some evidence against her husband which will obtain for her a divorce.

With this production, a new leading man is introduced to the World Film constellation. This new leading man is Charles Gotthold, and he is a worthy addition to the already distinguished list. In general appearance he is not unlike Sir Johnson Forbes-Robertson, although he is very much younger. He resembles Forbes-Robertson when the latter was around thirty years of age. Mollie King is the featured lead in this production, and her beauty and care-free ways, combined with the beauty of the scenery, give her mountain girl character a touch of exhilarating realism. Miss King has always appeared to unusually good advantage as a mountain girl. In this picture she is more than usually charming as a child of nature, a mountain girl saturated with the glory of the beautiful hills in which she grew.

A word of praise should be said in favor of the work done by Harry Redding as the skulking mountain degenerate. The type of man he played is a type that is occasionally found in the southern mountain regions; a type of man who loves to kill things, one who finds a great pleasure in watching some creature die. In this part Mr. Redding was altogether convincing, and the fidelity of his work will be astonishingly real to those who know the character. On the whole, his work was extremely artistic in a part that might have been less effective in less capable hands.

There was some very good acting all the way through, all of the players being about on a par as to ability. This goes for June Elvidge and Frank Goldsmith particularly, they having done some very smooth work as the guilty pair of society lovers.

The picture contains a number of thrilling accidents, such as the runaway scene in which the selfish wife plunges over the precipice to her death below. There is also another genuine fall down the side of a mountain for a considerable distance. Also there is a dynamite explosion which ought to cause almost anyone to sit up and take notice. As a feature it ranks along with the standard the Paragon studio has been maintaining for some time past. They have been doing some good features lately, and this is one of them.

"Who's Guilty?"

Third and Fourth Releases in Pathe-Arrow Series. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

NOW that one has become accustomed to the swift movement of plot which has thus far been a characteristic of the "Who's Guilty?" plays, other admirable phases which hitherto had only received passing notice impress themselves upon the spectator. The third and fourth releases serve to bring to mind the fact that this series is notable also for the high standard of acting being rendered by Anna Nilsson and Tom Moore and the splendidly chosen supporting cast.

"The Tangled Web" and "The Silent Shame," the third and fourth issues, respectively, give the leading players, especially Miss Nilsson, acting opportunities which are utilized remarkably well. In the third release Miss Nilsson is seen as a not faultless young woman who is tricked by a socially ambitious guardian into becoming the wife of a man she does not love, and the fourth play shows her as the victim of the marriage and divorce laws. Both characters permit her to give expression to the ability she possesses, and it is a true ability which manifests itself.

These two stories also afford Tom Moore with some occasions for effective acting, and the other players in these pictures give commendable performances.

"The Tangled Web" presents a number of highly dramatic situations. The story tells of a young woman whose love for an impecunious young man is distasteful to her frivolous guardian. The guardian and a wealthy broker succeed in separating the girl and her fiance. He goes to Europe, and upon returning finds that Ruth is now his employer's wife. When Ruth learns that she has been tricked, she is bent upon revenge. She urges Blair to use his knowledge of her husband's business affairs to wreck him financially. This is done, but it turns out to be the means of destruction of both Ruth and Blair. Kendrick, half crazed, shoots and kills them as they are about to elope.

In "The Silent Shame" the domestic triangle is also the basis of the play. A neglected wife leaves the man who treats her with such cruelty and marries a sympathetic playwright. The husband, more for the purposes of the play than anything else, it seems, so arranges the divorce proceedings that it will appear as though she were free, whereas in reality she is not. Later when he needs capital, the husband returns and demands her inheritance. In this way Eunice and Bruce are parted. Years elapse. Bruce meets Eunice's daughter, who is now a famous actress, and they are married. When Eunice again meets Bruce, he is the husband of her daughter by Hilliard, so there is nothing for her to do but remain as one apart and alone. The play ends tragically.

The direction and production of the plays are up to the mark set in the first two releases, which is to say that one can find only praise for both. Of the two stories, "The Tangled Web" is the better. "The Silent Shame" holds the interest admirably, but the climax is not as strong dramatically nor the ending as convincing as in the case of the third offering in the series.

Besides Anna Nilsson and Tom Moore, the players who distinguish themselves in these pictures are: Arthur Donaldson, Dewards Davis, Paula Shay, Helen Tracy, Joel Day and Joseph Clark.

Winnifred Greenwood plays Dorothy Baird, the detective, in this entertaining play by Edward L. Hungerford, while Edward Coxen is Martin Gale, the chief of the detective agency. Dorothy is assigned to watch the gifts at a birthday party given for a society girl. Among the guests is James Vallon (George Field), a clever thief. During the evening a valuable necklace is stolen, but Dorothy does not suspect Vallon.

Later Dorothy gets evidence against two crooks who are working under Vallon's direction, and in attempting to follow them, falls into a trap. They take har, a captive, to their rendezvous, where she is astonished to meet Vallon. In the meantime others of the band, robbing a jewelry store, are captured by Gale and his aids. A revolver which Gale had given Dorothy is found in their possession and one of the men confesses the plot against her. Vallon, who has been drinking, attempts to take advantage of Dorothy's defenselessness, but Gale arrives in time to protect her.

The story is effectively presented, and holds the interest throughout. The cast of players is good and the photography is pleasing. In the cast are Jack Farrell, George Armstrong, Meta Drinkwitz and Anna Morrison. Thomas Ricketts directed the production.

"The Secret of the Submarine"

Chapter Four of the American Mutual Serial. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

CHAPTER four of this "Flying A" serial is quite up to the standard set by the preceding installments in action, story and photography. It deals with the further attempt of Cleo Burke, the inventor's daughter (Juanita Hansen), and Lieutenant Hope (Thomas Chatterton) to recover the books sold at auction, which, too late, were found to contain the "secret of the submarine." The inventor had concealed the cipher code in one of the books, the key to it in another. The list of buyers of the books had apparently been destroyed at the close of chapter three.

When chapter four opens, Cleo and Hope learn from Dawson, who had sold the books at auction, that he still has the original list and that he had given a copy to Satsuma, the Jap spy. The first name on the list of buyers is Stephansky, a Russian bomb maker. Cleo and Hope, Satsuma, Olga, the Russian adventuress, and Morton, the American millionaire, all seek out Stephansky. Olga's automobile is wrecked on the way, and she is aided by Morton. Discovering their common goal, Olga and Morton agree to work together.

When Olga and Stephansky meet, they recognize each other as members of a secret society. Unable to discover the secret in the book which Stephansky bought, they plan to force Cleo to tell, when she returns. Cleo does not wait for Hope, but goes to Stephansky's alone that evening. There she is made a prisoner. Hope and "Hook" Barnacle, the old sailor, go in search of her and have a struggle with her jailors. During the battle, a bomb is thrown into the cellar where Cleo is held, and explodes, wrecking the house.

There are a number of spectacular scenes in this episode. The automobile collision is effectively presented. A flash-back repeats the leap of an automobile across a broken bridge, which was a feature of one of the earlier episodes. The story is interesting and is progressing well.

"The Iron Claw"

Episode Thirteen of the Pathe Serial. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE common bond existing between the followers of the popular "Iron Claw" serial and Margery Golden, which resulted from the curiosity on the part of both as to just exactly who the Laughing Mask is, has been broken. In the thirteenth episode, Margery learns the identity of the mysterious righter of wrongs, but the spectator does not. Of course, there will be no decrease in the "Iron Claw" fan's interest in Margery on this account; only your fan will expect Margery to help him to a solution of the mystery, and unless Margery turns out to be the single rule breaker, we feel that she will do that very thing. We are not of the opinion that a secret can be a secret very long after it has come into the possession of a woman. If in this we are wrong, we will thank the "Iron Claw" for putting us on the right track.

"The Hidden Face" as an entertainer is typical of this serial. In the episode there are the puzzling appearances and disappearances, the quick action and the thrilling scenes in which the Laughing Mask and Legar match cunning and physical daring. Its two reels are interesting as usual, and as usual they present many striking examples of craftsmanship in production. The interior scenes of the Golden home continue to please, and the photography is up to standard, while the acting of Pearl White, Sheldon Lewis and the impersonator of the Laughing Mask loses nothing as time goes on.

Though the death of Davy was intimated in a previous episode, the Mask visits Margery and comforts her greatly by telling her that the secretary may still live. An accomplice of the Iron Claw informs the police that the mysterious person they seek is in the house, and they attempt to capture him, but not successfully. The foe of evildoers tries to spy upon Legar. He is trapped and the mask removed from his face, but further disguise prevents both Legar and the spectator from making out the true identity of the Laughing Mask. Legar discovers a ring on the finger of the captive which interests him. This he sends with the maid to Golden, demanding the confession which Golden holds over the head of the Iron Claw.

The Mask is locked in a closet, and by cutting the electric light wires he is enabled to signal for help. The hotel detectives come to his aid, and all reach the Golden home in time to keep the important paper from reaching Legar. Then, at the maid's suggestion, the detectives turn on the Mask. He makes his way to Margery's room and she promises to hid him if he will show his face. Turning his back to the absorbed spectator, the righter of wrongs removes his mask and the second mask. Margery expresses gleeful surprise and the picture fades at this point.

"The Release of Dan Forbes"

Two-Reel "Flying A" Drama Released May 29. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A VERY human appeal has been given this play by the sincere acting of Helene Rosson and William Stowell. They hold the sympathy throughout the picture, and this is most important, since the story itself is not remarkable. William Stowell appears as Dan Forbes, a convict near the end of his prison term. Miss Rosson plays his wife, Alice, who supports herself by work in a department store during her husband's absence.

Harry Von Meyer is the villain in the play, Piper Stark, who is very relentless in his pursuit of Alice and tries to shake her faith in her husband. His villainy is not so very convincing—unrelieved wickedness seldom is—but his reformation after he has received a good beating is believable.

Dan Forbes, released from prison before the end of his term because of good behavior, returns to the city where Alice lives. While waiting until she has finished her day's work in the store, Dan wanders into a saloon just in time to witness a murder. The real murderer escapes, and since the victim was an enemy of his, Dan is accused of the murder. Piper Stark, unknown to anyone, had also witnessed the affair, but he does not reveal his knowledge.

He shows the newspaper account of the affair to Alice, believing that it will destroy her love for Dan. But Dan returns, and learning Piper's intentions, gives him a thorough beating. When the police arrive, Piper announces his knowledge that Dan is innocent of the crime with which he is charged, and the story ends happily for Dan and Alice.

The play is handled in a way to capture and hold the sympathy and attention of an average audience.

Three-Reel Essanay Drama Released May 27. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A MERRY little comedy which, while not slapstick, still depends more on "business" and improbable situations for its humor than on plot, is this Essanay release on the General program. It will without doubt prove very amusing to most audiences. John Junior and Harry Dunkinson are the leading comedians and they are well contrasted. They play the roles of two irresponsible young chaps, Roy Jones and Bill Barton, who are expelled from college and go into business for themselves. Their first effort is with a grocery store in a small town. After having a rather appalling time trying to run it, they sell out, and with the money rent an office and become stock brokers.

At this point, Elizabeth Burbridge enters the story, as their stenographer. The boys play fast and loose with business, but by luck get hold of a "good thing." To avoid their creditors, they run away to a fashionable resort and with their remaining funds pose as a millionaire and his secretary. Bill Barton (Harry Dunkinson), as the man of wealth, makes love to a supposedly rich girl, who is really a fortune hunter. The lovers elope, with the help of the mother, and later each confesses and forgives the other's pretense.

At the office the stenographer bravely defies all enemies and manages business better than the boys did. At last their "good thing" turns out even better than expectations. They make a lot of money and also convince their fathers of their business ability. The formerly "indifferent" father of Roy goes into partnership with the young men, while Roy and the stenographer begin a life partnership of another sort.

As a whole, the offering is pleasing and fulfills its primary purpose of furnishing a light, whimsical entertainment. The subtitles are in keeping with the spirit of the tale; the cast of players is very acceptable and the photography is fine.

"The Hare and the Tortoise"

Selig Three-Reel Drama Released May 29. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE analogy between the fabled race of the hare and the tortoise and the careers of two brothers adds decidedly to the interest of this offering. As an introduction, there is a short scene of the animal contestants, and various little cut-in scenes throughout the story recall the theme of the play. This embroidery is very effective in presenting a simple story which progresses straight forward without much complication. As a program offering, this three-reel is very acceptable.

Even at college, Sidney Drake prefers pleasure to labor, while his brother, John, shuns frivolity and devotes his time to study. Sidney, although he indulges his taste for liquor, is still the star player of the football team (whose training rules were apparently slack), and is a hero in the eyes of Marion Lee (Fritzi Brunette), whom John secretly loves.

After college, John goes to work as a laborer in his father's steel mills, which gives opportunity for the introduction of a number of interesting scenes in this industry. Sidney, however, continues his life of idleness, a fact which gives Marion occasion for some thought, and she finds her admiration shifting from Sidney to his brother. After their father's death, John inherits the steel mills, while Sidney is given his share of the estate in money, which he proceeds to gamble away on the stock market. The hare is beginning to lose out in the race. At the end, the real character of Sidney is revealed to Marion, and her love is given to John.

The role of John, the "tortoise," is especially well played by Harry Mastayer, while Edward J. Piel makes Sidney an effective contrast. Fritzi Brunette is a very charming heroine. The balance of the cast includes Harry Lonsdale, Lillian Hayward, Edith Johnson and William Scott. William Robert Daly directed the play from a story by William Anthony McGuire.

"Sweet Kitty Bellairs"

Mae Murray the Star of Lasky-Paramount Release. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE beauty of settings, groups, lights and shadows so characteristic of pictures produced at the Lasky studio were never put to better use than in this picturization of the David Belasco-Egerton Castle play, "Sweet Kitty Bellairs." In praising the production given the play we will go so far as to compare it in the pleasure it affords to the winsomeness of Mae Murray, who is an overwhelmingly sweet and fascinating Mistress Bellairs.

"Sweet Kitty Bellairs" is a very delightful screen entertainment. The story, of itself quite innocuous, finds its way to one's heart through eyes that open wide in response to the engaging charms of Mae Murray and pictures so handsomely composed. Costume plays we find very pleasant subjects for photoplay offerings, on condition, of coure, that they be well presented, and "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" is particularly well presented. Pictorial beauty was the mark at which the director aimed, and the desired goal has been attained. It is not only that each scene is beautiful, but each scene marks an advance in the process of building an illusion which grows stronger and more complete as the film is unreeled.

James Young adapted and produced "Sweet Kitty Bellairs," and it must be added to the long list of successes produced by this director. "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" is the story of a strikingly beautiful Irish maid who is not unconscious of her attractiveness, and the action is laid in England in the eighteenth century. Mistress Kitty advises her friend, Lady Julia, who is much troubled because of her husband's infatuation for Lady Barbara Flyte, and her advice leads to the complications which cause a scandal involving Kitty and Lieutenant Verney. The true state of affairs finally comes to light and Kitty promises to marry Verney.

Mae Murray in "Sweet Kitty Bellairs."

Mae Murray rises to the heights of a real picture star as Kitty. Her Mistress Bellairs is an alluring coquette with not a trace of affectation. Self-reliant she is, but neither forward nor retiring, she ensnares her audience quite as positively as she does Lieutenant Verney. The play makes this character a lovable one and Miss Murray carries things further; she makes Kitty Bellairs captivating.

Tom Forman, Belle Bennett, Lucille Young, James Neill, Robert Gray and Horace B. Carpenter give a good character of support to the star. "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" is a sparkling screen romance and we hasten to recommend it as pleasant entertainment.

"Going Straight"

Triangle-Fine Arts Offering Is Finely Produced and Acted. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

NORMA TALMADGE, whose restrained yet colorful acting we always enjoy, and a supporting cast which includes Ralph Lewis and Eugene Pallette, do a great deal toward making "Going Straight" a picture that will please. Others responsible for the appeal this offering is capable of are C. M. and S. A. Franklin, who produced a story telling of the man and his wife who are hard put in the endeavor to live down the lurid past, in a manner to bring to the fore all the interest-compelling possibilities contained in this melodrama.

Eugene Pallette and Ralph Lewis in the new Norma Talmadge play, "Going Straight."

Miss Talmadge is again the young mother, and once more she is appealing in the role. Ralph Lewis makes Remington as convincing as possible under the circumstances, and Eugene Pallette is a vicious, drink-soaked villain. These three players deserve praise for their portrayal of characters with which the story presents them. Kate Toncray and the Fine Arts children complete the cast.

With the freshness of spring and the warming rays of an unclouded sun all about one, one hates to find fault. As this is being written these delightful conditions prevail, and as a consequence all reference to the story's logic and its claim to one's admiration as a play for visualization in five reels will be here avoided.

In the opening scene John Remington and his wife are discovered in their comfortable home. While glancing through a book, Remington comes across a newspaper clipping giving details of the trial of a notorious band of crooks. Both Remington and his wife then review the past. He was the leader of the band and Grace was one of his assistants. Remington was arrested and sent to prison for three years, but Grace escaped. After serving his term, he resolved to go straight, mostly because of the child born to Grace during his stay in prison.

Remington is now fairly prosperous and he lives in the respect of his associates and neighbors. One of the band, who is still a crook, discovers this and he at once starts to blackmail the former leader. Then he insists that Remington return to the old life for just one job, threatening the while to give evidence which will send Grace to prison. Remington hesitates long, but finally decides to do the job. On the night of the proposed robbery Grace takes the children to visit a friend, and, of course, the friend's house is the very one chosen by Briggs to be robbed. Briggs is defeated in his scheme by Remington, yet he does not squeal. Instead, he attempts to shoot the reformed crook. The result is that Briggs is killed and the Remingtons are safe, unless some other member of the band turns up.

The settings used in the production of this story are splendid. The fight in the crook's den and the chase through alleys, across back yards and over roof tops is done well enough to be interesting, which is a compliment to the Franklins, who, with some able assistance from the players, have made "Going Straight" a melodrama that at no stage of its development fails to hold the spectator interested.

"A Dash of Courage"

Triangle-Keystone Released May 7. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"A DASH OF COURAGE" tells amusingly the story of a silk-hatted crook's adventures in a small town where he is received with open arms by the villagers, who think him a duly authorized collector for the police pension fund. Harry Gribbon is the crook, who, living up to the best traditions of the melodramatic villain, wins the affections of the heiress, thus incurring the enmity of a youth of the town.

Undoubtedly the incidents in the mad chase for the crooks who attempt to make a get-away in the police patrol flivver are the surest laugh provokers of any in the picture, but previous to this dash, which comes at the end of the show, one finds many really humorous moments, and the picture tells a story that is always interesting; in fact, a story with such continuity as this one has is quite unusual in farce of the Keystone type.

Harry Gribbon in the leading role wins the acting honors, but the others in the cast are not far outdistanced. Gloria Swanson is much in the foreground as the heiress, and Wallace Beery is a good police captain for the purposes of comedy. William Mason and Guy Woodward are also commendable, while the leader of the police band, whose name is not to be found in the cast, adds somewhat to the general fun this picture contains. "A Dash of Courage" reaches the standard of a good Keystone offering.

"Gloria's Romance"

"A Perilous Love." Part Three of the George Kleine Film Novel. Reviewed by G. Harris

CHAPTER three of this serial, written by Mr. and Mrs. Rupert Hughes, shows Gloria Stafford growing up, and it is in some respects the most interesting installment so far. While the first two chapters had dealt with an episode in Gloria's life as a little girl at Palm Beach, and had covered only the space of time of a few days, chapter three takes us over five years. The thread of the story is becoming more clear. The serial is developing very much as a novel does, and it is less a succession of episodes than the usual film serial.

Gloria, in chapter two, had an adventure with the Seminole Indians in the Everglades of Florida. Dr. Royce (Henry Kolker) rescued her, but credit for the deed was given to Dick Freneau, a young broker (David Powell). Gloria promptly fell in love with him, to the consternation of her father and brother, who realized the man's unworthiness. Since Gloria is an heiress, Freneau refuses the reward offered for her rescue and declares he is interested in the girl herself. As a result, Gloria is hurried away to a boarding school and she and Freneau are not to see each other for five years.

Billie Burke's attractiveness springs eternal. She is seen here in chapter three of the Kleine chaptered photoplay novel, "Gloria's Romance"

The principal events of these years are skillfully outlined as they affect Gloria. There is the letter which tells of her brother's marriage to Lois Freeman, and there are a few scenes which sketch Freneau's uneven business success and a few which suggest a love affair with Lois, David Stafford's wife. But most of the story deals with Gloria's school days, the midnight "spreads," the gymnasium classes, the play and work of girlhood. And through the days Gloria gives whatever spare time she has to dreams of her hero, Freneau.

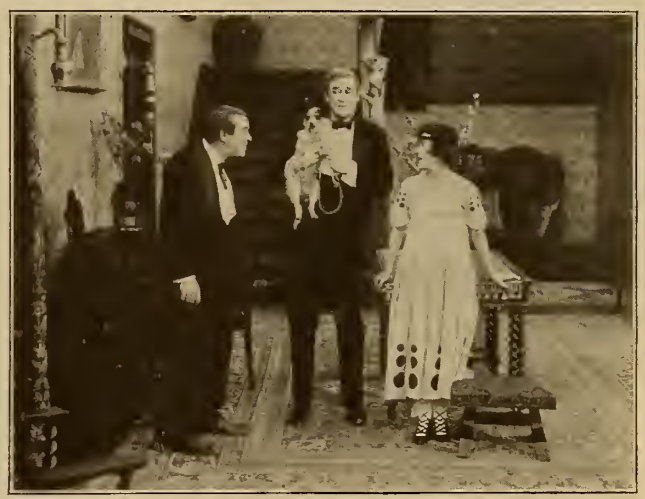
Then Gloria comes home, and to celebrate her return, her father takes her to the opera. There she sees Freneau, but he, who had come there especially to see Lois, does not recognize Gloria, much to her chagrin.

David Powell is very well cast as Freneau and makes an interesting villain. William T. Carlton stands out vividly as Gloria's father, Pierpont Stafford. Miss Burke as Gloria is as fascinating as ever, and these two reels of the play form a charming entertainment.

"Mr. Goode, the Samaritan"

Triangle-Fine Arts Contains Comedy and Human Appeal. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

DE WOLF HOPPER is a much more interesting Alphonse Goode, who believes in giving crooks a chance to be good, than he was in the Fine Arts production in which he starred immediately preceding "Mr. Goode, the Samaritan," and there are reasons for the improvement. While Chester Withey wrote the scenarios for both "Sunshine Dad" and "Mr. Goode, the Samaritan," the latter is superior in every way in comparison with the former.



Edward Dillon, De Wolf Hopper and Fay Tincher in "Mr. Goode, the Samaritan."

Mr. Hopper makes Mr. Goode a character commanding the spectator's sympathy on more accounts than that he is amusing. There are many times when Mr. Goode causes one to take him qutie seriously. These are the occasions when Goode's tolerance and big-hearted faith in his weaker, less fortunate fellow beings shines through the blunt and blundering exterior of the man. This character is not an extraordinary one, but whenever Mr. Goode was in the picture we were always, in a semi-amused manner, deeply interested in him.

The story is not impressive in any one particular, but in general it is pleasing, and as enacted and produced, "Mr. Goode, the Samaritan," is an appealing picture. Edward Dillon apparently was not satisfied to be merely the director of a highly commendable offering, for he stepped in and played the role of the crook who is reformed by the kindly Mr. Goode, thereby winning more of the honors to which this picture entitles itself.

The picture begins by showing the ease with which Mr. Goode, wealthy and quite proficient in commercial dealings, falls in with the plans of crooks. He buys an auto which has been stolen and is put in the lock-up until his identity is made known. In the "pen" he makes the acquaintance of several notorious crooks. He orders and pays for some comfortable chairs and other furnishings for the pen. Goode is much attracted to Shifty Ed. When Ed is released, he and his girl, Shortie Sal, call on the samaritan. There are many temptations to steal, but both are above touching anything belonging to Goode, and they are the means of exposing Foxy Monte, who, in the guise of a foreign nobleman, has won Evelina's consent to elope with him.

Toward the end of the picture there is much suspense. The guests of the Goodes have been robbed and both Ed and Sal are under suspicion, and out of this situation there have been made many effective dramatic moments. Fay Tincher is Shorty Sal and Margaret March is Eveline Goode. Both give the spectator cause to be thankful that they were thus cast. Chester Withey is a convincing Foxy Monte. "Mr. Goode, the Samaritan," contains many amusing moments and a tensely interesting melodramatic climax. This combination serves to send one away wholly pleased, and feeling that the time spent in seeing it brought a good return.

This marvelous cinema spectacle has set a new standard in moving pictures photographically. In some of the battle scenes the pictures are thrown on the screen in their natural colors, the process being a new discovery made during the process of cutting the film. Thus in the battle scenes taken at the twilight hour some of the most artistic effects are produced which have ever been known in cinematography.

The picture presents a thrilling appeal to the mothers of men, that vast army who carry in silence the heaviest burden of the war. With a beautiful love theme carried through the story, the plot is developed to a tremendous climax through a series of unequaled situations. In one scene alone a fleet of the United States battleships is seen in action and an "inside close-up" view of a submarine. In this one encounter over $24,000 worth of amunition was used during the battle.

With a large chorus of trained voices and an augmented orchestra of thirty-five musicians "Civilization" will be shown for the first time in New York City about June 2, at a Broadway theater, the name to be announced later.

Rialto Celebrates Successful Month

The Rialto Theater, New York, celebrated the completion of its first month of existence by giving its patrons an attractive double bill. As a dramatic offering Norma Talmadge and the "Fine Arts Kiddies" were shown in "Going Straight." Charles Chaplin furnished the comedy element in a burlesque on the same theme, called "Police, Police," which was exhibited at the Rialto as a pre-release showing. Greece was the subject of the travel picture and current events were shown in the Rialto Topical Digest. The musical program was most attractive, presenting Marcus Kellerman in Robert Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," Naum Costa and Mary Ball in the duet "Miserere" from "Il Trovatore," Herman Hand in a solo for the French horn, Godard's "Berceuse de Jocelyn," and the Rialto orchestra, which played the overture from "Tannhauser" under the direction of Hugo Riesenfeld.

The two thousand delegates to the biennial convention of Women's Clubs were invited to view an ideal motion picture program at the Rialto Theater. This "ideal" presentation included travel and scientific pictures, a dramatic feature, and vocal and instrumental solos, in addition to organ numbers and an overture by the Rialto orchestra. The photoplay selected was "The Bugle Call," with William Collier, Jr., as the star. Pictorial news events, topical subjects and cartoons were also shown, and Mr. S. L. Rothapfel delivered a brief lecture on the value of such programs in developing culture and comprehension of ethical standards among children.

BONUS FOR STRAND ATTACHES

The Strand Theater Company of New York Plan to Permit Attaches to Share on Profits of Theater

To the Strand Theater Company of New York is awarded the honor of being the first theatrical enterprise to adopt a profit sharing system, and it is believed their lead will be followed by others.

Mitchel H. Mark, president of the company, announces the adoption of a plan which will permit a share in the profits of the theater by all the employes who have helped to make those profits possible. This will be distributed in the form of bonuses based on per cents of their salaries determined by individual efficiency. Ninety-one employes will benefit by this scheme. These are divided into two groups—those receiving less than twenty-five dollars per week and those receiving a salary above that figure. The first group will be entitled to a bonus up to ten per cent of their salary, based on their efficiency, and the latter will receive up to five per cent of their salaries determined in the same way. In the first group are the ushers, doorkeepers, cleaners, cashiers, stenographers, maids and porters. The second group is comprised of the orchestra, the mechanical department and executives.

The Strand, the largest theater in the world devoted to the exhibition of moving pictures, has had an average daily attendance of 12,500 since its opening, making a total attendance for the two years of 9,125,000 paid admissions. This success was what led the directors to share their profits with their employes. The first apportionment will be made January 1, 1917, and yearly thereafter to all employes who remain in the staff from one distribution period to the next.

Mr. Mark believes that the success of any business is always due to the co-operative efforts of everyone connected with that enterprise, he says, "By giving our employes a part of the profits we feel that the staff immediately becomes a partner in the business. We hope to promote an esprit de corps which will change the individual from a mere wage earner to a worker very much interested in the welfare of his firm."

ABOUT BUDDING PLAYS, AND NEWS OF THE TRADE

Diary of Future Star

By this time you know of June Caprice, the dainty little Boston girl who has been taken right out of school, by William Fox, to be made into a great film star.

Doubtless you know many pretty girls who would become sensationally successful film favorites if only some big maker of pictures would give them the opportunity. June Caprice is just that kind of a little beauty.

Director John Adolfi saw her writing in a book in the studio between scenes a few days ago, and discovered that she was making entries into her diary.

And here for your amusement and entertainment are the diary records of little Miss Caprice from that dream-like day when her feat first began to tread the road to fame and fortune:

April 18—I can hardly believe I am in New York City. My, what a place! The din and roar of its busy streets almost deafen one. This is the impression I get from Mr. Fox's car as we skim down Forty-second street to the ferry to reach the studio at Grandwood. There are nineteen girls on the way to the studio, besides myself, and all of us are to have a camera "test." We are told to make up. My face has had its first introduction to powder. The camera man has just told us that some faces reflect all the light and others absorb it all, and that the powder—just enough to take the "shine off"—is to aid the light in making true impressions upon the film in his camera. There are, oh, so many beautiful girls here! Poor me! I'm afraid that I'll be bundled back to Boston. There are so many others!

April 19—Mr. Fox had all of us in the projection room to see how we looked on the screen. Can that be me? Am I that wild young thing that stamps her foot and says she won't do this or that? It hardly seems possible, and I don't remember what I did before the camera, yesterday, because I was so scared with the brilliant lights and the bustle. It is all over—the showing, I mean—and Mr. Fox hasn't said a word about how he was affected by what he saw. I am secretly elated, however, because my mirror never showed me my true self, because there's a winsomeness to my smile and a laughter in my eyes that Daddy has often told me about, but my mirror never revealed to me.

April 20—Up at 6:30. It seems a dream. I am to be taken to a Fifth avenue dressmaker to pick material for some dresses. I'm so happy, and everybody is so kind. For two hours I've talked with Mr. Fox and his director. My poor head was all awhirl! I am to start in tomorrow working in a feature picture written especially for me.

April 21—How can I describe my first day in pictures? And I made so many mistakes. Director Adolfi was so good, too—so patient, and I knew I did badly, because one scene was taken five times. I wanted to cry, but everybody looked so pleasant that I just couldn't. He has an assistant that looks like the pictures of old Abe Lincoln. He's about six feet three, and scrawny. He's been watching me pretty close all day, and tonight I found out that he's supposed to see that I don't forget what I wear in certain scenes, that my hair is just so; that if I leave a scene with anything in my left hand I mustn't go into the next scene with it in my right hand. It's lots of fun, though, but I can see where Johnnie (that's his name) will have a lot of watching to do, because I was never bothered much with detail, anyway. I was a little scared in front of the camera today, but it soon wore off, and I ceased to be June Caprice while the lights were on and the camera man was turning the crank. I was just the little mountain girl I'm supposed to be in the picture.

Metro Releases Travelogues

Starting May 29 the Metro Travelogues will be a weekly feature of the releases of this company. These features will embrace a wide range of subjects, including studies in animal and bird life and glimpses of interesting and picturesque locales all over the world. The close-up pictures of bird and animal life will give intimate knowledge of their habits and will carry a predominating element of humor. All kinds of birds in their habitats as well as bears, cougar kittens, deer, elk and antelope, will be shown. One chapter will be "The Life History of the Salmon," and still another will include an automobile trip over the Lincoln highway. William Lovelle Finley, biologist for the state of Oregon, is the genius responsible for these intimate pictures of bird and animal life.

"Billy" Sherwood, who plays the juvenile lead in "The Spell of the Yukon," in which Edmund Breese is starred, always aspired to be an architect. But while attending preparatory school he received a gold medal for reciting, and then made such a "hit" by his unusual histrionic ability in a number of plays that he decided his forte lay in another direction. Before joining the Metro he was leading man for Marguerite Courtot and also appeared with John Barrymore in "The Lost Bridegroom."

The Pictures Magazine, Metro's weekly publication devoted to motion pictures and their activities, has had a rapid growth. About seven months ago it started with a circulation of 100,000, and is said to have passed the million mark. Arthur James, the editor, lays this rapid growth to the fact that next to seeing motion pictures, the public likes to read about them. The contributors may also have something to do with this popularity. It is planned to publish a series of articles from the pens of Mabel Taliferro, Viola Dana, May Allison, Mme. Petrova, Francis X. Bushman, Harold Lockwood, Lionel Barrymore, Ethel Barrymore, Emily Stevens, William Faversham, Irene Fenwick, Ralph Herz, Grace Valentine and other stars. The regular contributors include Townsend Black, Duane J. Kertyn, Lloyd Llewellyn, Eileen Mack, Tom J. Geraghty and Janet Priest.

Harry O. Hoyt, chief scenario writer at the Metro-Rolfe studio, has shown another phase of the versatility by his appearance before the camera in the role of the warden of Sing Sing in "Notorious Gallagher." William Nigh, the director and author of the production, and Marguerite Snow are starred in this five-part feature. The members of the company went to Sing Sing for this production.

Famous Program for June

The Famous Players Film Company is offering five big productions on its June program which are of special interest because they introduce a number of new stars. First among these is Peggy Hyland, the British star, who will make her American debut in an adaptation of Henry Arthur Jones' "Saints and Sinners."

Another newcomer is Ann Pennington, of Ziegfeld "Follies" fame, who will make her first screen appearance in "Susie Snowflake."

Louise Huff is featured in "Destiny's Toy," with William Courtleight, Jr., playing opposite her.

On June 5 will be released "The Evil Thereof," a morality play written by Channing Pollock and Rennold Wolf, and featuring Frank Losee. Grace Valentine and Crauford Kent are also in the cast.

Marguerite Clark's next appearance will be in "Silks and Satins," a combination of comedy and drama which opens in the present and goes back to mediaeval times.

Pauline Frederick will star in "The World's Great Snare." One of the many big scenes in this play will be the fight in a Montana cabaret in which Irving Cummings and Riley Hatch engage.

Fay Tincher Becomes a Star

Production of two new Triangle-Kay Bee plays has been begun at Thomas H. Ince's Culver City studios. In one Frank Keenan is playing the stellar role and in the other Bessie Barriscale appears. In the cast with Keenan are George Fisher, Joseph J. Dowling and George Elwell, while the principal members of Miss Barriscale's supporting cast are Charles Ray and Fanny Midgely.

Fay Tincher returned from her much-needed vacation to find herself a star. Two scenarios were waiting for her and when the pictures are completed her name will appear in big type. This promotion is a recognition of Miss Tincher's faithful work at the Fine Arts studio.

In "Bath Tub Perils" it is a question which appears oftener and in more humorous situations, Fred Mace or water. This has been called one of the best Keystone releases and is played by an all-star cast, headed by Fred Mace, under the direction of Mack Sennett.

Mabel Normand and her own company of players have begun rehearsals on the first production to be released by the Mabel Normand Feature Film Company. This will be in four reels and the plan is to make eight releases of this length during the year. Miss Normand has not cut away entirely from the Keystone studios, as James Young, who will direct the star, and Del Ruth are lending their aid as in the past. The only real difference is in the play, which is a straight comedy-drama. In it the dramatic situations are strong, while the opportunities for comedy are unlimited.

New Play for Walthall

Two more Essanay feature productions, one presenting Henry B. Walthall and the other Edna Mayo, which will be released on the V-L-S-E program, have been announced by George K. Spoor, president.

"The Little Musketeer," in five acts, was written especially for Mr. Walthall, who just now is making a short visit to his home in Birmingham, Alabama.

"The Return of Eve," a strong drama in five acts, is the vehicle in which Miss Mayo will next appear in feature productions.

Essanay's short-reel releases, which it is producing with as much care as it does its features, have been booked through July and are just announced by Mr. Spoor.

Among the strong two-reelers is a fable

by George Ade, that of the Fearsome Feud Between the First Families. This is the first of Mr. Ade's fables to be released in two reels. The one-reel releases for the month consist of a Canimated Nooz Pictorial, cartoons on events of the day, Vernon Howe Bailey's Sketch Book of New Orleans and two of Ade's fables.

The three-reel releases consist of "The Regeneration of Margaret," presenting Warda Howard and John Junior, "Power," featuring Sydney Ainsworth and Nell Craig, "Secret of the Night," featuring Sydney Ainsworth, Lillian Drew and John Lorenz, and "The Grouch," presenting Harry Beaumont, Harry Dunkinson and John Cossar.

WRITER JOINS LASKY

Miss Eva Unsell, well-known scenario writer and continuity editor, for a long period with the Famous Players Film Company and other big feature play-producing companies, left New York this week for Hollywood, California, to join the photodramatic staff at the studios of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company.

Eva Unsell

Miss Unsell is one of the first engagements announced by the Lasky Company since the arrival in New York recently of Mr. Lasky, who has personally taken, since the organization of the firm, a very great interest in the photodramatic department. Miss Unsell has to her credit a number of popular successes on the screen, among them: "Wildflower," with Marguerite Clark, "The Morals of Marcus," with Marie Doro, and "The Dawn of a Tomorrow," with Mary Pickford. Miss Unsell also selected Miss Pickford's famous vehicle, "Tess of the Storm Country," considered the best feature in which Miss Pickford ever appeared. Miss Unsell left the Famous Players a year ago to devote herself to original photoplays, and among her recent successes are "The Warning," with Henry Kolker, "The Ransom," with Julia Dean, and "The Reapers," written expressly for Mr. John Mason. The wide variety of these subjects and their popularity with the public convinced Mr. Lasky that Miss Unsell would be a valuable addition to his company.

World's Fair Scenics Ready

Geo. A. Collins, president of the Exposition Players Corporation, has consummated a deal whereby E. M. Asher takes over the world's rights for seventy-five thousand feet of negative which covers the complete history of the world's fair which closed in San Francisco last December.

The Exposition Players Corporation controlled the exclusive and only franchise which permitted the taking of scenic pictures inside the exposition grounds.

The compiling of the negative required almost two years of preparation, none of which has ever been released. Asher announces the pictures will be ready for release in about two weeks, and after being cut to ten thousand feet will be marketed as a serial in eight-hundred-foot lengths at the rate of one each week.

"Gloria's Romance" in New York

The first two episodes of the George Kleine serial written by Mr. and Mrs. Rupert Hughes and featuring Billie Burke were shown for the first time on Broadway last Monday night at the Globe theater. "Lost in the Everglades" and "Caught by the Seminoles," the first two chapters, were shown to a large audience, and while applause on an opening night is one of filmdom's certainties, it was apparent that the beginning of "Gloria's Romance" was actually enjoyed by those in attendance. One of the features of the occasion was the presence of numbers of well-known figures in the motion picture and theatrical world.

Inglis Secures Stars

Gus Inglis, of Willis and Inglis of Los Angeles, is preparing to return to the coast after a few weeks' stay in New York City. During his stay in the East Mr. Inglis, who made his headquarters with Arthur S. Kane, secured a number of stars and some directors for the Pacific coast studios.

He also made arrangements with Sanger and Jordan and with Darcy and Wolford for the photoplay rights on a number of plays and scripts handled by those concerns. These dramas will be arranged for screen presentation by Willis and Inglis. Mr. Inglis plans to stop over in Chicago on his way back.

Hunter Joins Fox

Kenneth Hunter, an actor whose work in Amelia Rives play, "The Fear Market," has attracted much attention in New York and other parts of the East, has joined the Fox organization and become leading man with Madame Kalich in her newest picture, now being made by Director James Vincent.

"Woman Who Dared" Showing

A special showing of "The Woman Who Dared" will be given to the trade in New York at 10 a. m., June 20. This will be the only screening before the allotment of territorial rights. The feature will be accompanied with full orchestration.

"Chip's Carmen" Released May 27

"Chip's Carmen," the two-act juvenile burlesque, is to be released by the Juvenile Film Corporation on May 27.

This is said to be one of the greatest comedies ever produced by children. Joseph Monahan is the featured personage. The state rights of a very few states are still open and going fast.

World Director Says "30"

S. E. V. Taylor, who has been producing for the World Film Corporation, has resigned and the resignation was accepted with regrets by William A. Brady.

Mr. Taylor has been directing Miss Clara Kimball Young. Among his productions are "The Story of Suzanne," Charles Cherry and Mary Charleson in "Passers By," and Mollie McIntyre in "Her Great Hour." Some eight or nine years ago Mr. Taylor and D. W. Griffith were the best known producing team in filmdom, Taylor writing the scenarios and Griffith producing them.

Mr. Taylor has not announced his future plans.

Triangle Film Corporation,

Gentlemen:
I have just seen Douglas Fairbanks in "Reggie Mixes In", also making the sixth picture that I have booked, and cannot refrain from telling you that never in my career have I seen or had the pleasure of booking such wonderful pictures that have been so consistent in their general excellence. Their artistic value, their direction, their quality and everything about them have given to the Rialto Theatre solidity and have created a standard that I know will be impossible to duplicate with any other films now before the American public.
The pictures are improving, the comedies are especially good, and on the whole I am not only satisfied but thoroughly delighted, and I am sure that any exhibitor who will handle these pictures in the proper manner will create for himself a following that nothing but sheer stupidity and neglect could ever destroy.
Wishing you every success and trusting that you will continue with the good work, I am Very sincerely yours,
SLR/S

The above letter should be of particular interest to motion picture exhibitors at this time.

From S. L. Rothapfel, the dean of the motion picture exhibiting business, it should be of the greatest importance to the exhibitor who is considering whether or not his audience will appreciate and pay to see TRIANGLE PICTURE PLAYS.

Seven months ago TRIANGLE PLAYS were first released without a single theatre. Now the number of theatres showing these pictures runs into the thousands, which in itself is proof enough that the public enjoys and is in fact enthusiastic over the presentation of TRIANGLE PICTURES.

Cheap motion pictures no longer satisfy the public. Bigger and better pictures with bigger and better plots, people and ideas, are required now—pictures of the TRIANGLE sort are essential for the successful house.

If you are an exhibitor and are not running TRIANGLE PLAYS write us for information.

Do We Know Our Own Business?

BY FRANK J. REMBUSCH

President F. J. Rembusch Enterprises and Rembusch Amusement Company, Shelbyville, Indiana.

READING MOTOGRAPHY's editorial of May 20, "The Man Who Butts Into the Game," I first became aware that a letter I had written inadvertently inspired it. I am now invited to prove my statement, "Folks engaged in the motion picture business are the rottenest bookkeepers in the world." In my humble way I will try to do so, and if there are exhibitors who disagree with me, let them remember that I write not from theories, but from the actual experiences of ten years in motion picture presentation.

Frank J. Rembusch.

I have owned de luxe shows and dump shows, and my experience is supplemented by the experience of thousands of other exhibitors with whom I have had dealings, in all parts of the world, through the sale of "Rembusch screens." If my experiences do not check with yours, Mr. Exhibitor, they will in time if you are in the business long enough —unless present conditions change a great deal.

I reiterate: We are the poorest bookkeepers in the world, because we have no standards whatever on which to base our figures.

Some great philosopher once gave this advice: "Know thyself." We need very much the same advice, "Know our business."

We know a lot of gush, but little of the brass tacks.

Mention motion pictures to anybody, any time, anywhere, and away we all soar into superlatives. Hurrah! We are it. I have heard it said a thousand times, "Isn't it wonderful?" "Oh, my! Isn't it just wonderful?" And immediately we exhibitors strut around like a peacock and swell up like a hop-toad, and as a consequence somebody starts an opposition house.

True, we have had a wonderful growth; so has many a bawling calf. In fact, our growth has been entirely too wonderful and too rapid and many of us have growing pains as a consequence.

There is a crazy idea in the minds of the public and most of the exhibitors that this business has unlimited possibilities; that you can keep right on making more and more film; building more and more houses; showing a longer and longer program; increasing more and more the price of your service and the price of your admission; and you will keep right on to the golden road of prosperity, at the end of which you will be a billionaire. And yet the undeniable fact remains that this business has a very limited field and a very close margin, and the moment you get too much on one side of the scales you will spill the beans.

Let me ask you, Mr. Exhibitor, how much stability has your business?

What are its future prospects? What is your depreciation? Can you and are you willing to keep right on the way you are? Does your balance sheet show all of this?

If it does not, you are a poor bookkeeper.

Let's figure this business like a shoemaker does when he sells his shoes; the coal man, tons of coal; the butcher, pounds of meat; but let's begin by elimiating the "beef trust" and by the aid of a stout rope and a bull ring tie it where it can't be seen or heard, and then look the facts in the face.

Motion Picture Bookkeeping—Lesson No. 1— Opening an Account

Some many moons ago I begged a prospective exhibitor not to start a picture show. I told him there was not room for another show, as the business was well taken care of. As usual, he would not believe me, nor the facts and figures I presented. A few months after he was operating he discovered I had told the truth, and the whole truth. I then asked him to tell me just what idea or motive caused him to start another show against my strong advice. These were his words, "Well, F. J., it was just like this: several times I went to the other houses and I could not get in and it seemed to me like there was a whole lot of business getting away." On close questioning I found that the particular time when this man couldn't get in was between 7:30 and 9 o'clock on Saturday nights, when the weather was exceptionally good and there was a good drawing program. I went farther and showed him that there was just an average of about thirty or forty people turned away on these few particular nights and called attention to the fact that during the rest of the week there never was a minute but that there were many, many empty seats in all the houses. For one hour there was a surplus sometimes and in actual dollars and cents this surplus amounted to about $5. Therefore, in order to take care of a surplus of $5, this man put in another house seating more than 600 people, at an expense of $10.000. It sounds ridiculous; but it is a sad fact, and has happened many, many times, and is still happening right along. That is what I call some bookkeeping.

Lesson No. 2 — Cash

A city of five thousand inhabitants will only support one first-class motion picture show, and the average box office receipts will be $300 a week. Now please don't let anybody misunderstand me. I am more concerned that you get the idea of the amount of money available than how many shows there are usually in a city of a certain number of inhabitants. Here is where we have made our mistake. A prospective exhibitor figures on a certain number of shows in a certain locality without respect to whether they are small shows or large shows, first class or fourth class, de luxe or dump. Three dump shows could probably get by in a small city where two first-class shows would starve to death. When two or three small shows are in opposition they are limited in seating capacity and expense and they won't hurt each other, where two large shows under large expense will starve.

I have been operating shows in several cities and I keep my box office receipts for a whole year on one card. I can compare any week in any year at a glance. For example, I look at four years. The first week in October in each year on one of my cards shows the gross box office receipts were in the neighborhood of $315, and they did not vary $5 in the four years, and in between two years there is only a variation of thirty-five cents. This is neither a coincidence nor an accident. It is a simple business fact. I was working the business as hard as I could, and I was getting everything in sight. There is a certain level or limit, and if you are running your show for all there is to it, you will get that much and no more.

Lesson No. 3 — Lightning Division

No business divides up as quickly as the motion picture business. Some wise man who knew more about the theory than the practice of things has said, "It is an economic law that every new business makes its own business." In other words, you can keep right on keeping on. I say it is not so. Let us take a city of ten thousand inhabitants as an average. The box office receipts will run about $600. This will support two first-class shows. (It might support several little dumps—like a case I came across the other day where the owner did the operating, his wife sold the tickets, and they had an automatic piano. The man's salary was what he took in. This is exceptional and is not to be reckoned with.) Now, say there is $600 available for two shows and another show starts. Those of you who have had the experience know the results. You where the business is not overdone—I would advise you to get down on your prayer bones and pray every night that the fool that is born every minute will not start a picture show in your town. A city of ten thousand will support more than thirty grocery stores, a dozen drug stores, the same number of saloons, and if one more or less of these is born or dies it makes little impression on the balance. But when you have two picture shows and you put in another one, you have an example of lightning division which you can well use in your motion picture bookkeeping. Hundreds of times have I seen an exhibitor making a nice living one day; over night a new show opens and immediately he starves. The hazards of your business should show on your balance sheet; and just as an insurance company would charge an extra premium on your life insurance if you were working at a hazardous occupation, so you should charge off a certain per cent every week on account of the hazards of the business.

Lesson No. 4 — Sudden Slump in the Market

Can you imagine any other business in which your clientele will leave you so suddenly? If you were a professional man, a doctor or a lawyer, and another doctor or lawyer came to town, everybody wouldn't rush off at once to consult the new man. If you have an old established mercantile business, can another man take it way from you over night? But when the motion picture business is overdone, it is overdone, and your best friends will go over to see the new show. People like diversion in their amusement. That is what makes amusement—diversion. When I think of this particular point the proposition really looks hopeless and helpless.

Lesson No. 5 — Eliminating Competition

They say a cat has nine lives, but I have seen motion picture theaters that have ninety. In no other business is it so hard to eliminate competition. After the mistake is made and there are too many shows, there seems to be nothing to do but to hold on. Recently an exhibitor friend asked me to go with him and look at a show in the residence district of a large city. He said, "F. J., I know you have had a world of experience. I want you to tell me what to do with this show. Would you change the lights here? Would you put posters there? What program would you use?" I could think of nothing to say except, "It would be better if this show had never been born." Here was a show that had never made a dollar outside of the first three months when it opened. It cost $15,000 to build it and that much has been lost in it in addition. There was no more reason for that show than the fifth wheel on a wagon. There it stands—a big white elephant—hungry for the new sucker who comes along every few months believing he has P. T. Barnum beaten forty ways to breakfast. He has been reading a lot of nice things in the trade journals and in the newspapers about programs, personality and perfumery. He feels sure that here is a gold mine which his superior qualifications will be able to develop. He puts in his little dab and in a few months he is a much wiser, sadder and leaner man.

Lesson No. 6 — Depreciation

If that building could be turned into a stable, a garage or barn, or wiped off the face of the earth, the agony would be over; but the proprietor told me he couldn't afford to do that. There is $5,000 invested in the equipment alone; besides, it would cost $1,500 to change the floor and the roof. So there you are. He would rather get a litle rent and a little per cent than make the change. If he takes out this $5,000 equipment it will dwindle down to about $300 worth of junk. I know, because I bought a show at receiver's sale for $200 that was offered to me for $6,000 a year before. In a motion picture show there is some depreciation. There should be a 20 per cent depreciation charged off every year and sometimes there has to be 100. Does your balance sheet show it? If it don't, you are a poor bookkeeper.

Lesson No. 7 — Business Secrets

Do you know of any other business where your business is everybody's business and where it is so easy to break in (and I might add, so you don't forget it, so hard to break out)? Buy the first and last ticket, stand across the street with a checker, and you know just what the other man is taking in. Go to a film exchange, a supply man, and he will put you right in the business all except putting up the money, which kindly he allows you to do.

Lesson No. 8 — Supplying the Demand

At first folks came to our motion picture theaters because they gave cheap and short entertainment. If you were running a restaurant and a man only wanted one piece of pie, you wouldn't insist on him eating two and thereby perhaps make him ill. We do worse than that. Folks come in to see pictures with the idea of staying about forty-five minutes. In order to kill our competitor we go ahead and give them about two hours. We show them reel after reel until they reel out, worn out, and so sick of pictures one day that they don't come back the next. They certainly don't go to two shows any more. I remember in the old days, when we showed one reel for a nickel, when they would come back and see the same show the same day. Now the complaint is, "Your show is too long," "It is very fine, but it keeps me up too late," etc. It is absolutely physically impossible for the average person to enjoy more than an hour's motion picture entertainment on account of the very close concentration required, especially today with the heavy dramas we are showing. We might add in our ledger here that by this method we kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

Lesson No. 9 — This Is a Five-Cent Business

We hear a great deal about dollar motion pictures —what some great exhibitor like my friend Rothapfel is doing. Now I would not detract one iota from the glory of Rothapfel's work. But we can't all be Rothapfels—some of us have to be common dubs. Rothapfel is an inspiration, a tonic, yet we can't all work on Broadway because some of us have to take care of the small town conditions. One of the things that made the motion picture popular was its price. There should be five-cent shows running a five-cent program and ten-cent shows running a ten-cent program. However, let me get to the dollars and cents of it, or rather the sense of it. I had six exhibitors together recently who were all running at ten cents and had been in the business quite a while. It happened we were not competitors, so we could tell the truth. I put up a proposition like this to each: "Are your box office receipts doubled since you are showing at a dime instead of a nickel?" In every case they agreed that they did get a litle extra money at first, but on the whole it quickly dropped to the old level. Now there are exceptions to this case, but the point I want to bring out strongly is this—that there is just so much money available for motion pictures and that is all. If raising the price would double the business, why not keep on keeping on? But it don't.

Lesson No. 10 — Competition

When I hear exhibitors talk and explain the reasons for poor business I am inclined to believe that the greatest asset the exhibitor possesses is hope. In the exhibitor hope springs eternal. First comes the weather; it has been too cold; it is too warm; too much rain; it was such a nice evening that everybody stayed out of doors; farmers didn't come in because it was too bad or it was so nice they were all at work. We did pretty well considering the counter attractions. Perhaps it was a poker party or prayer meeting; a revival or prize fight; a ladies' aid or cabaret; matinee musicale or badger fight; there was a big fire or ball: circuses, carnivals, picnics, band concerts, basket-ball, croquet, or the high school play, and don't forget the automobile. In times past folks came in summer time to see pictures for diversion. Now they take it out in joy rides. Verily, the business is not what it used to be.

Recapitulation

Neither manufacturers nor exhibitors are making money, and if they keep the right kind of books, 95 per cent are losing. You can't keep on paying more and more for your film service because there is not more and more money available. You can't keep adding show after show, because there are not enough people to fill the seats. You can't keep showing more and more reels of film and expect people to retain an appetite for motion pictures. You can't keep charging more and more admission; if you do, they will just come a less number of times. Today I am paying $15 a day for film service where a few years ago I paid $15 a week. Today I bow low and say, "Thank you," "Come again, you are always welcome." A few years ago we gave them stay over checks and made them pay twice or beat it. One year in the old days I made $6,000 out of a $1,000 investment. Show me the exhibitor that is making $1,000 on each $6,000 invested now. Then you didn't work at all—now you work day and night.

Final Summary

Apply business principles to the motion picture business and you will not wonder why I say it is more like a poker game. You buy film of unknown quality and they make you pay for it in advance. Here is the most perishable merchandise imaginable, because if you don't use it today there is no chance to lay it on the shelf and use it tomorrow, in case it rains today or the town breaks out with measles, chickenpox or scratch gravel. If your show doesn't pay, instead of cutting down expense you increase it. You keep right on and when you are broke you throw in your hat, your coat and your vest and strip yourself to the limit like a poker player.

What is the matter?

In Motography's editorial was told the remedy: "We wouldn't do it if we knew better." We are all overreaching ourselves. It is time we back-tracked just a little.

This business has been in existence long enough so that it can be figured out to a cent what it will and won't do, and if you verify my figures you will find them to be about correct.

Strange to say, a man may be ever so good a business man, a merchant, a financier, beforehand—after he gets into the motion picture business he fails to use any business sense or judgment.

Many a popcorn wagon in front of motion picture theaters is run with more business sense than the theater before which it stands.

Most of us are selling a dollar program for a dime, hoping that our competitor will quit.

It is a fact that we have wonderful theaters, we are a wonderful business. We are at the same time wonderfully stupid as bookkeepers.

We give the people more than they want for their money; we have changed the whole business sections of many cities; we have doubled the rents; we have increased the value of real estate; we have brightened up the world; but our box office receipts are not keeping abreast with our progress in other lines.

Here is work for the Exhibitors' League and the Board of Trade. Let's talk more about dollars than about program. The present-day program is too heavy and is shooting over people's heads.

The public and the exhibitor must be educated to the fact that the days of get-rich-quick in motion picture presentation are over and we will have to set our stake according to the limit of its possibilities.

"THE FALL OF A NATION"

First Published Outline of the Plot of the Dixon Drama of National Defense and Cast of Characters.

The premier performance of "The Fall of a Nation" will be given on June 6 at the Liberty Theater, New York.

The story opens in the New York mansion of Charles Waldron, who loves Virginia Holland, but whose big ambition is to establish the rule of imperialism in America. Miss Holland, the leader of the suffragist-peace group, comes into conflict with Congressman John Vassar. His bill providing for a large

On the firing line with the camera infantry, under Captain Thompson in the filming of "The Fall of a Nation."

American army is defeated. In the course of their political encounters, the congressman's heart is won by Virginia. She refuses him because he is so decisively opposed to her principles.

In league with Europe, Charles Waldron hatches the great treason. Twenty thousand subjects of foreign powers, living in New York, rise in the night. They capture the city from the National Guard, its sole defenders. Patriots and refugees flee to Long Island, where an American army is hastily improvised. But in the meantime a powerful fleet has brought 150,000 invaders equipped with Krupps and all the latest death-dealing devices. They whip the Americans in a three-day battle. The nation falls. Washington, Philadelphia, Boston, next Chicago and St. Louis are occupied. Waldron puts on regal uniform and is hailed viceroy of the "provinces of North America."

Virginia Holland professes loyalty to the new regime. Waldron entrusts her with organizing the Imperial Legion of Honor among American women, indicating that her reward will be the vicereine's seat at his side. While touring the country on this mission, the girl secretly enrolls the oath-bound order of the Daughters of Jael. She swears a million girls and women to the destruction of the foreign usurpers. Those who cannot be won over by the women are marked for certain death.

In a night the Daughters of Jael and their male colleagues fall upon the reveling Imperial minions. The wireless stations are taken, the forts captured, the ships boarded, and the American cavalry tramples down and cuts to pieces the soldiers opposing it. Sun rise on the harbor of New York shows the Stars and Stripes on every ship and fort. An army of five hundred thousand men are mobilizing under General Wood to capture Boston and Norfolk.

Waldron falls in the final melee. John Vassar claims Virginia Holland, who has atoned for her peace-at-any-price folly by defying death to restore the sacred union of states.

"The Fall of a Nation" is a prologue and three acts, or twelve reels. Bartley Cushing was the principal director. William C. Thompson and John W. Boyle photographed the great spectacle.

Berst Favors Federal Censorship

J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of Pathe, has come out strong for federal censorship of pictures. "This is the only way in which obnoxious state censorship bills can be headed off," says Mr. Berst. "The fact that the federal government is passing upon films will be the most powerful possible argument against local censorship."

Mr. Berst made a careful study of the Hughes bill and wrote to the Hon. Dudley M. Hughes, chairman of the House Committee on Education, pointing out a number of objectionable features in the bill. On May 19 Mr. Hughes wrote Mr. Berst to the effect that many of his suggestions had been followed in the new bill. The revised bill was carefully analyzed by Mr. Berst who, on May 23, wrote Mr. Hughes in part:

"I wish to assure you that your bill will find in our firm a very strong support. All the big concerns intend to get together and discuss this bill thoroughly, and I am very confident that a resolution will be adopted for the support of the bill."

Mr. Hughes, recognizing Mr. Berst's great help in putting the bill upon a basis where it would merit the support of the manufacturers, wired Mr. Berst:

"Thanks for your letter. Have I your permission to make this letter public? Wire answer." Mr. Berst accordingly wired his consent.

When the new bill is carefully read, compared with the old one and also with Mr. Berst's first letter to Mr. Hughes, the value of the Pathe executive's suggestions and the weight they had in Washington is apparent.

About 200 supernumeraries were used in the staging of the cabaret scene in "The Wasted Years," a forthcoming Horsley-Mutual Masterpicture.

Chicago to Be League Headquarters

PERMANENT OFFICES PLAN—CONVENTION BOOMING

SMALL town motion picture showmen who have not joined the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America have learned through a rather bitter lesson during the past two weeks that membership in that organization is an asset in times of trouble.

Numerous of the small town showmen were without their scheduled films, owing to the strike of the express company drivers. The exchanges in many cases refused to ship films to the smaller towns for fear the showmen would not make immediate return of the films after showing them. But several of the exchanges, when showmen were members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, accepted the guarantee of the League that the films would be returned as promised. Through this arrangement League members were enabled to give their scheduled show, while non-members, in many cases, were forced to keep their houses dark or run a substitute program.

The exchanges have had so much trouble through the failure of small town showmen to return films that they have adopted a rule to continue during the strike, that except in case of return being guaranteed by the League, films will not be shipped. If a showman at a point where there is not an exchange desires a film he must journey to the exchange point, obtain the film and guarantee to return it personally. At all points within striking distance of the exchange points the exchange managers continue to make delivery by automobile and special messengers.

The fact that so many non-members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America have failed to receive their films has caused a big jump in the League membership, especially of the Illinois and Indiana branches. This increased membership is encouraging to the committees who are doing the active work in an effort to make the coming convention and show to be held at the Coliseum, Chicago, July 10 to 18, inclusive, the biggest thing that has ever been held in the motion picture industry.

Everybody connected with the show and convention is working under high pressure and is advertising the "one convention—one show" propaganda with the idea of proving to the trade that the time for the one show is during the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and the place is the city in which that convention is held.

William J. Sweeney, chairman of the convention and show committee, had his first opportunity to place the "one convention—one show" idea before a large body of showmen when he journeyed to Omaha last week to attend the ball of the Omaha Screen and Photoplay Managers' Association. He placed the proposition squarely before the Omaha showmen and they were enthusiastic regarding it. They also were enthusiastic over Chicago as the one city which should be named as the perpetual convention and show city. In Omaha it was agreed that every showman would take up the matter with his exchangeman with a request that the exchangeman pass the suggestion on to headquarters. This plan is to be followed wherever there is a branch of the League.

M. G. Watkins, of the American Standard Motion Picture Corporation, accompanied Mr. Sweeney to Omaha and did some convincing talking on the "one convention—one show" idea.

There is a movement on foot to appoint an executive secretary for the League who will have headquarters at Chicago and who will work continually to advance the interest of the League and its members. Although the League is chartered in Ohio, it is the consensus of opinion that headquarters should be in Chicago.

During the last year the offices of the League have been in the hat of Fred J. Herrington, the president, and the offices have been kept moving from one part of the country to the other as the president jumped. The result of this moving office was that it was very nearly impossible to obtain any rapid information regarding the League, as the president was traveling most of the time and the secretary failed to answer correspondence.

With the appointment of an executive secretary and the opening of offices at Chicago all this will be changed and showmen-members will be able to get quick action on every matter.

The present plan is to have the office of executive secretary carry a living salary with it, in order to obtain the services of some man who ranks high in the motion picture business, who is popular with showmen and manufacturers alike, and who knows every angle of the business. Just who this "man of the hour" will be is problematical at present. Several names have been mentioned but none of those mentioned will accept if satisfactory salary inducements are not offered.

It is hoped to clear enough money on the forthcoming Coliseum show to pay for the opening of the Chicago offices and to provide for the salary of the executive secretary and his office force for at least one year. An increase in membership of about three thousand showmen would assure the appointment of the right man as executive secretary and would eliminate the necessity of making the appointment contingent upon the success of the show.

L. W. Brophy of Oklahoma, one of the present League officers and one of the most popular men in the business, reports that the entire Southwest is enthusiastic over the "one convention—one show" idea. He has written to headquarters declaring that if the plan is carried out and if the two New York shows are given up he can enroll nearly every exhibitor in Oklahoma, New Mexico and Texas as members of the League. "And, if they join," Mr. Brophy writes, "they will charter special trains to attend the Chicago convention. We are for Chicago all the time down here and it is about time we proved to the manufacturers that Chicago is the natural film center of the United States."

Chicago manufacturers and accessory men are doing everything in their power to back the League and make the show a tremendous success. They are vying with each other in an effort to outdo the East, and it looks very much as if they will succeed. The show committees have been paired off and each pair now is busy from morning until night calling upon interested parties. Their nightly reports are optimistic and where they do not bring in signed contracts for floor space they do bring in promises.

The chances are that there will be no convention advertising program, although this question is not definitely settled. The program committee is divided on the matter, some believing that a program should carry advertising and others taking the stand that they are asking all from the manufacturers they should ask when they get them to purchase floor space.

"We have no right to take two wallops at the manufacturers," said one member of the committee. "We are running this show from the standpoint of economy and efficiency and are attempting to give the trade all possible benefit at the least possible expense. Let us forget the advertising program. It will cost more to get it up than we may hope to get out of it, and the manufacturers will feel more kindly toward us without the program."

The plan of closing all the motion picture houses in the country during the month of July is not meeting with any marked success. Most of the showmen acknowledge that they would like to close during the month and would be willing to do so provided their competitors also would close. While the July closing probably will not be brought around immediately, the League will continue to work on the plan with hope of ultimate success.

Every mail is loaded with photographs of women for entry into the beauty contest. One desk at League headquarters, 1413 Masonic Temple, Chicago, is filled with photographs of women who seek the hundred dollar prize with the motion picture contract which goes to the winner of the contest. All entries in the beauty contest should send their photographs to League headquarters and should see that the name of the contestant is written on the back of the photograph.

The hotel headquarters question has not been settled as yet. All of the large Chicago hotels are bidding for the privilege of being the headquarters for the visiting showmen, but the contest has narrowed down to a vigorous fight between the La Salle and Sherman.

Word has been received from New York that the eastern showmen will travel west on special convention trains, the details of which are in the hands of Sam Spedon, the popular publicity man with the Vitagraph Company of America. He reports that he has his hands full taking care of reservations and that he expects to pick up showmen all along the route between New York and Chicago.

Edna Goodrich Charms in New Film

"Miss Edna Goodrich," said a by-stander who chanced to see the forthcoming Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company release, "The Making of Maddalena," "has certainly brought to the screen a charm as well as a versatility that marks an epoch in the filming of high class photoplays. Miss Goodrich has long been before the American public as an actress of unusual stage attractiveness, but her bringing to the screen an even intensified beauty speaks well not only for her but for the Morosco director."

As an evidence of Miss Goodrich's fidelity of make-up in "The Making of Maddalena," in which Miss Goodrich takes the part of an artist's model, an Italian who had strayed into the projection room, after seeing a few feet of the film remarked: "Is she an Italian?" His keen eye had been unable to detect that she was not Italian born.

"The Making of Maddalena" is a story of peculiarly strong heart appeal. Miss Goodrich enters the scenes as an artist's model whose chief affliction is a brutal father. Later she is made love to and finally marries the son of a rich American—only to have marital unhappiness that would crush the heart of a weaker heroine. With husband gone and family ties uprooted, Miss Goodrich as Maddalena makes her way in the world alone until she is finally rescued by some American friends who have known her in the days gone by. They bring her to America and the reconciliation with the husband takes place as the crowning feature of a life devoted to service to others.

Throughout the picture Miss Goodrich is a moving picture of liveliness—a fact which will bring pleasure to those thousands of fans who view her beautiful portrayal of the exquisite Maddalena.

"Woman Who Dared" Shown June 30

In order that it may have every opportunity of perfecting "The Woman Who Dared" to the very last detail in the cutting and assembling of the film, the California Motion Picture Corporation has decided to postpone its trade showing at the Rialto Theater, New York, until Friday, June 30. Tuesday, June 20, was the original date planned. The coming film has attracted a good deal of attention and is eagerly looked forward to by the trade.

Audrey Munson, famous artist's model, is soon to be starred by the Mutual in a seven-act feature, screened at the American studios in Santa Barbara. In numerous of the scenes, Miss Munson appears entirely in the nude. Notable poses in which Miss Munson will be seen in this allegorical masterpiece, will be that of "Descending Night," and various other works of noted masters.

Showmen in attendance at the Chicago convention and Motion Picture Industry exhibit to be held July 10 to 18, inclusive, may keep in close touch with home by having their mail and telegraph messages addressed in care of MOTOGRAPHY, Monadnock Block, Chicago. Every effort will be made by MOTOGRAPHY to make immediate delivery of mail and telegrams from its exhibit in the Coliseum.

"Civilization" a Vast War Spectacle

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

IT took a long time to get to Thomas H. Ince, but the wait was worth while.

He shakes hands as though he means it, is sociable in spite of the fact that he is as busy as several people, and his conversation is without the embellishments of ego. Mr. Ince has virtually moved his bed into his suite of offices in the Hotel Astor, and there are laid the plans for the launching of his new and stupendous production, "Civilization," which opened Friday, June 2, at the Criterion Theater, New York City.

Thomas H. Ince.

"Civilization" is one of the most spectacular films ever put out—if, indeed, it is not the greatest today. It is ten reels in length, and is shown in two acts. It opens with a prologue in which one hundred and twenty-five people appear. Mr. Ince is backing this picture just as he produced it—with his whole heart and soul. Its cost balances a good fortune.

All of the realities of war, horrors, glory, and glamour find their way into this magnificent spectacle. The naval department co-operated with Mr. Ince in the staging of some stirring sea batttles; yet staging is hardly the word, for in the engagements three ships of the enemy were really destroyed by a United States torpedo boat. Two battleships, two torpedo boat destroyers, and one cruiser were the total of the government's contribution to the working material in "Civilization."

This battle, as actually fought, lasted twenty-five minutes. During that time 600 shots were fired. Ninety-two per cent were effective, which speaks pretty well for the United States navy. In the land battles thousands of men and horses are employed and cities are shelled and burned. The reflection of all this is seen in the close, intimate pictures of family life mingled with the devastation and anguish which war leaves in its bloody trail.

This is the sort of work which bears Thomas H. Ince's signature today. Five years ago he was an actor and the sole possessor of some dollar and twenty-five or dollar and thirty cents. In speaking of those days he says: "I thought then that this moving picture business was a joke. It was below the dignity of a regular fellow and couldn't last. I preserved my dignity and this attitude until one day I saw a man who used to play minor parts—roles just a shade this side of absolute obscurity—drive up to a hotel in an automobile.

"My surprise was equalled only by my curiosity to know how it had all happened. While he poured wine I asked him and was told 'The movies.' The season had been so poor that my scorn for the picture game did not last until prosperity's return, and I was soon on the Imp payroll at $5 a day. But that did not satisfy me. I declared that I was not an actor but a manager, and casually sparkled a borrowed diamond ring to give color to my confession. They believed me, and I soon went west with the company in a managerial capacity. At that time picture people calmly spoke of me as being crazy. There was a set way of doing things before the camera then, and if I wanted to try a new way, they said it was because I didn't know any better.

"That rooted belief that there was but one way of making certain kinds of pictures egged me on to pull something new. In spite of the fact that fake Indians were considered better in films than the real thing, I hired the whole 101 Wild West Show for the winter. I had been told that Indians couldn't be taught to act, but I found them easy to direct. They have a sense of humor, can appreciate the dramatic, and are excellent mimics.

"I became a spendthrift in my next diversion, being the first man to pay $50 for a scenario. This piece of wantonness provoked a landslide of criticism. The absolute abandon with which I threw away money for stories would establish a precedent impossible to follow. In spite of all of this, I knew that good scenarios were necessary and I got them. Now, of course, since competition has grown to be what it is, $50 for a story isn't looked upon as criminal rashness.

"The thing kept on growing bigger and bigger for me, and all the time, although I traveled at a pretty fast pace to keep up with the developments and add my share, I realized that I did not know it all. I have found that there is no limit to what you can do in the moving picture business and no limit to what you can learn. I'm willing to learn from anybody who can teach me. I'll take a pointer from the property or camera man every time if what he has to say can help me."

And it is that big-mindedness, ever open to suggestions and improvement, which has put Ince's Kay-Bee-Triangle pictures in the front row of today's offerings, and has made "Civilization" one of the milestones of film production and an epoch in the history of the motion picture industry.

"Civilization" took a year to produce and employs the services of 40,000 people. Mr. Ince and his staff, in their suite at the Astor Hotel, have been so besieged by state's rights men and exhibitors at large that it has been necessary to open an office in the quarters of the New York Motion Picture Corporation in the Longacre building. There Adam Kessel and Charles O. Baumann have been receiving all visitors as well as the thousands of telegrams and letters from all parts of the United States and foreign countries not immediately affected by the war, in behalf of Mr. Ince. The New York premiere of "Civilization" bids fair to break all records, as already the advance sale of seats has been so tremendous that the house is sold out for four weeks in advance, and this one week in advance of the opening date. For the "first night" of "Civilization" 1,100 special invitations have been issued by Mr. Ince, his guests of honor including the most noted names in New York in financial, artistic, religious, social and literary circles.

While Mr. Ince does not wish to tell anything about the nature of his great masterwork, he is by no means so reticent concerning his theories in regard to the psychology of directing a titanic photo-drama.

"A really good director," he says, "must combine within himself the art of the painter, the dramatist, the architect and the poet, besides being required to possess the constitution of a horse and the nerves of a navvie. If I were asked what constitutes the principal factor of direction I should say that it consists in being able to so project one's mentality that it can be conveyed to the brains and sway the personalities of the people working under the director even if, as in the case of 'Civilization' they number as many as 40,000. It may sound like a radical statement to make, but I am more and more convinced that the psychology of the art of the director has been underestimated. Think of the gigantic tasks faced every day by our more prominent producers in instilling their ideas into the minds of huge crowds of extra people, many of whom have never before faced a camera. What is it that takes this conglomerate mass of humanity and turns them into passable actors for the time being? The personality of the director!

"In other words—again not to seem radical—I should be inclined to say that a director of a great feature picture must be to a certain extent a hypnotist in the sense that it is his will that bends to his wishes and the people working under him. To a certain extent this power is analogous to that exercised by an actor who 'gets over the footlights.' See 'Civilization' and realize for yourself if this is not true."

Business Sessions, Grand Ball and Manufacturers' Exhibits Make Des Moines Exposition Success—Many Prominent Exhibitors Present

Des Moines entertained motion picture men from all over the state and country at the annual two-day convention of the Iowa division, Motion Picture League of America, held the last week in May.

On the first day the morning was given over to the registration of exhibitors and a business session. A demonstration of projection and other machines was given in the afternoon. The first part of the evening was devoted to the showing of the latest film features and the latter part to an entertainment furnished by the various exchanges for the visitors. Boxing, vaudeville, pictures and a buffet lunch were included in the entertainment.

The second day was devoted to two business sessions and the evening was turned over to the big motion picture ball given by the Screen Club, at which several prominent screen stars were present.

The officers of the league are:

What Theater Men Are Doing

AN OPEN FORUM

Refuses Sensations That Reflect on Business

By M. B. Turner

Manager Turner's Theater, Greenwood, Arkansas

IT has been, and continues to be, somewhat of a struggle for me to keep my service paid for. Different towns require altogether different tactics, is my experience, and unfortunately the large exchanges fail to make the proper differentiations on rentals between live and dead towns. I have been running serial nights and some well-known comedian night. The latter months show about as much strength on the comedian nights as for the serial, with a possible argument in favor of the latter on account of one not being obliged, so to speak, to either the film company or the public to continue when the patronage does not warrant. I believe my average nights other than serial and specialty nights would show a regular loss if looked into very carefully.

I have in mind now to run classical or educational subjects at intervals. Aside from a pretty fair profit showing on the nights these are run, it seems to me such a course will elevate the general opinion as regards picture theaters and the proprietors. I keep away from the Jesse James and white slave type or ultra sensational picture plays, which doubtless show an awfully strong nightly profit, but operate strongly against the business to say nothing of me personally.

It is very well for V. L. S. E., Paramount and kindred organizations to talk twenty and twenty-five per day for picturized versions of the legitimate stage but you have to have different communities from my town to work stuff in this class. I was rather amused at the circular letter of one of these concerns. It stated there were several productions of note that from a merit standpoint alone were entitled to a showing (and really ought to be shown) in every village and hamlet throughout the country. These productions had been the means of buying automobiles for exhibitors. Perhaps I already drove a car, in which case the running of their pictures would enhance my popularity account and bank balance.

I haven't run them yet—and I'm not going to at $25 a throw. My gross wouldn't run beyond that, and when the gross is $25 I think the manager should have a minimum of $15 for himself. The big productions are all right but the price scale is all wrong.

Runs Paramounts and Metros

By Abe S. Guckenheimer

Proprietor, Arcadia Theater, Savannah, Ga.

The Arcadia was built four years ago last October. It seats 757 people on one floor and has no balcony. It was the first of the larger moving picture theaters built in the South.

I designed and built it myself. It represents an investment of $40,000 outside of the value of the lot. At the start I had two others associated with me, but am now the exclusive owner of the stock of the company. Prior to my entry in the moving picture business I conducted an extensive wholesale grocery business, but finding it unprofitable I discontinued it.

For the past two years the Arcadia has been an exclusive feature house. Up to about four months ago we changed our program daily but since that time I have been following the principle of changing every other day. We now run Paramounts and Metros entirely, and show these pictures on release dates. I find the two day showing of the best pictures far more satisfactory than a daily change. On the daily change we necessarily showed a number of mediocre features, which in my opinion detracted from the better productions.

I am now giving the house a general overhauling, both interior and exterior, and am installing six six-foot Typhoon fans.

I do not issue any house program, but use the newspapers extensively for the advertising of my daily bills.

Bang! at the Exchangeman

By Allan F. Sparrow

Secretary and Manager, Sparrow Amusement Company, Inc., Springfield, Vermont.

One day when Mr. J. Caius Caesar didn't have much of anything on his hands but a couple of wars or so, he wrote: "All Gaul is divided into three parts." So he began one of the first consolidations recorded in history.

When he had the Gaul fairly well corralled he turned it over to the moving picture exchangemen, who promptly eliminated the "u" and added an "l," appropriating all the gall that was loose about the world. And it has been so since those days. From time to time a being arose who grabbed off a bit of this gall, or found a substitute, called in the idiom of our land "bluff," and him the exchangemen welcomed as a brother, and fawned over him, and made him offers of much junk for little money. And the exhibitor was much pleased with himself, and thought he was one of the big noises—until he had run the pictures. Then he grew horns, and long whiskers, and admired himself in a large mirror and exclaimed to himself comfortingly: "Now I look even like the goat that I am." And the species waxed strong and plentiful.

But there came among them offsprings of another flock, meek of eye and trusting of disposition, even as the sheep of the fold. And the sheep and the goats got their sustenance from the same cans and gaudy paper. After a time the sheep, finding the fodder ill suited to their digestive system, looked for new fields and pastures green, particularly the fields where grow the long green. And they said one to another: "Let us pass the buck," and they passed him and all who flocked with him, and looked with tender eyes upon those who brought them rich food in the form of good plays, well produced, with films that would not cause an inundation when opened before them.

For sheep can go many months without water, and rain is an abomination to them, more especially when served lavishly on the screen. And they said to the junkmen, "Get hence, or some other place," and they got. And some wise exchangemen said to themselves, "These are queer creatures, but we must humor them," and began to feed them on the nourishment they desired. And sheep and exchangemen both waxed fat and healthy and wealthy. And so it came to pass that the goats decreased in numbers, and those who tended them passed as the ships in the night, till there are few of their tribes left. And they are hungry and ill-fed.

"It costs us an average of $100 to land a new customer," said the head of a prominent exchange to me. "Do you think we are not doing all we can to retain him?" That is the general policy now, yet this particular exchange was so inefficient that their service was retained just four weeks before I canceled. Their inspection department did not take care of the films properly; the booker did not consider whether he would be able to get a show back from the previous exhibitor in time to send to the next theater; their poster department was lax about sending paper to fit the shows finally sent, but the treasurer was prompt in seeing that every bill was paid a week in advance. Money was their sole outlook—the money coming into their own coffers.

Another house which drew a cancellation had excellent pictures, but films which broke repeatedly. Another charged me nearly double the price paid by other exhibitors in larger towns in this vicinity—all the traffic would bear, and a little more. The pictures were excellent, but the price prohibitive.

On the other hand, one salesman visited me off and on for a year without result. Recently the time seemed ripe to try some of his pictures, and they have proven very acceptable at the price now in force.

My entrance into the game came after nearly thirty years in newspaper work, broken only by occasional flights into the theatrical field. I had a fair knowledge of human nature, knew what the general public liked from hearing comments on the outside of the houses, and had some idea of the business through association in minor degree with several moving picture theaters. First, I learned to run a machine.

Then I bought the best equipment on the market, two motor-driven machines, with the highest grade lenses. Then I hired one of the best operators in this section, gave him an assistant, and employed a pianist who plays the pictures. With this for a foundation, even before the theater was completed, I went to Mr. E. J. Farrell, manager of the Boston branch of the General Film Company, told him I was a greenhorn, but intended to learn the business, and asked for advice. He had one of his assistants take me around and introduce me to other exchange managers, told me a lot which I did not know, and which has been a great help.

Then he made me a price which was not a cut from the prices of others, but which seemed so alluring that it was accepted, and which has been continued ever since. I do not get all my films from him, but such as I do get are what I want. I have but to ask for a certain class of pictures and they are booked. Stuff I don't want is not shoved off on me. I demand the same treatment from all others, and if they do not give it their business association with me is very brief. I am known as a crank and a kicker; but our tribe is increasing in number every year.

Exchangemen are coming to realize that we are doing them favors by purchasing their goods. They formerly seemed to think they were doing us a favor by allowing us to use their films. Those who have gotten that idea out of their heads are now the most successful, and ere long will dominate the business, so far as the renting end is concerned; but they cannot longer dominate the class of men who have entered the managerial field.

A Wide Awake Team

From J. Marks, proprietor and manager of The Orpheum Theater, Clarksburg, W. Va., comes a letter saying:

"We would like to be numbered among the 'Wide Awake Few,' who not only use their ability to book great features but make a great specialty of their advertising.

"At every event of the year we publish a program fitting the season.

"Our advertising is in the hands of Mr. E. Richardson, our able assistant manager, and he delivers the goods and brings results."

There is no doubt that this team has its eyes open all the time. Their Easter offering in the form of a most artistic program bears witness to this fact. The cover design with a background of grey and white stripes setting off to advantage the figure in colors of a girl surrounded by Easter lilies, is very attractive. The inside of the folder also promises an interesting week for the patrons of the theater showing Shubert, Bluebird, Red Feather, Mutual, Equitable and Broadway features, and advertises the "largest pipe organ in the state."

E. Richardson "delivers the goods" in the following original verse:

A POME

Flicker! flicker! little film,
You're a jewel in your realm;
As eager people go and come
To see you at the Orpheum.

Verse is usually a precarious thing to use in advertising but the rhyme above brings out "Or-phe-um" so oddly that it does leave its effect on the mind of the reader.

Five Dollars Admission Price

"Cousin Jim," Chicago society's own photodrama, written and acted entirely by members of the elite, received its premiere at the Strand Theater on June 2. Grand opera prices, from $2 to $5, ruled at this performance, the proceeds of which will be devoted to various charitable performances. The complete Strand-Triangle performance, including Bessie Barriscale in "The Sorrows of Love," was also presented. Warde Johnstone, director of the famous Strand Symphony Orchestra, supplied special musical interpretation for "Cousin Jim," which is a brilliant combination of exciting melodrama and comedy.

The authors of "Cousin Jim" are prominent in the Chicago social world. The production was staged by the Van Dee Producing Company of Chicago.

"Cousin Jim" is a thrilling story of imaginary life in the "400," in which stolen gems, a mysterious nobleman and a dauntless detective are figures. Most of the scenes were actually laid at the exclusive Casino Club, the Onwentsia and Indian Hill Country clubs, and at the Blackstone Hotel. The mansions of a number of wealthy folk in Chicago and in Lake Forest were utilized for interior settings.

"Somewhere in France," a war story from the pen of the late Richard Harding Davis, which appeared in the Metropolitan Magazine, has been purchased by Thomas H. Ince.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

THIS controversy regarding the value of the reviews of the films published in trade journals is beginning to be very interesting. This week brings another theater man's opinion of the work of the reviewers. How many more have something to say on this subject? It would be very interesting to have a number of exhibitors tell whether they use the reviews as a help in selecting their program, what they would like to have shown in these reviews which they do not now contain, and their opinion of them in general. Come on with your ideas on this subject; we will be glad to hear them all.

34—Sometime ago we received an inquiry from the Motion Picture News, asking us to state our opinion regarding their reviews. We replied that the reviews in all the tradepapers were practically worthless and that it was necessary for us to get information from a private source. We now desire to give you a concrete example why we have reached this conclusion. Recently five exhibitors were given an advance screening of Florence Reed in "The Woman's Law" and all of them pronounced it a very poor feature and refused to book it. The information we get from a private source states "the story is cheap melodrama, lacks sustained interest, has little suspense and few thrills." Reviews are absolutely worthless unless you call a spade a spade, regardless of the amount of advertising you get from the manufacturer.

Evidently the difficulty with most of these exhibitors who are condemning the reviews is that they are putting a wrong construction on the object of the review. In discussing this question last week I tried to show you what points the reviewer tried to bring out in his writings. But the ultimate object and aim of these reviews is what the manager does not seem to understand.

The reviewers are not a Board of Censors, nor do they try to give that impression. They are trying to save the busy exhibitor who does not have time to see every film himself before he shows it to his patrons, or the theater man who is so situated that he cannot see the films himself. They are not trying to exploit or condemn any film. Do not consider them as dramatic critics, for they are not. They are not trying to bias your opinion one way or the other, but are aiming to give you all the details of the film, its good points and poor points, a general idea of the photography, the acting, the unusualness or triteness of the plot, and then allow you to exercise your own judgment as to whether you would like it or it would be popular with your audience.

Another question is whether the theater man in many cases gets all out of these written examinations that are embodied in them. I do not believe they appreciate the finesse of these reviews; they read them too literally and prosaically, and unless it is utterly condemned, think nothing is being said against the production.

The idea of the reviews is not to influence you one way or the other, but to help you see all sides of the picture. Why should the reviewer set himself up as a little god whose word is law and the turning up or down of whose thumb means the killing or exploiting of a picture? You would be one of the first to condemn this arbitrary ruling. His personal approval or disapproval would be of no assistance to you, for that is only one man's opinion. To get right down to rock bottom, there is no such thing as an unbiased criticism of films, books, persons, or anything else. Every person has his own tastes and is influenced by them, and in a group of five or six people the criticism of the same object and the appeal it made to them would probably be entirely different in each case.

Let us use a concrete example of what it would mean if the reviewer set himself up as the final judge by whose opinion you must abide. Suppose a critic came into your theater and cared nothing at all for the program you had booked for the week; in fact, deemed it simply worthless, although you had given careful thought to the patrons to whom you were catering and had seen every film yourself before booking it. Would you like that critic—that one displeased man—to go out and publish an article to the effect that your program was worthless, did not contain a thrill and showed nothing but cheap melodrama, and advising everyone to stay away from your theater that week? Of course this was just one man's personal opinion, but an influential man, and one whose word would be considered by all who read the article. Your program would be killed and your patrons would go elsewhere as long as you were showing this bill, and yet had they attended the performance without having first read this animadversion, probably at least five out of eight would have enjoyed it greatly. In this instance you would be the first one to condemn the critic for setting his opinion above that of everyone else and spoiling your business. Would you not have been much better pleased if that critic had given a fair criticsm pointing out the good points and the bad, and leaving it for the public to decide whether or not it cared to see the play?

Now, put yourself in the place of the manufacturer in a similar case. Perhaps some reviewer did not like the feature he was releasing and instead of giving a review gave an arbitrary personal criticism and condemned the film unmercifully and advised all exhibitors to refrain from showing it in their house. The managers would take his advice, the feature would be killed on one man's say-so, and if it had been booked it might have proved a very good business-getter for you and most pleasing to your audience.

Take the case of "The Woman's Law," which you mention. You relied implicitly on the "information from a private source" regarding this feature and did not book it. And yet I know of any number of theaters where it was shown and it "went big." You took another's adverse criticism and did not exercise any judgment on your own part. Knowing your patrons and their likes and dislikes to a great extent, you may have been sure that they would not care for this particular play, but is that any reason that the patrons of another theater in a different location might not like it?

Your remark that the reviews are based on the amount of advertising the manufacturer gives the trade journal is rather toxic. I think if you will analyze this matter you will find that your statement is untrue. For a test of the truth of this assertion take two or three issues of MOTOGRAPHY and look over the advertisers and then look over the reviews and decide whether you do not want to modify this aspersion. The reviews are not given with any thought whatever as to whether the manufacturer is represented in the advertising pages of the paper. The aim is to give a variety, to show all the different productions of all the companies, and to make the information as diversified as possible.

35—A friend who is interested with me in my theater business, and I have been having an argument and neither one can be persuaded that he is in the wrong, so we decided to write you and abide by your decision. We are running a 500 capacity theater and are going to make some improvements and revisions in it. We have always had our ticket seller in a booth on the sidewalk and my friend claims that this is the only place the box office should be. I claim that all the theaters in town have their ticket offices on the outside and as we have room in the lobby it would be better to have it inside with just a window like a regular theater because this would be different from the other motion picture houses. What do you think?

As in all arguments, I expect both sides have brought up some points which are very strong, and although your idea of having your house different from the others in small matters as well as large, is very commendable and a spirit to be fostered, still I agree with your friend that the proper place for your ticket office is on the sidewalk.

From the time motion picture houses were first started, this little ticket booth in front of the theater has been a sign of the trade. It is in itself an advertisement, for anyone looking down the block immediately sees it and knows that it means there is a theater in the block devoted to the showing of moving pictures. I believe you would quickly agree that any kind of a sign in front of your theater was an aid in attracting attention and getting business; then why does not this outside ticket booth come under the same head of a sign?

People always like to go where the crowd is, and will always come from all directions to satisfy their curiosity as to why the crowd is forming. A ticket window may bring a crowd standing in line in the lobby of your theater, but that crowd will not be seen except by people going past your theater, while if the line starts at the ticket booth on the street it will spread to the curbing and along the street and people from both ends of the block will see it, also people passing on the street cars at either intersecting street will notice it and the comment will immediately follow, "Just see the crowd. They must have a good bill at that theater tonight." And probably they will come down that way to see what the attraction is. You have aroused their interest, you have advertised your theater, you have brought them to the door of the theater, and this advertising has cost you nothing; in fact, it has brought much money into your house.

In considering this question of the ticket booth, another very important matter to be considered is the ticket seller. You may think that it does not matter who sells the tickets, but if so, you are making a grave mistake, for the ticket seller may add greatly to the popularity of your house. In the first place it is better to have a girl for this position than a man—and the prettier the girl, the better. But if she isn't pretty, at least she must be affable and possessed of unlimited patience. The public is fond of asking questions, and no matter how trivial, it wants due respect paid to its inquiries and courtesy to itself. This is where the ticket seller can help the house greatly by her fund of general information and her manner in answering these incessant questions. Also it is well to instruct her to become acquainted with the regular patrons. If they are greeted with a cheery "good-evening" and called by name as they put down their money, it gives them a personal feeling of possession in the theater.

36—My theater is situated in a small town and is a small theater, seating about 300 people. There is one other theater in the town about the same size as mine. We both do a very good business during the winter and I imagine about split the profits, but in the summer the young people are having out-door parties and picnics and our patronage falls off so that both of us usually have to close up during July and August. Can you suggest any means whereby I could keep the patronage during the summer and get the people to come inside for their entertainment?

Why insist upon the people coming inside for their entertainment during the summer? Why not instead take your entertainment outside to them? Isn't it possible for you to find a vacant lot the use of which can be obtained for a very small sum, and open an airdome for the summer months? This will be an innovation in your town, and might be made quite the social center for the town during the summer, and at the same time keep up your profits during the warm weather.

If there is not already a fence around the lot, a canvas eight or ten feet high can be erected on stakes to form an enclosed yard. The enclosure can be arranged in a number of ways. You can have it devoted entirely to pictures with the screen of the usual theater size erected at one end and the operator's booth at the other and the chairs arranged in front of the screen as in any motion picture theater, and the entire airdome conducted the same as your regular theater; or the chairs may be arranged around tables where light refreshments and cool drinks are served and the pictures seen at the same time. Another arrangement is to divide the lot by the picture screen and the admission gate, the front part of the enclosure being used as a refreshment park in which the music from the airdome piano or orchestra may be heard, while the rear portion of the lot is arranged as the theater itself.

Nothing elaborate either in the interior or exterior equipment is necessary for the successful airdome. The chairs and tables may be of the ordinary kitchen variety painted an attractive color, and the booths merely sheds without any pretense of architectural beauty. The illumination scheme is simple, consisting of waterproof incandescent wall fixtures mounted on the fences and pavilions, or strung along waterproof leads extending from one post to another. The ticket booth is a simple form of sentry box located at the gate.

Of course the airdome is virtually a fair-weather proposition. But by a little added expense a pavilion could be built which would form a protection in inclement weather and the pictures could be shown just the same. Probably not as many people could be accommodated, but it would keep the rainy evenings from being a total loss.

It might be a good plan also to erect a stage for dancing and vary your evenings in this way, having pictures a certain number of nights and dances the others, or show the pictures for a while and then allow the young people to dance the rest of the evening. The variations which could be suggested are many, but you need to study your patrons and the customs of the town to know just what will appeal to the people and bring them into your airdome.

Making a Convention Successful

IT is very easy to draw an analogy between the motion picture business and a public service industry such as furnishing electric light and power. The local electric company, like the picture theater, sells nothing tangible to the customer; both sell "service"—the use of something. There are other points of similarity. For instance, in both cases today's goods must be sold today; they cannot be laid on the shelf to await a possible future sale.

The National Electric Light Association is made up of operators of electric light plants, small and large, all over the country, just as the Exhibitors' League is made up of the men who operate picture theaters. But the electrical association is so old that it has now held thirty-nine conventions. Consequently it has, through long experience, gradually perfected a convention system that moves its annual meetings like clock-work and makes them profitable as well as enjoyable.

The last convention of the electrical association was held in Chicago last week, and the attendance was about six thousand. This is about what the Exhibitors' League anticipated for next July.

The general convention committee with fifty-five members, all but eleven of them local men; the exhibition committee with eleven members; the reception and entertainment committees with ten each; the local transportation with five; the local registration with seven; the local industries with eight; the hotel committee with five; the finance committee with three; the ladies' auxiliary with twenty-four; and the press bureau, all are appointed about four months in advance of the convention. This allows plenty of time for planning and systematizing. It may be mentioned in passing that the association has over fifty standing committees to handle its business.

The handling of registrations is interesting. Every member is registered without charge except those who are subordinates in manufacturing member companies. These are charged five dollars to register; all male guests are charged five dollars. Each member registers one lady guest free; all other ladies are charged one dollar. These charges help defray the association's annual expense of some thirty thousand dollars. Most of this sum is made up, however, by a method which we fear would not work in the picture business—the assessment of a percentage on the total gross income of member companies.

Committee reports and papers to be read, of which there are a great many, are printed in advance of the convention, and every one who registers receives a set free. Most of these, however, are briefly abstracted on the official program for the convenience of listeners.

The following convention details used by the electrical association are perfectly applicable to a motion picture convention, and some of them at least are worth adopting:

A booklet on Chicago with street map and floor plan of the Coliseum, and directions for getting to the Coliseum from different hotels, with hotel list.

A list of committees.

Advance papers of addresses and committee reports, with dates and hours of delivery.

A publicity bureau for getting into the newspapers.

An information bureau for visitors.

An entertainment program giving the entertainment committee and the dates, hours and duration of entertainment.

A list of Chicago's amusement places not included in the entertainment program.

A booklet on local industries of interest to the trade.

A telephone in each exhibition booth with a private branch exchange switchboard so that all have the same number.

The League is big enough to have all these features, and more, if it wants them. Whether the convention committee decides to go so far in its scheme is up to its members and the funds at their disposal. Some of the things we have mentioned are already under way or contemplated. Others are probably unnecessary. But the list may be of some help in its mere suggestion of conveniences.

An adequate number of committees with an adequate number of members on each committee (all of whom should be exhibitors), will go far toward making the convention wheels turn smoothly. It is better to have too many committeemen than too few, especially of they are selected because they like to work. And it is well to have on each committee, if possible, at least one member who has had executive experience in other industries.

The idea of charging for registrations is, we think, good as it is practiced by the electrical association. We are not so sure about the method practiced by the northwestern exhibitors at their Minneapolis convention a few weeks ago, when everybody was charged for registering and nothing was free. This system helps the treasury; but we fear it makes for a small attendance.

A great many of the present school of successful exhibitors came from the ranks of other industries. These, as well as the old showmen whose life has been devoted to entertainment, have ideas as to the best conduct of a convention. We believe the convention committees would welcome such suggestions for what they were worth, provided they were offered in the proper spirit of helpfulness, and not with a selfish insistence on their adoption.

Cruelty to Animals

A CALIFORNIA magazine, the organ of the San Francisco Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, has printed the statement that animals are frequently subjected to suffering in the production of pictures. The stories of cruelty are labeled "too revolting for reproduction." The article, as usual with such statements, does not name any production; though it does name three companies, all of them highly regarded for the excellence and high moral character of their work.

People engaged in human effort are always sensitive, and so it is natural that the California paper's plaint should have been taken up by affiliated organs in other cities, one of which has written to the National Board of Review about it. Secretary McGuire of the Board replied in his usual courteous fashion, and promised to issue a bulletin on the subject to the film producers.

It is obvious that the only possible motive for a director's cruelty to animals would be for the production of a film scene, where his action would be advertised to all the world. Yet our reviewers say they have never observed any such scenes. Furthermore, in the inconceivable circumstances that the depiction of cruelty was necessary a bit of trick photography is always easier, cheaper and pleasanter to the director's nerves.

We agree that the charge would be a serious one if there were any foundation for it, because we are quite sure the public does not enjoy watching the mistreatment of defenseless creatures, and would resent such "entertainment." But there never is any occasion for cruelty in the work of production; it could not be presented on the scene if it were practiced; and directors and players alike are really more humane by instinct and temperament than the average human being.

Of course this is a big industry, with thousands of people employed in it, and no doubt their characteristics check up about the same as the characteristics of the whole human race.

But as to the practice of cruelty to animals in the making of pictures, it simply is not done. There is no logic in it, because as a practice it could never go on the screen.

Mutual-Chaplin Films in Australia

NEW FEATURE RELEASE POLICY INAUGURATED

THAT Charlie Chaplin is competent to earn his $670,000 salary is shown by the popularity of the Mutual-Chaplin comedies and their money-getting proclivities. In addition to other revenue, the sum of $175,000 has been paid in royalties for the right to release the new comedies in Australia, and it is stated that this represents but a small fraction of the total foreign revenue to be earned.

In the United States a total of $1,300,000 in bookings has been reached, which establishes a new record.

With "Whispering Smith" released on June 5 and "Soul Mates" on June 8, the new feature policy of Mutual gets into full swing.

Frederick Warde, Richard Bennett, Mary Miles Minter, Helen Holmes, Florence La Badie, William Russell and other stars of the stage and screen will be presented as the featured player in these new Mutual Star Productions. Miss Minter is now at work at the American-Mutual studios in Santa Barbara on her first feature release. Frederick Warde has begun his first feature at the Thanhouser studios. Mr. Bennett will leave for the American-Mutual studios just as soon as his theatrical engagement in New York is concluded. First of the Mutual star productions featuring Miss La Badie, Miss Holmes and William Russell have been completed. while the work on the productions in which the various other stars are to be featured is well under way.

"Whispering Smith," starring Helen Holmes, was the first of the Mutual star productions. This was adapted from Frank H. Spearman's novel of the same name and produced under the direction of J. P. McGowan.

William Russell is playing the principal role in "Soul Mates," under the direction of J. Edward Hungerford. Charlotte Burton plays opposite Mr. Russell and is supported by Leona Hutton and Harry Keenan.

Other releases for this week included the Gaumont-Mutual three-act drama, "Flames of Vengeance." This production presents two feminine stars, Gertrude Robinson and Iva Shepard.

Four two-reelers also appeared on this program, "Jealousy's First Wife," featuring Vivian Rich and Alfred Vosburgh, from the American studio; "John Brewster's Wife," from Thanhouser; "The Pilgrim," a Mustang offering, with Frank Borzage and Anna Little in the leading roles; "The Lion's Nemesis," featuring Margaret Gibson and the Bostock animals, a Horsely release.

Variety of Comedies

A variety of subjects is offered in the comedies. Beauty presents Carro Halloway and John Sheehan in "Billy Van Duesen's Operation," and Orral Humphrey in "Thinim Stout." Falstaff offers "Advertisementers," featuring "Conrad and Oscar," released June 5, and "Where Wives Win," June 10. The Vogue releases include "A Plane Story," June 5, and "His Blow-Out," June 8. "Jerry's Big Lark," for release June 9, is the Cub comedy presenting George Ovey.

"Reel Life," the Mutual film magazine, "The Weekly Mutual" and "See America First" will be released on the usual days.

Kolb and Dill, the German comedians of vaudeville fame, will enact a series of five-act comedies for the American-Mutual program. The first of this series, "A Million for Mary," is now being produced at the Santa Barbara studio.

A number of five-reel features have been written especially for William Russell. The first of these, "Soul Mates," will be released on June 8, and will be followed by "The Guide," "The Highest Bid" and "The Man Who Would Not Die." Charlotte Burton will appear opposite Mr. Russell in many of these productions, and Leona Hutton, Harry Keenan and others will appear in his support from time to time.

"The Highest Bid" was adapted for the screen by J. Edward Hungerford from Arthur Gooden's story of the same name. Charlotte Burton and Harry Keenan appear as Mr. Russell's chief support, and the play shows some wonderful scenes of a great forest fire that rages through the Sierra Mountains.

In "The Guide," a drama of the north woods, staged under the direction of Jack Prescott, Mr. Russell assumes the role of a guide, and on the side a poet and dreamer.

The second of the five-part Thanhouser classics, "Woman, Saint and Devil," starring Florence La Badie, is well under way at the New Rochelle studios. Frederick Sullivan is directing the production, and for the first time Miss La Badie appears in a quadruple role, playing all four parts.

Work on the seven-act feature, starring Audrey Munson, is nearing completion at the American-Mutual studios under the direction of Rea Berger. In this production Miss Munson appears frequently in the nude, illustrating a number of works by famous artists and sculptors for which she posed.

Exhibitors Favor Federal Bill

At a recent meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce the organization adopted resolutions favoring the Hughes federal censorship bill now before congress. The league did not at first favor the bill, and took the above stand only following the changes recently made in the proposed law.

Gertrude Robinson and Sydney Mason, popular Mutual stars, are to be the featured players. Iva Shepard, famous Mutual "vampire," John Reinhard, John Macklin, Albert Macklin, Mathilda Baring, Charles W. Travis and James Levering are the other players in the cast.

One Hundred Children in "Chip's Carmen"

Great interest is being displayed in the Juvenile Film Corporation's latest production featuring little Joe Monahan in his imitation of Charlie Chaplin's burlesque on "Carmen." The kid burlesques of the Juvenile company are being successfully exhibited over the leading circuits and the antics of the Chip off the Old Block who gives a wonderfully clever impersonation of Chaplin are always received with enthusiasm.

Chip's burlesque on "Carmen" is the most ambitious effort of the Juvenile company. It was staged in Fort Lee and the athletic part of the Oritani Field Club of Hackensack was used for the burlesque bull fight. About one hundred children appear in the picture. Chip is ably supported by his little sister, Janethel, who acts the part of "Carmen" to perfection.

One of the features of the production is the dancing of little Dolores Metrovich who gives promise of some day rivaling Pavlowa.

"Chip's Carmen" is bound to afford a great deal of amusement wherever shown.

"The Fall of a Nation" at the Liberty

The National Drama Corporation will present Thomas Dixon and Victor Herbert's musical film spectacle, "The Fall of a Nation," for the first time on any stage Tuesday evening, June 6, at the Liberty Theater, New York. The playhouse is the same at which the Griffith-Dixon spectacle, "The Birth of a Nation," was first presented.

Alterations have been made at the Liberty, including some striking new changes in the technique of picture presentation. Original costumes for the attaches will be in keeping with the play.

About two weeks later than the New York opening, namely, on Monday, June 19, "The Fall of a Nation" will be presented in Los Angeles. Clune's Auditorium has been leased for the summer.

While continuing to occupy its offices at 720 Longacre building, in New York, for promotion and booking purposes, the National Drama Corporation has taken a large executive suite in the Subway Central building on the south side of Times Square.

New York Rialto Gets "Macbeth"

S. L. Rothapfel, managing director of the Rialto Theater, New York, has secured exclusive rights for the first public presentation of Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree's production of "Macbeth" as his ten days contribution to the observance of the Shakespearean tercentenary, starting June 4 and terminating June 10.

In keeping with the dignity of the occasion all the incidental features of the Rialto program—news and topical pictures, the comedy and usual musical program—will be eliminated. Instead an elaborate musical setting has been arranged which will be played by the Rialto orchestra and the grand organ.

After the Tree engagement a return of the regular Triangle program is announced and Douglas Fairbanks and Bessie Love will appear in "Peggie Mixes In."

Changes in V. L. S. E. Forces

"BATTLE CRY OF PEACE" PLAYING TO S. R. O.

RICHARD V. McFARLAND, the Lubin New York representative of the Big Four, has been elected to the position of assistant treasurer of the company, to succeed Paul Melies, who recently resigned. Mr. McFarland has held managerial positions with film companies and legitimate companies for a number of years, has been a member of the Lamb's Club, which has brought him in close personal touch with the stars and playwrights of the theatrical profession and is also an expert photographer and has assisted in the direction of many Lubin features.

Frank Redfield, formerly booker of the Chicago office of the V-L-S-E, has been promoted to the position of assistant manager. A. B. Philbin will succeed Mr. Redfield as booker. Two new salesmen have also been taken on at the Chicago office, George Berg, who will travel in Wisconsin, and C. F. Troupe, who will cover southeastern Illinois.

In the New York office Jess Levine, formerly with the World Film Corporation, has been engaged to succeed W. P. Allen, who has been transferred to the Syracuse branch.

J. S. Hebrew, of the Philadelphia office, announces the appointment of Nat Glasser as salesman for the Washington office and Ernest A. Bezouska as salesman for Philadelphia.

Little Marjorie Sterrett, who started a fund for the building of a battleship for the United States navy, will appear soon in a Lubin strip film. This is designed to aid the exhibitors exploiting "The Nation's Peril" in their advertising. In this picture Marjorie describes her feelings after viewing "The Nation's Peril," and explains just what she did to start the fund.

The Times Picayune of New Orleans is launching a campaign to stimulate interest in preparedness in that city. As a first step in this campaign, the paper arranged with the Crescent Theater to show the Vitagraph feature, "The Battle Cry of Peace," which has been playing to standing room only. Theater parties have been arranged at which the G. A. R., the Sons and Daughters of the Revolution, the Spanish War Veterans and various other patriotic organizations are the guests.

The Isis Theater, Longmont, Colorado, issued a most ingenious herald advertising "The Battle Cry of Peace." This was printed on varied hues of wall paper, and read:

"Look! We are tearing the wall paper off our walls to make room for the crowds that will want to see 'The Battle Cry of Peace.'"

Through their victory resulting in the vetoing of the Christman-Wheeler censorship bill by Governor Whitman, censorship foes believe they have found the way to block all these unfair bills. In this case the attack was centered on the faulty construction of the statute rather than upon the stock arguments of those urging the passage of the bill. In the defense set up by the film interests, of which the address of Walter W. Irwin, general manager of the V-L-S-E, was foremost, those who appeared before Governor Whitman confined themselves almost entirely to the analysis of the legal weaknesses of the measure, and the governor in his opinion justifying the veto of the measure practically ignored the merits or demerits of censorship and based his rejection of the bill on the imperfection of its drafting.

Advertising for Exhibitors

V. L. S. E. is co-operating with its exhibitors by sending out pamphlets of "Exhibitors' Helps" and "Theater Program" announcements prepared by the advertising department on each feature released on its program, with the idea of giving the exhibitor some out-of-the-ordinary advertising schemes for each feature.

On one feature the exhibitors' helps may be an original lobby display described in detail, on another a co-operative idea which brings in the assistance of a department store or some other business house in the town, which in turn also increases patronage.

On "Artie, the Millionaire Kid," the Vitagraph Blue Ribbon release, the suggestion was made to have a college chap and a pretty girl ride around town in a bright red racer decorated with college pennants and banners, and throw out specially printed green paper to resemble dollar bills with a verse about Artie on one side and on the other an invitation to come to the theater and see him.

For "The Little Shepherd of Bargain Row" a cooperative idea was worked out, whereby the bargain store in town ran a bargain sale, using a central figure in its window display of a shepherd, and an advertisement of the theater, and at the theater a slide was run announcing the "Little Shepherd Sale" at the store.

Richard W. McFarland, Lubin New York representative of Big Four, newly appointed assistant treasurer of V-L-S-E.

Pearce's Bijou Dream Theater, New Orleans, during the run of Vitagraph's feature, "The Hero of Submarine D2."

To exploit "At Piney Ridge," a Selig Red Seal play, it was suggested that the lobby be decorated in pine trees and pine cones and the inside of the theater be permeated with balsam, while outside the theater two men dressed as rugged mountaineers, carrying rifles, handed out pine cones to passersby and inserted in each cone a herald of "At Piney Ridge."

These are concrete examples of the ideas which are furnished to the exhibitor through the bulletins sent out by the advertising department.

V. L. S. E. congratulated itself in making a scoop on all the Michigan avenue theaters, in Chicago, last week. The four houses on the prominent boulevard all ran V. L. S. E. program.

OHIO RECOGNIZES CHILDREN

Northeastern Ohio Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Starts Baby-Saving Campaign—Babyland Film Company Also Organized

Cleveland, Ohio, is coming to the front in its movement for films for the children, enacted by the children, and also in its campaign to aid the babies.

The members of the Northeastern Ohio Motion Picture Exhibitors' League are planning a baby-saving campaign for the benefit of the babies' dispensary and hospital of Cleveland. The motion pictures used in this campaign will be run in 152 theaters and will show the work the dispensary is doing in saving babies' lives. It is hoped in this way to educate the mothers in caring for babies in poor health and to arouse greater interest in dispensary work on the part of the public.

The Reserve Photoplay Company has offered to make the films at cost, and Director Weston will go to the dispensary and direct the making of the pictures.

Benjamin J. Sawyer, president of the league; Adolph Mahrer of the Milo Theater, and Frank M. Kenney of the Clark Theater have charge of this campaign.

To interest the children themselves, the Babyland Film Company has leased three acres of land for studio and grounds in which will be produced fairy stories with an entire cast of children. The grounds will be made to represent a miniature fairyland. The first picture to be produced will be the fairy tale of "Puss in Boots," in which spectacle about 200 children will take part.

Women Discuss Children's Programs

At the biennial convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, held in New York recently, motion pictures, and particularly the problem of the small town picture theater and films for children, were among the most important subjects discussed.

During the past year the movement toward better films has been growing rapidly and special attention is being given by women's clubs all over the country to programs especially for children.

Mrs. Alice Rice Carroll of Boston spoke on the subject of co-operation between club women and picture men in the presentation of children's programs.

Orrin G. Cocks, secretary of the board of censorship, spoke on censorship and the child question.

John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, gave a talk on the producer's views of the censorship and children's films problems. This was the first time that the side of the producer in this matter has ever been presented to the club women.

S. L. Rothapfel entertained the visiting women at the Rialto Theater and showed them a model children's program and gave them a little talk on this subject.

Teacher-Parent Clubs Choose Films

By William Noble.

At the request of members of the Teacher-Parent clubs of the various schools of Muskogee, Oklahoma, the Gaiety Theater at that place has arranged to show children's pictures every Saturday afternoon and night, the films to be passed upon by a committee of the clubs named, who will act as a board of censors. Every effort will be made by both the management of the Gaiety and the members of the Teacher-Parent clubs to get pictures for the special shows that are clean and educational.

The first Saturday matinee showed the picture, "His Prehistoric Past," featuring Charlie Chaplin; "Old Doc Yak," a cartoon picture; "In Our Navy"; "Busted Hearts and Tapped Wires." Other pictures specially appealing to children will be shown every Saturday afternoon and at night.

Other Muskogee, Oklahoma, theaters are preparing to follow suit and show pictures that the children like to see.

Eubank Seriously Injured

Victor Eubank, publicity director for the Essanay company of Chicago, was the victim of a serious automobile accident on May 26. The machine in which he was returning home from the theater was running through Lincoln Park at a moderate pace when it skidded on the wet pavement and struck a tree. Mr. Eubank suffered a broken leg, severe bruises, and several gashes about the head, one of which required six stitches to close. He was taken to the Alexandrian Brothers hospital. Physicians have stated that it will require six or eight weeks for the publicity man's injuries to heal, but his friends are hoping to see him back at his helm in a shorter time.

It cost Alfred Hamburger several hundred dollars for one advertisement which he ran in the Chicago Tribune advertising "God's Country and the Woman," the Vitagraph-V-L-S-E feature in eight reels running at Hamburger's Fine Arts Theater. And that was only one of the big spaces which Mr. Hamburger purchased for that show.

He also kept two real woodsmen with fur caps and wampuses parading around Chicago with "God's Country and the Woman" painted on their backs for three weeks. These walking ads were paid $3.50 per day each.

After a day of work about the docks of San Francisco, the Helen Holmes company, under the direction of J. P. McGowan, left that port last week for Honolulu, where they are to make exterior scenes in the production of a five-reel story of the Kimberly mines, entitled "The Diamond Runners."

Russell E. Smith, the well-known photoplay author, has been added to the Thomas H. Ince staff.

New Talent for International

"MYSTERIES OF MYRA" GOING STRONG

CASTLES in the air are usually built only to be shattered, but not so with six girls in Manhattan, whose castles were placed upon a firm and lasting foundation by the International Film Service, Inc. Out of all the thousands of girls who have dreamed of seeing themselves famous on the screen, who have said, "I've got good looks and carry myself well; I know I would go big in pictures if they'd only give me a chance, but they won't," a half-dozen are going to have a chance to see their dreams come true as a result of the unique contest carried on by the International during the recent exposition.

The winners of this contest, who are going to have their chance to act for the screen, represent six distinct types.

Julia Dorland is the Ethel Barrymore type, soulful and suggestive of tragedies.

Mary Cranston is on the sunshine and roses order, guileness and innocence stand out resplendent.

Frieda Peterson is a female Viking—a Norsewoman, suggesting the rugged beauty of her native shores.

Mary Brown, athletic, slim and lissome, gives promise of becoming the International Hazardous Helen or Perilous Polly.

Helen Raferty is the leading lady au-fait, equally stunning on bathing beach or ballroom floor.

Helene Montrose could be only one thing—a vampire. Her eyes suggest the mysteries of the Orient, the mischief of a Pierrot, the shyness of the sweet girl graduate.

Fully five hundred film magnates, exhibitors and press representatives gathered at Marcus Loew's New York Theater roof for a special showing of the sixth, seventh and eighth episodes of "Mysteries of Myra," accompanied by a musical score prepared expressly for each episode. This pre-showing of a feature series comes as a distinct novelty and a welcome innovation to the reviewers who have become accustomed to looking at one episode only at a pre-showing in a stuffy projection room—without music.

Charles W. Goddard gives an interesting answer to an article by a bright young man on how to write moving picture serials, in which the discerning boy states that serials full of exciting matter, thrills, mystery, suspense, crime, etc., are not what the public wants, and that he has left these out of his own work. Mr. Goddard states that serials of this class would be very easy to write, in fact, everyone could turn out scenarios for about thirty cents a ton, F. O. B. But the public has shown that it does not like pallid dramas and so all the big successes are crowded with elements of suspense, thrill and mystery. To the slur cast upon "improbabilities" in the films, he answers that to some people any novelty is classed as an improbability; and to the aspersion that the films are not true to ordinary life, he replies that no one would like them if they were, for nobody really wants to see a chapter of ordinary life. In summing up, he states that the pallid play is easy for the writer, easy for the director, easy for the actor, easy for everyone in the world except the theater-goer who unfortunately is the only one who is of the slightest importance.

How many men follow the vocation to which they are assigned by their fond parents or advising friends? How many of the motion picture fans would have liked Herbert Hancock ("Hank") to have entered the ministry, for which he was scheduled? From the clergy to manager of the animated cartoon and fashion department of a film company is a long stride, but one which Mr. Hancock was well able to make as a result of his many years in the newspaper work, starting as an office boy, advancing to cub reporter, to editor of a column, conductor of the fashion and magazine pages, editor of the society, dramatic and fashion departments and thence to his present position. Speaking of the cartoons, Mr. Hancock says he does not mean to appeal to the "lowbrow," but to work them out along popular lines of thought, striving for realism and treating the characters as if actually existing and trying to think for them and make them do what a regular live person would do under similar conditions.

New York Strand's Program

The week of May 28 the Strand Theater, New York, presented Blanche Sweet in Lasky's "The Thousand Dollar Husband." Of considerable interest in the program supporting the feature was the first of Max Figman's one-reel comedies. Another important feature was Finley's educational studies of wild animals. There was also a scenic of American national parks and a Mutt and Jeff comedy cartoon.

In lieu of the usual overture Carl Edouarde, director of the Strand concert orchestra, chose selections from "Katinka."

Mr. Exhibitor, which type of beauty do you prefer? The above various flavors of sweet pulchritude are entered in International Film's New Talent contest. They are, beginning at the left, Helene Montrose, Frieda Peterson, Mae Brown, Mary Cranston, Julia Dorland, and Helen Raferty.

HERBERT COMPOSES FOR FILM

Libretto of "The Fall of a Nation" by Thomas Dixon, Musical Score by Victor Herbert

For the first time in this country a composer of the first rank has devoted his talents to providing an original score for a picture production. To Victor Herbert belongs this honor of writing the first pictorial grand opera. The solitary instance of this kind in Europe is Humperdinck and his original orchestration of "Sister Beatrice." Herbert was induced, partly by the influence of Humperdinck's example and partly by his admiration for the genius of Thomas Dixon, to make this extraordinary departure from his usual musical activities.

Victor Herbert, noted composer.

The picture is "The Fall of a Nation," written by Thomas Dixon, the well known author and scenario writer. The collaboration of these two master creators in the novel field of that which they style "Cinema grand opera," is a gigantic stride forward in the upward climb of moving pictures.

"The Fall of a Nation" will be produced at a Broadway Theater, New York, next month on a magnificent scale. For the last eight months Mr. Herbert has been writing the operatic score for full orchestra, based on Mr. Dixon's carefully timed continuity story. For the last two weeks he has been revising the score, page by page, in exact accord with the screen showing of the successive reels as they have been shipped to him from the Coast. His assistant director, Harold Sanford, is in Los Angeles rehearsing musicians in the work.

"The Fall of a Nation" will be produced by the National Drama Corporation, and is a thoroughly American story.

Mr. Herbert is not planning a potpourri of old themes, carefully selected and arranged, for this score, but instead has written a creative instrumentation—an original contribution to the world's music, from the first bar to the last.

When an exhibitor receives an oversize reel from an exchange, packed in a tin can to protect it in shipment, he should of course, use care to see that the film is returned with the same protection. It is just one of the little elements of co-operation which make business relations more pleasant.

The new Unicorn Film Service has begun its releases. The reason for the formation of this new company is the belief of many in the future of the moving picture industry demanding for popular and money productive programs, the one and two-reel subjects exclusively, its rate of releases being 21 reels a week. Of these subjects the list is comprised of comedies, dramas and western films, the brand names being Supreme, Gayety, Hiawatha, Judy, Buffalo, Hippo, Puritan, Lily, Jockey, Rancho, Sunset and Utah.

Jackie Saunders a Flirting Bride

"The Flirting Bride," featuring Jackie Saunders, is a recent Knickerbocker Star release. It is a sprightly comedy drama concerning the bride's adventures after she started several flirtations with a soldier, a mysterious stranger and other inhabitants of a garrison town. The experience transforms her into a meek little matron who vows never to look at another man as long as she lives.

The latest addition to the playing force of the Horsley-Mutual studios is Miss Grace Wilson, who was until recently a member of the Fine Arts studios at Hollywood. Miss Wilson will support Margaret Gibson in the two-reel features now being released through Mutual.

Unique "Fan" Clubs

Picture fans in two different communities have organized Balboa clubs. Their membership is composed of admirers of Balboa feature films—the pictures in which Jackie Saunders, Ruth Roland, Henry King, Mollie McConnell, Daniel Gilfether, William Conklin and other screen favorites appear.

In Oakland, California, a number of young people who had made a study of pictures, decided to organize a club. That was easy. Then came the matter of a name. Names of favorite picture producing companies were suggested and Balboa was chosen.

The Horkheimer Brothers, owners of the Balboa studio, have helped the Oakland Balboa Club to furnish its headquarters. A Balboa button is now being made, which the Long Beach Company will give to all members.

Another Balboa Club has just been organized on the Atlantic coast, in Dorchester, Massachusetts.

A new kind of "fan" organization—the Balboa Club of Oakland, California.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

Klinger Brothers' moving picture theater at Hubbard, Oregon, was partially destroyed by a fire which swept a part of the business district.

It is reported that Jackson, Minnesota, is to have its own moving picture producing company in the near future, employing home talent in the actors.

The Orpheum Theater at Madison, Wisconsin, was the scene of a bold robbery. The safe was removed to a rear room and blown open and $1,250 stolen.

Reg. Chalick, for some time the manager of the Empire Theater, Cochrane, Canada, has resigned his position to go with the Canadian overseas forces.

George Eisold has assumed the management of the Fairyland Theater, Sheboygan, Wisconsin, having taken the lease from his uncle, Charles Eisold, who will retire.

Frank Stannard, manager of the Gem Theater, Wenatchee, Washington, has installed a $5,000 orchestral organ and a Minusa screen. The theater now ranks among the best in the state.

Because of some of his celever advertising, Manager Gus S. Greening of the Empress Theater, St. Paul, was forced to turn away five hundred people at last Monday afternoon's performance.

The moving picture business in McGregor, Canada, has been very badly interfered with by the floods. The Allies Theater has been surrounded by water and almost cut off from communication.

The Harvard Theater, Chicago, Illinois, uses the Photoplay News for its program. This theater, besides its regular program, holds a special matinee for children from 1 to 2 o'clock on Saturday.

John Pesava has sold his theater at Browns Valley, Minnesota, and has purchased the Columbia Theater at Ipswich, South Dakota, from C. B. Reeves. Mr. Reeves will devote his entire attention to his insurance business.

F. Jacklin, manager of the Moulin Rouge, Montreal, Canada, recently gave an exhibition at his theater for the 163rd French-Canadian Regiment of "The Campbells Are Coming," featuring the real Canadian Highlanders in action.

The Symphony Theater, Los Angeles, distributes to all its patrons the heralds issued by the film companies describing their features. This gives the patrons a good idea of the play and helps them to decide whether they care to see it.

W. H. Davidson, special representative of the Canadian Universal Company, says that the motion picture business in general is better in Canada than it has been in some time, and many of the theaters are boosting their prices from five to ten cents.

N. B. Wilby, manager of the Strand Amusement Company, Montgomery, Alabama, has leased the Empire Theater and will completely remodel the theater into the largest moving picture house in the South. The seating capacity will be between 1,200 and 1,500 persons.

Arthur G. Stolte, formerly photoplay editor of the Times-Tribune, Waterloo, Iowa, has become manager of the Palace Theater Company of Cedar Rapids and will manage that company's house at Vinton, Iowa. This is a comparatively new house with a seating capacity of 650.

The Mutual Film Corporation has been advertising its feature, "The Secret of the Submarine," in a very unique way. The publicity matter concerning the feature is mailed out in an eight-page booklet about eighteen inches long and six inches wide, shaped like a submarine and printed in blue.

A tax on theater tickets has been practically decided upon by the Alberta Government and will be approved by the legislature during the present session. The tax will be one cent for each theater ticket used, and will apply to all such tickets, irrespective of their value. The war-tax stamps will be sold at the box offices.

Manager Brown of the Hippodrome, Seattle, Washington, created a very unique scheme for advertising his performance of Charlie Chaplin's "Burlesque on Carmen." He erected a float with huge display banners on either side advertising the theater and the photoplay with a band playing popular airs stationed between the banners. Four pages led the way as it was driven slowly around the town.

Fred Keck has leased his theater at Wapello, Iowa, to the Real Amusement Company, Inc., Colfax, Iowa. This company has theaters in Newton, Marenga and Colfax, Iowa, and other cities. F. P. Lemen of Newton, Iowa, is president; P. W. Luengen of Marengo, Iowa, vice-president, and Harry De Baggio of Colfax, Iowa, is secretary and treasurer.

The Roselle Photoplay News is the title of a little sheet issued monthly in Roselle, New Jersey, in the interest of the Borough Hall Motion Pictures operated under the auspices of the Parent-Teacher Association. The pictures are shown on Tuesday and Saturday evenings and Saturday afternoons only. Paramount pictures are used exclusively.

State Fire Marshal John T. Winship is sending final notices to moving picture theaters in Michigan, demanding that the first 1916 inspection fee of $10 be paid forthwith. There are nearly 100 theaters that have failed to comply with this provision of the law, and on June 1 all inspectors and fire chiefs were given orders to cut the wires and close all theaters inspected and approved that have not obtained licenses.

It is rumored that there will be a moving picture circuit formed to include the towns of Valleyfield, Ormstown and Saint Martin, Canada, which will allow the playing of the pictures about two nights in each stop. At present there are no amusement facilities in any of these towns, and such an arrangement would be a great improvement. Martineau Brothers of Valleyfield may possibly interest themselves in the project.

A number of motion picture exhibitors and exchange managers held a "get-together dinner" at the St. Regis Hotel, Montreal, Canada, at which Miss Pearl White, the Pathe star, was the guest of honor. The personnel of the gathering was representative of both the large and small theaters of the city, while the leading exchanges had their managers and other members of their staff present.

William Sparks, general manager of the Sparks-Withington Company of Detroit, Michigan, has purchased the best moving picture machine he could find and is showing high-class releases every noon free of charge for the diversion of the workmen. The company also offers to have free moving picture shows in the dining room of the plant every Saturday afternoon for the families of the workmen.

The Watch Committee of the Southport (England) Corporation has inserted the following condition in the seven days licenses that it proposes to issue to the local theater managers, and which is expected to be productive of lively discussion at the next meeting of the town council:

> Films depicting crime or comedy or serial films are not to be exhibited on Sundays, Good Fridays, or Christmas Day, and that if exhibitions are given on such days the exhibition shall be of an instructive and elevating character throughout.

The Teck Theater, Toronto, Canada, has a very clever idea, which it is using to advertise its programs. This is just an ordinary oblong card, with the program printed plainly, but with an oval cut-out in center. The card is not placed on the doorstep or in the door, but is placed over the doorknob, making it necessary for the householder to take it off, thus rendering it practically certain he will read at least a portion of it.

The New Dearborn Theater, Chicago, Illinois, has a very neat little program about 2½ by 4 inches, printed on green stock. The front page carries a picture of Billie Burke, with a letter to the patrons saying the serial, "Gloria's Romance," featuring Miss Burke, will be shown every Saturday. The inside pages contain the weekly program and an ornamental monogram completes the last page.

D. C. McClellan, manager of the New Garden Theater, Minneapolis, Minnesota, carried out a very clever idea in his advertising of the Universal feature, "Peg o' the Ring." Mr. McClellan strung a piece of tent canvas across the entire front of his theater with narrow entrances resembling a circus tent. On the tent were painted the names of several circuses, side shows and particulars of the feature.

Pedestrians in the busiest sections of the loop district in Chicago paused in their hurry recently to look over the walking advertisements put out by Alfred Hamburger of the Chicago Hamburger theaters. These "ads" were two stalwart men garbed in the coon skin cap, wampus, felt boots, etc., of the Canadian woods. Each carried a rifle. On the backs of their mackinaws were painted the words: "God's Country and the Woman," the title of the Vitagraph eight-part Blue Ribbon feature being run at the Fine Arts theater.

J. E. Ferguson of the Wenatchee Theater, Wenatchee, Washington, broke the record of his house by means of his advertising for "Madame Butterfly." He preceded its appearance with newspaper and billboard advertising and distributed 1,500 cut-outs. The theater itself was decorated from lobby to stage with cherry blossoms, Japanese lanterns and butterflies and the stage was banked with lilies and set with screens and vases. The girl ushers were all dressed in Japanese kimonos and souvenir postal cards of Mary Pickford were given to each person attending.

The Parkway Theater, Baltimore, Maryland, issues a well-arranged program carrying a cut of a motion picture actress on the cover. It also prints a number of cuts illustrating scenes from the different films shown which add to the attractiveness of the program. This bulletin not only gives the time of each performance, but also states the exact time at which each feature will be shown, which is a very good idea. The back page contains notes of the players and items regarding the theater. The performances start every day at 2:15 and the last run starts at 9:50. This theater also has a children's matinee every Saturday morning from 10:30 to 12:30, showing "carefully selected photoplays for the kiddies."

Royal Photoplays is the name of the house organ issued by the Royal Theater, Calumet, Michigan. In the program is folded a postcard self-addressed on one side and on the other the words, "What kind of moving pictures do you prefer? Place a cross after the kind you like best. This will help us in arranging our program." Following which comes the list: Society dramas; western dramas; comedy; tragedy; current events; scenic; industrial and pictures. Also the question is asked, "What photoplayers do you like best?" The list contains Mary Pickford, Marguerite Clark, Pauline Frederick, Geraldine Farrar and Dustin Farnum, with a space left for other suggestions. If the patrons of this theater do not see the plays and players they like best, it is their own fault, for they are given this opportunity of expressing their opinion.

Inside Information on Big Fox Film

ITS MAKING, COST, AUTHOR—DIRECTOR, STAR AND STORY

WITH a producer willing to spend one million dollars, an author-director realizing all his ideals in accomplishment and a star who is the foremost artist in her field, William Fox's great spectacle written and produced by Herbert Brenon has a just claim to the title of the "greatest production of the age."

William Fox.

No task has been too great to undertake to make this picture a success; a portion of the island of Jamaica was practically remade; a municipality peopled with 20,000 persons was built by engineers and sanitarians where a swamp had been; thousands of tons of structural steel and thousands of tons of concrete were used in this city which existed for eleven months, the length of time devoted to the filming of the picture, and was in the end destroyed by fire to furnish one of the big crises of the spectacle.

Here are some interesting facts regarding the big feature:

The backer with courage enough to spend $1,000,000 on a single motion picture—William Fox.

The master director who produced the first $1,000,000 motion picture—Herbert Brenon.

The star of the great motion picture spectacle—Annette Kellermann, the world's greatest woman swimmer.

Picture was made on an island fortress—old Ft. Augusta, Near Kingston, Jamaica.

This ancient fortress, long disused, was a swamp which was drained and cleared by sanitary and other engineers and a concrete and steel city built.

Every adjunct of a municipality was supplied, including hospitals, police, courts, etc.

Within a few days a city of more than 20,000 employees grew where a few hours earlier there had been nothing but tropical undergrowth.

Herbert Brenon.

Largest number of persons used in a single scene of the picture, 19,744 people.

Number of children in Gnome City scenes of the picture 1,400.

Time required for filming of this wonderful spectacle one month less than a year.

Number of feet of film taken, 223,000 feet.

Number of feet shown in picture, 12,000 feet.

All scenes photographed by not less than two cameras; some by as many as seven, all taking the same scenes.

Magnificent "White City," built at a cost of a quarter of a million dollars, destroyed by fire to make a scene for the spectacle.

The Man Behind the Bankroll

To William Fox, the financier and owner of the film company, belongs the honor of being able to appreciate what the author presented to him and realize the greatness that lay latent in the work, and the ability to furnish the wherewithall to make it a reality. With the completion of this million dollar picture Mr. Fox has also seen one of his dreams come true—a dream which has abided with him since boyhood—"to do something bigger than anyone else ever has done." Mr. Fox has not always been in a position where he could take a risk on financing an unreality to the extent of one million dollars, but has risen from actual poverty by the hardest kind of work and a grim determination to succeed, to the rank of one of the biggest factors in the film industry.

A quintette of notable Fox stars. They are, beginning at the left, Ormi Hawley, Harry Hilliard, Annette Kellermann, Stuart Holmes and June Caprice, the Boston school girl whom Fox is to make famous.

When Director Brenon and his company returned to New York this Kellermann picture had already cost the producer $908,000 paid out in wages, rentals and materials. By the time the picture is first shown to the public it will have cost $1,200,000 and in the ensuing twelve months will cost $300,000 more to advertise it in the newspapers. But William Fox feels that it is money well invested.

Herbert Brenon—the Genius

To Herbert Brenon must be paid the tribute of having not only conceived this unusual and magnificent production, but also having the executive genius to direct its making on so stupendous a scale. It is a gigantic task which Mr. Brenon has accomplished in his eleven months rule over a city of 20,000 people constantly under his guidance and control and all working toward the realization of his greatest dream. It is an astonishing thing to start as a program boy in a theater and become a master of production.

Annette Kellermann—the Star

Although Mr. Fox could furnish the money and Mr. Brennon could furnish the ideas and executive ability, the picture could not have been a perfect production without the talent furnished by the star, Annette Kellermann, who is also the foremost artist in her field. Her success and right to her high position was earned through most severe hardships and privations. But through her industry and willingness to work she has achieved the foremost position in her branch of theatricals. She holds the record of the greatest woman swimmer in the world and is also a creative genius, and her daring attainments have meant much to the success of this picture.

The Story of the Film

Although the real plot of this play has been kept a secret, to be revealed only on the screen, it can be said that the allegorical prologue tells of little Katherine, a Roman child, and her idolized canary which she releases to join a sparrow living free in a nearby wood. The sparrow is killed by a barndog and the canary heartbroken flies out to sea and dies on the waves. The sparrow and the canary are transformed into two fairy-made creatures who enact the drama. The mermaid and mythological scenes are followed by episodes dealing with the Sultan and his harem of oriental beauties, followed by the coming of Dragona, the witch, who makes evil descend upon the land and plots the downfall of the dream-maiden (Annette Kellermann).

Pursued by the evil witch, the dream-maiden enters a gnome village where thousands of the little people at the instigation of the witch prepare to imprison her in a mine. Just as she enters the mouth of the mine the fairy queen appears and with her wand drives back the witch and changes the gnomes' distrust of the Dream Maiden into affection. The gnomes then lead the Dream Maiden to their moss-fringed pool and there in a bower and swing of vines she performs her most amazing and beautiful feats of swimming and diving for her little friends.

While performing these feats and gazing down into the depths of the pool the Dream Maiden sees into the world of the mortals, sees her lover the prince in great danger and his city in turmoil. She then summons her gnome friends to the rescue and a grotesque but large army of dwarfs, mounted on donkeys, rush forward to the rescue of the prince. During this flight of the little fellows the good fairy of the picture transforms them before your very eyes into giant warriors, mounted on caparisoned horses, and you witness the unusual photographic sight of seeing these giants equipped for battle clattering across the screen while the middle and rear of the cavalcade shows gnomes dissolving from sight and being replaced by the giant men who a few minutes later will engage in battle.

News of the Fox Studio

Clifford Bruce has returned to the ranks of the Fox players and will begin work at once on a new feature.

In his effort to obtain new beauty and talent for the screen William Fox advertised for the most beautiful artists' and cloak models in New York for use in the pictures. Out of the four hundred applicants six new stars were chosen as additions to the Fox forces.

It is expected that the new Fox studios at Corona, Long Island, will be completed and the entire eastern producing organization installed by the end of the summer. This will be one of the largest film company installations in the world and will cover an enormous acreage.

Reorganization of Greater Vitagraph

E. H. SOTHERN AND BARNEY BERNARD START WORK

Two early morning views of Vitagraph's petite Mary Anderson.

A SLOGAN of a greater Vitagraph for better pictures has been adopted at the Brooklyn studio of this company coincident with the announcement of the large financial consolidations, and reorganizations and arrangements for the Greater Vitagraph are now completed.

Under the former organization J. Stuart Blackton and Albert E. Smith had supervision over the directors of the company; under the new policy all directors will be under the personal direction of Mr. Blackton, and Mr. Smith will devote his entire time to the direction of the financial and business interests of the company.

The entire technical direction of the studios will be in charge of Charles Chapmin, and in order to accommodate the increase in the number of players and the consequent increase in the number of productions, there will be a regular day and night shift of studio hands.

It is planned to release an Anita Stewart picture every six weeks.

The manuscript department will be under the supervision of Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady and all scenarios will be chosen by Colonel Brady.

Vitagraph releases for the month of June include "The Destroyers," a five-part Blue Ribbon feature written by James Oliver Curwood, in which the new star, Lucille Lee Stewart, will be introduced. This play will be released through V-L-S-E, as will also another Kernel Nutt comedy entitled "Kernel Nutt's $100 Bill," featuring Frank Daniels.

Through the General Film, Vitagraph released on June 5 "A Strange Case," a three-reel feature in which Harry Morey stars. On this same program appeared "New York, Past and Present," a one-part scenic picture; and "She Won the Prize," a one-part comedy featuring Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno.

E. H. Sothern began his photo-dramatic career at the Brooklyn studios of the Vitagraph Company on June 1. Mr. Sothern's chief motive for appearing before the camera is the fact that this is the only way in which he can leave his genius behind him for the enjoyment and admiration of posterity.

Barney Bernard, the original Abe Potash, has also begun work at the Vitagraph studio on a Yiddish comedy under the direction of Paul Seardon.

"The Redemption of Dave Darcey" is the title of the Blue Ribbon feature to be released June 12. This is a five-part story written by Charles T. Dazey. James Morrison appears in the title role.

Anita Stewart is soon to be seen in a new role, that of a writer. Miss Stewart will contribute a series of articles of about five hundred words on subjects of interest to girls which will be syndicated by V. V. McNitt and distributed through Central Press of New York and Cleveland to over three hundred daily newspapers.

Evart Overton is now working on a three-part dramatic story by James Oliver Curwood, under the direction of Eugene Mullin. Mr. Overton will be assisted by Adele Kelly, Edward Elkas, Denton Vane and Charmine Mayfield, who makes her debut in this picture.

One hundred newspaper and magazine men representative of the American periodicals as well as of French, English, German, Scandinavian, Russian, Danish, Chinese and Indian papers dealing with motion picture affairs, were the guests of the Vitagraph-Ince studios on May 25. The forty-five mile run from New York to Bayshore, L. I., was made by automobile. After a study of the studio, an exhibition of "The Destroyers" was given for their entertainment, followed by a royal spread.

Lasky Releases for June

Two elaborate feature productions are released by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company on the Paramount program during the month of June. They are Fannie Ward, one of the most popular women stars of the screen, in "A Gutter Magdalene," released June 1, and Victor Moore, noted for his screen characterizations of "Chimmie Fadden" in "The Clown," released June 19.

One of the most successful feature play productions of several months is Marie Doro in the Lasky production, "The Heart of Nora Flynn." This popular star has started work under the direction of William O. De Mille on her second production for the Lasky company, written specially for her by Marian Fairfax.

NEW PATHE SERIES

J. A. Berst Announces Splendid New Fashion Series—Newspapers Co-operate—Gold Rooster Play in Color

J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of Pathe, has inaugurated a new series of pictures for the Pathe program which represent a decided departure from the ordinary. Florence Rose, the fashion expert, formerly editor of L'Art de la Mode, has been secured to put out a special reel of fashions twice a month. These articles are to be written by Mrs. Radnor-Lewis, former managing editor of Harper's Bazaar, and are based upon the costumes shown in the films.

Among the papers so far signed up to run a fashion article six days a week are the Chicago Daily News, St. Paul Daily News, Omaha Daily News, Minneapolis Daily News, Cleveland Daily News, Buffalo Enquirer, Louisville Times, Baltimore American, Pittsburgh Dispatch, N. Y. Tribune, Boston Traveller, Syracuse Post Standard and Utica Observer.

Miss Rose, the energetic and capable lady who has successfully "put over" this new idea in pictures, has had an interesting career, and one that should be an inspiration to women who have to make their own way in the world.

Miss Rose came from Cleveland, Ohio, to New York some six or seven years ago. Brought up in affluence, there had come a time when it was necessary for her to earn her own living. She worked with a manufacturing modiste, on the stage, and at last, to drawing fashions. Before long she was taken by the New York Evening Mail as fashion writer and later by the Globe. The reputation she acquired on these papers was responsible for her being offered the editorship of L'Art de la Mode.

The Florence Rose newspaper service consists of a drawing by Winifred I. Messer, a clever fashion artist, and an article on the practical current fashions. The new fashions release will show about fourteen different costumes, all photographed on the best looking girls obtainable. Miss Rose will direct in person the taking of these pictures. Mr. Berst in speaking of the new service says:

> The strength of the proposition from the newspaper standpoint lies in the fact that it offers a way by which double co-operation will be obtained from both exhibitor and retailer without having a word of advertising on the films. The retailer will be anxious to let his public know that he is carrying the costumes shown in the Pathe pictures, thus tieing up his advertising with the fashions article. The exhibitor will be able to secure added attendance from women and girls who are universally interested in new styles. The pictures will be so attractive that men will be interested in them also."

French Soldiers See Pearl White

Two million fighting Frenchmen, reading of Pearl White's exploits in the great Paris newspaper, Le Matin, became eager to see her on the screen and while on their six days' furlough from the front thronged the Parisian theaters where "The Exploits of Elaine" was showing under the title of "Les Mysteres de New York." Their eagerness to see all the episodes was so great that representations were made before the Office of the Minister of War. In due time the house of Pathe in Paris was requested by the War Office to make arrangements to show the entire serial each week for the soldiers.

New Gold Rooster Play in Pathecolor

Pathe announces another Gold Rooster Play in Pathecolor for release June 19. It is called "A Matrimonial Martyr," and features Ruth Roland, the charming star of the "Who Pays?" series, "The Red Circle" serial, the forthcoming Gold Rooster play, "Sultana," etc.

"A Matrimonial Martyr" was produced by the Balboa Company. Another feature of this picture is said to be the double exposure work. Ruth Roland plays two roles, and the exigencies of the piece demand that she face and speak with herself many times throughout the picture.

While "A Matrimonial Martyr" will be released as a drama, the Pathe Company reports that the situation of a woman's double in the house leads to some highly ludicrous situations.

NEW STAR JOINS EMERALD

Dolores Cassinelli, "Sarah Bernhardt of the Moving Picture Stage," Will Hereafter Be Seen in Emerald Productions

The Emerald Motion Picture Company has made a notable addition to its forces in Dolores Cassinelli, called "the Sarah Bernhardt of the Moving Picture Stage." Miss Cassinelli's success as a screen artist was achieved with the Essanay Company, playing opposite Francis X. Bushman.

This company will release on June 26 the Tom and Jerry series of comedies with an all star cast, including:

> Tom and Jerry—Bachelors; Tom and Jerry Quarantined; Tom and Jerry in the Chorus; Tom and Jerry as Life Savers; Tom and Jerry Mothers-in-Law; Tom and Jerry in Dreamland; Tom and Jerry as Firemen; Tom and Jerry in the Movies; Tom and Jerry Take the Pledge; Tom and Jerry in the Army; Tom and Jerry as Suffragettes; Tom and Jerry In and Out; Tom and Jerry Beauty Doctors; Tom and Jerry Knights of the Garter; Tom and Jerry On and Off; Tom and Jerry at Sea; Tom and Jerry in Dun and Bradstreets; Tom and Jerry Bell Boys; Tom and Jerry on the Field of Honor.

The aim of the Emerald Company is to produce clean, clever comedy with no vulgarity, but containing a series of humorous situations in one and two reels. This company distributes through the American Standard Motion Picture Corporation.

The Emerald Company will also produce the "Mamma's Angel Child" pictures, founded on the popular character originated in the Chicago Tribune by "Penny" Ross.

Frederick Warde, noted Shakespearian student and actor, is now at work at the Thanhouser-Mutual studios on the first of the five-act classics in which he is to be starred. The production, as yet untitled, is being directed by his son Ernest Warde. Florence La Badie, who is also to be starred in a series of these feature releases under the classic brand, has completed two of her pictures, "The Fugitive" and "Woman, Saint and Devil."

True Art in Picture Production

BY FRANK M. WILTERMOOD

Staff Writer, The Universal Film Manufacturing Co.

A STUDENT of cinematography, in burning the midnight oil to delve deep into the whys and the wherefores of accepted, traditional modes of producing pictures, might do well, it would seem, to ponder over the question whether some of the present styles of filming stories were really grounded in true art. While it is of course the basic purpose of dramatic presentations to portray human life in all its phases, there appears to have been during the last twelvemonth a marked tendency on the part of many leading film directors to stage scenarios in certain ways not apparently in consonance with the rules of histrionic art as shown in the master works of Shakespeare, Ibsen and other geniuses in play-building.

One of the current methods of beginning a film narrative is to show the leading character in what is technically known as "star film," this mode involving the individual posing of these stellar thespians in front of black velvet cloth together with subtitle announcements concerning the roles each star player is to enact in the drama following. If such a mode of operation were observed on the spoken drama stage it would mean that before the play were presented the leading characters would be led out in front of the curtain and one by one they would be introduced to the audience, in some such terms as, "Ladies and gentlemen, this is Miss Imogene Fauntleroy, who will enact the leading role tonight, that of Ruth Travis, a fisher girl," and after this announcement Miss Imogene would bow several times and retire, whereupon the stage manager would then conduct into the limelight the leading man and say, "Here is Mr. Jack Bransford, the chief male character, and he is to portray the part of Bob Dalton, a coast guards captain." What would patrons of the spoken drama think if this style of introducing stars were followed? They would not like such a method, of course, but still scores of film dramas are now current in which such an apparently illusion-destroying style is seen, and herein would seem to lie a largely debatable ground as to whether all "star film" at the beginning of cinema dramas were inartistic and undramatic.

Another present-day film style is that of having well-nigh every drama show a happy ending, with the hero and the heroine posed in a loving attitude, this final consummation being tantamount to a declaration by scenario writers and producers that in real life nearly all romances bring happiness to the true lover and his sweetheart, a showing that is of course untrue, for as everybody knows full well, many a gallant and loving suitor is outwitted by the swain with more money and less good looks and actions. Moreover, the greatest play-builders of every age have often shown in their endings of dramas the highly artistic note of tragedy and disaster to all the honest fortunes of the hero and his betrothed lady. If film plays are to depict real humanity they should, it would seem, have less happy endings and more serious conclusions, despite whatever traditions may be extant, for true art is always true art, and is not to be changed over night by capricious styles.

Perhaps also not enough attention is being paid by directors to having the climaxes of their dramas presented in that slow, yet tensely emotional manner which all great dramatists of the spoken stage strive for, with an aim to make impressive the basic theme and crisis of the production. Many film narratives show no lessening whatever of tempo in the filming of the final battle of the drama, and this time element is, however, of great importance, and should certainly be set apart from the usual run of the other parts of the photoplay. In a recent quite pretentious release the climax had an appearance of being slurred over by the producer, and as a result this crisis of the action of the entire narrative failed in achieving success.

As every stage and film drama should have as one of its fundamental qualities a weighty reason, or purpose, for the presentation of the narrative, aside from its aim to entertain beholders, there might be in this direction considerable room for a discussion of the theory that no drama should be produced that does not have behind it a great moral purpose, so that if the director were asked the reason of his photoplay he could reply that its underlying aim was to benefit mankind by inculcating a moral lesson above and beyond the desire to profit financially by the theater patronage. The photoplay, therefore, which is all entertaining melodrama and does not contain uplifting sentiments is apparently certain to fail to achieve that full measure of success that should be the triumph of every well-written drama.

From time to time many essays on film art are printed in the trade publications and a large per cent of these articles are pleas for better screen stories. Yet despite this ever-constant appeal for literary values, it is rather safe to declare that but few studios have yet reached that degree of production perfection whereby the literary merits of a prospective story would be appraised by acknowledged experts in fiction narration, hence it might be well for the executives of big producing concerns to never stage a story until its literary, true-art worth had been adjudged by veteran, acknowledged masters of story telling. Under present procedure in many big film studios a director will choose a narrative, then ask the sanction of the studio head as to staging the story, and this latter individual then gives his approval, and the filming of the scenes is begun, without any literary authority having been consulted about the matter. This style of work is surely likely to bring cinema productions devoid of much dramatic or truly artistic elements. The leading studios of the future, therefore, will most likely have a board of literary experts whose sole duty will be to furnish long, studied reports on the merits of all stories deemed possible of production, and a studio manager will be guided almost entirely by these findings before ordering progress.

Careful study of the foregoing questions in producing film dramas might lead some readers to believe that more success would be achieved in studio work if greater care were devoted to the planning of staging stories before the beginning of actual filming of the scenes. Preparedness should be the ever-constant aim of company heads, and no director should be allowed to produce a story unless its general merits had been carefully appraised by veteran authorities, together with reports of literary values concerning the various episodes of the drama, and particularly meritorious advices as to the manner in which the climax of the narrative should be filmed. Many directors map their work out from day to day and thus their endeavors fail to show that element of preparedness that they should have to insure first-class results. The greatest and best studios of the future will be those that do the most future planning, and this task will not be performed by anyone save the person is a proved authority in his special work. Boards of experts will be used to judge literary values, so that every story filmed will be first-class in dramatic play-building. A very certain line of quality will be gotten, not by the acts of one or two persons, but by the combined endeavors of many departments.

Reduce the Number of Scenes

THIS seems to be an era of padding, when photoplaywrights appear to feel that it is quantity and not quality which counts in scenario writing. Perhaps the amateur can not be blamed for this tendency when he sees it exploited before him on the screen in many of the productions of the best companies.

But it is not a good practice, and it is a wearisome task to wade through scene after scene in a scenario which really do not advance the story a particle. In writing your play start out with the determination that you are not going to have a single unnecessary scene, that every one is going to count in some way either in carrying along the action, foreshadowing an event or leading up to a crisis.

One of the most common places where the tyro adds unnecessary footage to his film is in depicting telephone conversations. Often eight to twelve scenes are used simply to show two people talking to each other about a very trivial incident in the plot. The author flashes back and forth from one end of the wire to the other for no apparent reason except that he wants to make his play extend over another reel if possible.

Another incident selected for this boresome padding, and which makes the story drag unbearably, is in getting a character from one place to another. He is shown packing his grip, saying good bye to the family, leaving the house, probably a close-up on the steps as he puts on his gloves, entering his automobile, arriving at the railway station, entering the ticket office, buying his ticket, coming on the platform and boarding the train, taking his seat in the train, the train leaving the station, another picture of the interior of the train, several pictures taken from the car window, or of the train going through the country, drawing into another station, alighting from the train, taking an auto, arriving at destination. When all that was needed was two scenes, or three at the most. The picture theater audiences have been educated, they do not need nor care to see all the details, but easily and quickly fill in all gaps. As long as they know where the character is going and then see him arrive, with a leader or scene interpolated to show the lapse of time necessary for the journey, this is all that is desired.

In writing a photoplay start out with the idea of using no padding, and after the scenario is completed go over it very thoroughly with the one object of combining scenes and eliminating scenes, until it is cut down to its real value. You will be surprised to see how the big scenes stand out, how smoothly the story runs along, how the interest is heightened and how much stronger the plot appears under this treatment.

Scenario Contests

The World Film Corporation will begin a Scenario Contest in the Saturday Evening Post of June 3, the contest to close with the issue of the Post dated September 15.

A first prize of $1,000 will be awarded for the best scenario submitted; a second prize of $750; a third prize of $650; fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh prizes of $500, $400, $300 and $200, respectively, with prizes of $100 each to the next twelve best stories or scenarios accepted. The $5,000 in prizes has been deposited in the Mutual Bank of New York, there to remain until the final judgments and awards are made.

William A. Brady, of the World Film Corporation, will be the sole judge of this contest. Six secretaries will handle the incoming scripts. They will be divided into four classes—the logical, illogical, impossible, and probable, and will be turned over to Mr. Brady when the absolutely impossible have been eliminated.

Mr. Brady wants live, present-day society and human-interest life stories which will make interesting screen material. As the stories are for the World Film stars, such as Robert Warwick, Alice Brady, Kitty Gordon, Ethel Clayton, Carlyle Blackwell, Muriel Ostriche, E. K. Lincoln, June Elvidge, Holbrook Blinn, Doris Kenyon, Alec Frances, House Peters and Mollie King, it is suggested that aspirants for the prizes study these stars on the screen and write their plays to fit the players' personalities.

The contest is open to writers of all kinds—professional, amateur and those who can only jot down a series of incidents. The scenarios do not have to be in regular form so long as they form a basis for the picturizing of the story.

"THE PUBLIC" OFFERS ONE PRIZE OF $250.

The Public, Ellsworth Building, Chicago, Illinois, is offering one prize of $250 for the best scenario illustrating the Singletax idea. It must be a human interest story and embody the fundamental truths of the doctrine of social justice preached by Henry George and known as the Singletax.

The scenario must be accepted for reproduction by one of the film companies, and in addition to the $250 cash prize the author will receive half of the amount paid for his work by the moving picture company.

The manuscripts submitted may be in synopsis form or in complete scenario form. The scripts must be of a length suitable for a two, three, four or five-reel film. They must be typewritten on one side of the paper only and double spaced. Every manuscript must bear an individual identifying word or symbol on the back which must be repeated on the outside of a sealed envelope accompanying the script containing the competitor's name and address. The Public will endeavor to return safely all manuscripts accompanied by return postage but assumes no responsibility for loss.

The competition will close on the first of September and manuscripts must be mailed on or before that date.

Jasper E. Brady, head of the scenario department of the Vitagraph Company, will be the final judge. He will be assisted by a reading committee in charge of Grace Isabel Colbron of New York.

Scenario writers who do not understand the Singletax can obtain literature from The Public's book department, by sending twenty-five cents for pamphlets and copies of The Public.

Music as an Advertising Asset

BY B. A. HOLLWAY

THE ordinary musical accompaniment found in the average moving picture theater is accepted as a matter of course. But among the larger and more progressive houses of the country music is becoming a more important factor, and hence an advertising asset. For it is coming to be realized that moving pictures have lost their novelty as animated photographic records, and the time is not far distant when the public, ever fickle, will turn toward the picture houses that offer something different.

No one realizes the value of musical accompaniment more fully than that master exhibitor, S. L. Rothapfel, the man who has established a new vogue in the presentation of the picture play. Just as he elaborated and perfected the stage settings surrounding the screen, so did he develop the musical atmosphere and surrounded the productions exhibited under his direction with elaborate musical accompaniment.

The result was inevitable. Little by little the reputation of the music at the Strand theater in New York became nation-wide. To speak of the Strand was synonymous with speaking of good music. People went to the Strand to hear the music and incidentally to see the photoplays presented. The advertising value of music so firmly established by the Strand forced itself to the attention of other large theatrical managers, with the consequence that music became an elaborate feature of their presentations.

But in many instances the basic principles of the Strand music were completely overlooked. For it was not the large orchestra and beautifully toned organ that created the impression in its entirety, but rather the perfect blending and synchronization of music and the pictures. The musical programs were laid out to suit the photoplay and to meet its varying moods. Yet always was it subdued and "under" the picture itself, accompanying it but never rising above or dominating.

In the furtherance of his music as an advertising asset, Mr. Rothapfel introduced specialty numbers, procuring noted singers and musicians who appeared in concert programs between the film presentations. But it would be a mistake to confuse the music for the pictures with the musical interpolations of the program, which, after all, were but incidental and in no wise peculiar to a motion picture theater.

In his efforts to obtain the right musical atmosphere for his picture programs it is said of Mr. Rothapfel that having in one of the big feature films of the day a scene calling for music by a country band, he worked for several days before the opening with his orchestra striving to get the effect that he desired, and failing in that, went out into the street and engaged for the entire week a "German" band, marching them back and forth behind the screen during that one scene in the picture. The result was an effect obtainable in no other way, and again he had demonstrated the efficacy of synchronizing sound and vision.

Illustrative of other phases of musical atmosphere created for the picture, the writer recalls the presentation of a celebrated film production in which the heroine was shown in the first part of the picture preparing to leave this country for Scotland. Risking the breaking of the continuity of the story, the exhibitor stopped the picture for the space of a moment or two while in the distance and coming nearer the audience heard the strains of a bagpipe, followed by a quartette of male voices singing "Loch Lomond."

But such elaborate musical accompaniment and atmosphere creation as developed by the larger theaters of the country is not practical for the average theater manager, and he must look about him for some other means of accomplishing a similar result at an expense much more in proportion to his receipts and the possibilities of his theater.

It has been into this field that the "Fotoplayer" and kindred musical inventions have stepped and have solved for the average exhibitor the problem of synchronizing sound and vision at an expense proportionate with his receipts.

Mention is made of the "Fotoplayer" as being perhaps one of the most practical of this type of instrument for the average exhibitor. It gives him perfect synchronization of sound and vision at minimum cost, at the same time affording the highest type of music available through its self-player attachments, which reproduce the execution of the world's greatest masters under the control of the operator in accord with the film on the screen. So perfected have these instruments become that in the smaller theaters orchestras are being replaced or augmented by them, with an increase of efficiency that has proved to be good advertising.

But the basic principle is that of adequate musical atmosphere and a judicious use of "effects," either operated independently or in conjunction with such an instrument as above mentioned, created for the photoplays. Today this is becoming as essential a factor in motion picture presentation as the films themselves and their careful selections.

It is the wide-awake exhibitor who is realizing this truth and is applying it to his business. On upper Broadway in New York City is an average type small theater of the better class. With everything in its favor in respect to location, but confronted with heavy opposition both in motion pictures and in vaudeville, this house began to lose. The management cast about for the solution of the problem. The house is a comparatively new one; the lobby and display advertising was good; the selection of films was good. But it seemed that pictures had lost a little of their attractiveness as presented in the old way. The music had consisted of the usual orchestral accompaniment with a small orchestra, and a piano relieving while the musicians rested. After a careful analysis of the situation, the management became impressed with the fact that all was not being gotten out of the pictures that could be gotten, and turned to his music to supply the deficiency. The small orchestra, with its limitations and restrictions, failed to rise to meet the situation, and a "Fotoplayer" was installed as an experiment. The suiting of the music to the varying moods of the picture had its effect. An almost immediate increase in business was noted.

The above is merely cited as an illustration of the value of music to the picture theater and the importance of music as an advertising asset. The exhibitor whose music is good and who advertises his music judiciously but with proportionate thought to its importance, cannot be very far off the right track.

Paramount pictures released for the week of June 12 will be headed by two five-reel features from the Famous Players studios, "Silks and Satins," featuring Marguerite Clark, and "Destiny's Toy," in which will appear Louise Hoff, the new Famous Players' star.

Short reels on this program include Paramount-Burton Holmes travel picture, "The Penal Colony of Palawan," the Paramount-Bray animated cartoon, "Colonel Heeza Liar and the Bandits," and the Paramount pictographs, showing "The Making of a Bluejacket," "Trend of the Imagination" in Professor Munsterberg's "Testing the Mind" series, "Free Play" in the "Better Babies" department, and "Jobs You Would Not Want," showing perilous occupations, and a new edition of the Trickids.

In co-operation with the Federation of Women's Clubs the Paramount corporation is encouraging special matinees for children, and points out the fact that all their short-reel material as well as many of their features are especially adapted for such a program.

In "Farmer Al Falfa's Tentless Circus," a Paramount-Bray cartoon for future release, the farmer introduces a circus on his own farm which far surpasses any Barnum & Bailey tent show.

The staff of Paramount pictographs has been enlarged by the addition of Harold Carey, formerly associate editor of Every Week, and Charles Burr, formerly of the trade advertising division of Paramount.

Professor Hugo Munsterberg will shortly complete his psychological series in Paramount pictographs and start a new series of articles of a most unusual nature.

Edward Lyell Fox, director of publicity for the Paramount, states that many newspapers are giving space to the interviews on Paramount topics with Frederick Palmer, Henry Reuterdahl, Frieda Hempel and Mme. Gadski additional space in their columns outside of the motion picture section.

TWO NEW FOX STARS

Virginia Pearson and Other Fox Luminaries Create New and Startling Styles in Scenes, Vampires and Pajamas

An example of the unusualness and beauty of the scenes in the million-dollar Fox picture, the daring of Annette Kellermann in the making of these scenes, and the ingenuity of the director in planning them, is shown in a sunset scene on the Caribbean. As the sun is dropping behind the horizon, one long ray of light miles long and vividly bright shoots out across the water. As this path of light begins to recede Annette Kellermann, pursued, leaps from a promontory and dropping directly at the top of this remaining ray, swims boldly forward down the receding sunbeam. Foot by foot she pursues the light ray, always just a few inches ahead of her, until the last bit of sunlight vanishes from the water and Miss Kellermann vanishes, too, with the light—swimming out into the Nowhere.

Two New Stars

Two new members have been added to the William Farnum company of the photoplayers in the William Fox studio on the coast. They are Betty Hart and Betty Schade. Both of these newcomers will be featured in the picture in which Mr. Farnum is starring under the direction of Oscar C. Apfel. The scenes of this play are laid in the mountains and the entire company has been miles from civilization during the past few weeks.

Familiar to old and young alike is the name "East Lynne," the title of Mrs. Henry Wood's novel, which has been on the American stage since 1863. It is said at least 100,000 dramatic performances of this play have been given. It has been left to William Fox to perpetuate this story on the screen and the production is already under way, with Theda Bara playing the leading role.

Virginia Pearson declares that the vampires depicted on the screen are not correctly shown, and that she is going to give the future public her own conception of this loathsome creature. Miss Pearson says that the so-called vampires we have seen on the stage and screen have been mere courtesans, immoral women, and the nearest approach to the real vampire was her portrayal on the stage production of "A Fool There Was." The vampire isn't a real person any way and she describes her as "the dead, undead," or "the living dead," or some such cheerful person living on the blood she sucks from children. Miss Pearson declares that the career of her vampire cannot be cut short by a melodramatic twist given by the director, but can only be gotten rid of by means of a needle jabbed right through her black heart at midnight. "It's quite an occult idea, symbolic and weird," the actress informs us. This version of the real vampire, as distinguished from the courtesans and unsavory adventuress type, sounds a little grewsome, but back of her idea is an artistic ambition, a big screen vision. For Miss Pearson is more than an "actress who has gone into pictures." She is an enthusiast and believes pictures can be and should be so correct as to details and the acting so good that they will be above criticism. She also believes it is the bounden duty of the critics to point out staging flaws, poor direction or weak or exaggerated acting. This actress has brains and dramatic ability and will not be content to accept what is offered.

Jose Collins, the Spanish-American-English star of the Fox company, advocates a universal costume to be worn by all women at all times—pajamas. In advocating this comfortable style, Miss Collins says:

"I have pajamas, or garments fashioned on pajama lines, for every hour of the day. I am not radical enough to inflict my friends with what they consider my idiosyncrasies. So when I visit them I dress conventionally. But maybe some day women will awake to the fact that they can be in fashion and comfortable at the same time. That is where my pajama theory is going to come in."

NEW "WHO'S GUILTY?" PRINTS

Pathe Exchange Adds Seventeen to the One Hundred Weekly Prints of "Who's Guilty?" Series to Meet Unusual Demand

Pathe has just had the unusual experience of greatly increasing its order of positive copies on a picture three weeks after its initial release. With the release on May 22 of the third photo-novel in the "Who's Guilty?" series, Pathe exchange has had to instruct its Bound Brook laboratories to add seventeen copies to the standing weekly order of 100 prints on the "Who's Guilty?" pictures. Boston added two prints to its usual quota, New York called for five additional copies, Chicago and Philadelphia for three more each. Many other exchanges wired in calls for additional prints.

So insistent was this demand that the prints originally destined for Canadian consumption were diverted to the Pacific Coast and a hurry order was placed in the laboratories for new Canadian copies. The increased orders mean a total of 476,000 feet of "Who's Guilty?" positive to be added to the already huge aggregate of 2,800,000 feet of positive film originally destined for the American and Canadian markets.

On May 17 the advance bookings on "Who's Guilty" crossed the $300,000 mark, establishing what is believed to be a new record in advance bookings with cash payments on the last four of the series. A week later these figures had climbed $68,000 higher, with thirty-two branches reporting, an average of slightly more than $2,000 a branch in increased bookings in seven days. When it is considered that advance bookings on series and serials usually fall off after the first picture is released, rather than that they should increase, this growth is deemed by Pathe to warrant the belief that "Who's Guilty?" will set the highest figure ever reached in two-reel distribution.

The Strand Theater in Milwaukee, which runs "Who's Guilty?" on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays, is holding voting contests for its audiences to determine who really is guilty, on whom the blame in each of these highly dramatic photo-novels should actually be placed. On "Puppets of Fate," the first of the "Who's Guilty?" pictures to be released, there were 14,758 votes placing the guilt on the widow, 9,835 on the young surgeon, 7,852 on the elder surgeon, and 5,295 on the young surgeon's wife; thus a total of 37,470 votes were cast in three days. And the big Strand Theater set a new record of attendance in these three days.

In Wilkes-Barre the Orpheum Theater in a city of 68,000 people played to 4,500 the first day (May 20) it showed "Puppets of Fate" and to 5,900 the second day, thus drawing more than one-seventh of the entire population of the city to its box office. At Proctor's Theater, in Yonkers, N. Y., with a seating capacity of more than 3,200, Manager Waldron had to send for the police to aid him in keeping the doors free when, on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays of these successive weeks he showed the first, second and third of the "Who's Guilty?" series.

Ten of the fourteen photo-novels in this series have now been delivered by Arrow to Pathe. The four remaining stories will be devoted, in order, to divorce, to prison reform, to the labor problem, and the final story to the horrors of international war.

The divorce and prison reform stories are based on legal research work done by Attorney Warren H. Small, a prominent practitioner in the United States courts. Mr. Small, formerly attorney for the Motion Picture Patents Company and the General Film Company, is now the attorney for the Arrow company.

Mr. Small shows how a man may be properly divorced in Connecticut, yet still married five miles away in New York; with his second marriage bigamous and his innocent children illegitimate, and unable to inherit his estate.

A number of exhibitors have requested that a special fifteenth "Who's Guilty?" picture be produced, to be of five-reel length and to point out in precise fashion the greatest menace to the peace and economic growth of the United States. Mr. Berst has taken the matter under advisement. An early announcement in this regard will be made.

Universal Moving West

It is reported that the Universal Film Company will begin immediately to transfer all its eastern companies to Universal City, California, and will lease its plant at Fort Lee, New Jersey. The object of the move is to increase the efficiency of the working forces and cut down overhead expenses.

If it is found later a demand is strong for films with eastern locations, a company may be reinstalled at Fort Lee.

Several hundred wild deer appear in "The Guide," a forthcoming Mutual Star production.

BILLIE BURKE AIDS SOLDIERS

Makes Touching Appeal for Soldiers Blinded in the War and Raises a Large Sum of Money by Simple Device

The public is beginning to always look for something original and pleasing when Billie Burke, the heroine of "Gloria's Romance," the George Kleine chaptered photoplay, appears either on the screen or in person, and Miss Burke rarely disappoints them.

A charming glimpse of Billie from chapter four of "Gloria's Romance."

The actress lived up to her reputation when she appeared on the stage of the New York Hippodrome at a benefit performance given for the permanent blind war relief fund, and various other allied charities, including the American Red Cross and the Secours National. Miss Burke made a most dramatic appeal to the audience, the result of which was more than $20,000 added to the fund.

Miss Burke appeared on the stage in a simple little white frock, and in a clear voice, distinctly heard in every part of the house, recited a poem written for the occasion by John C. Brownell, one of the scenario writers of the Kleine staff.

Every light in the theater was extinguished, and as the last light disappeared Miss Burke called out, "Time's Up!" and those in the audience who had covered their eyes with their hands as she instructed, took down their hands to find that there in the pitch darkness nothing was to be seen.

After a momentary pause to let the impression of real blindness steal over the minds of everyone in that throng, which numbered thousands, Miss Burke resumed her speech.

As the recitation was finished the lights were switched on all over the house and the group of society girls who had been selling programs for the benefit performance distributed promissory notes through the audience. Some of them were for $100, some for $25, a few for $20, more for $10 and hundreds for as small a sum as $1. Evidently Miss Burke's appeal, backed by her personality, had moved the listeners, for the count-up of the slips showed that about $20,000 had been pledged.

JUNE AMERICANS

Santa Barbara Studios of American Company Humming with Work of New Directors on New Sunshine Dramas

Activities at the Santa Barbara studios of the American Film Company, Inc., are assuming enormous proportions. There are several new directors on the lot, among them Alfred Hollingsworth, Warren Ellsworth and Murdock MacQuarrie, all well known for their ability to film true realism into their subjects.

Among the forthcoming productions are:

"Dust," a five-reel feature under the direction of Edward Sloman from a scenario by Julian L. LaMothe. Winnifred Greenwood, Franklyn Ritchie, Harry Von Meter, Louise Lester and Nell Franzen are the principal members of the cast. The story deals with a millionaire factory owner who ignores working conditions in his plant, while his aristocratic daughter remains unsympathetic and imbued with the idea that the laboring classes are but "dust" and the world no better for their existence. The play is scheduled for release the last of June.

"Fear" is now being filmed in two reels under the directions of Frank Borzage, with Mr. Borzage, Anna Little and Jack Richardson in the important roles. It is now expected that "Fear" will be offered to the public on June 30.

"Love's Bitter Strength" is a photoplay without a villain. Edward Coxen, Lizette Thorne and George Field constitute the important cast. This is the story of a bride who loses her mind as the result of an automobile accident. She is carried off into the country in a freight car, where she takes refuge, and is some time later identified through her benefactor's discovering her likeness on the desk of a city business man he visits.

"Killed by Whom?" is a two-reel "Flying A" sociological drama. Vivian Rich, Alfred Vosburgh and George Periolat play the principal parts, and the story is very interesting from the standpoint of modern legal justice.

King Clark, a film favorite who recently joined the American forces, is to be seen in "The Dancer" as his introduction to the public under the "Flying A" banner, with Vivian Rich and Margaret Nichols playing the principal feminine roles. This is a modern cafe story—a young man falling in love with a dancer, parted from her by an unforgiving mother, and later reunited at the birth of a baby boy.

Helen Rosson, with a long record of successes to her youthful credit, is now nearing the completion of a "Mustang" two-part drama under the direction of Warren Ellsworth, which is entitled "The Sheriff of Plumas."

Knickerbocker Features—Five Strong

In addition to the five-reel feature, "Pay Dirt," on the June program of the Knickerbocker Star Features, will appear five three-reel dramas and two comedies.

The dramas include "Shadows," featuring Frank Mayo and Lillian West; "The Stained Pearl," for release on June 9, in which Henry King appears; "An Old Man's Folly," in which Daniel Gilfether and Marguerite Nichols are co-stars, the release of June 16; "The Ancient Blood," with the new Knickerbocker star, Virginia Norden, for release June 23; and "The Master of the House," in which Frank Mayo and Lillian West are starring, which will be ready for June 30.

The comedies, produced by the Vim Company, are "Hungry Hearts" and "Undress Poker."

Tefft Johnson Presents "Sonny Boy"

The Tefft Johnson Film Corporation has released "Sonny Boy," a one-reel play written and produced by Tefft Johnson. The story deals with the adventures of Sonny Boy; Lily, the pickaninny; Toto, the dog; and several goats. In his desire to have Lily learn to read and write, Sonny Boy takes her to school and shares his seat and lunch with her, much to the delight of the teasing scholars. Sonny Boy starts a fight in her behalf which Lily helps him finish, and meanwhile the goats devour the basket of clothes which Lily hid before she went to school. Afraid of punishment the children hide in the barn and are later found by Toto and forgiven by their anxious parents.

TRIANGLES FOR JUNE

Douglas Fairbanks and Bessie Barriscale Featured—New Triangle Studio Opened in New York with Talmadge Play

In the Triangle program for June appear two new features for Douglas Fairbanks and Bessie Barriscale.

"Reggie Mixes In," a Triangle-Fine Arts feature, is another typical Fairbanks success. Bessie Love plays opposite Mr. Fairbanks and does her full share toward the success of the play. The cast is an excellent one and the settings are decidedly interesting, especially those in which the cabaret scenes are played.

In the Triangle-Ince feature, "The Sorrows of Love," Bessie Barriscale plays the part of a nun, Sister Beatrice, and gives her usual vivid interpretation of the role.

Among the releases to be made during the latter part of the month are "The Innocent Magdalene" and "A Wild Girl of the Sierras," both from the Triangle-Fine Arts studio, and "The Deserter" from the Triangle-Ince studio.

Norma Talmadge, the Triangle star who has just completed work in "Going Straight," accompanied by John Emerson, who directed the production, is in New York to start work on another feature in which she is to be starred. Triangle has acquired the old Reliance studio at Riverdale and the feature on which Mr. Emerson and Miss Talmadge are working will be the first production of the new drama factory.

"The Evil Thereof," a powerful photoplay with a great moral lesson, written by Channing Pollock and Rennold Wolf, is the Famous Players release on the Paramount program for June 5.

"Soul Mates" is the first of the five-reel vehicles from the American studios, featuring William Russell. Subsequent big feature productions starring Russell will be realesed under the titles of "The Guide" and "The Highest Bid."

THE CHAPLIN SUIT

Chaplin Injunction Against Essanay Denied—Comedian Served with Counter Suit by His Former Employers

Justice Hotchkiss of the Supreme Court, state of New York, has denied the application of Charlie Chaplin for an injunction to restrain the V-L-S-E and the Essanay company from distributing the Essanay-Chaplin comedy, "Charlie Chaplin's Burlesque on Carmen." This opinion decisively disposes of Chaplin's contest against his former employers; but it does not absolve him from further sessions with courts.

In order that legal activity could not be centered formally on his opponents' side, Mr. Chaplin later in the week, through his attorneys, filed an amended complaint in which he sought damages from the Essanay and the V-L-S-E to the extent of $100,000. William M. Seabury, representing the Essanay and V-L-S-E companies, in commenting upon the action of the comedian, said: "In view of the fact that Mr. Chaplin did not ask for any damages in his original complaint, it would seem that this action was simply a clever maneuver to turn defeat into victory. The possibility of such a counter-play being successful, however, is decidedly remote, especially in view of the opinion of Justice Hotchkiss, who declares that the question of whether Chaplin has suffered any damages is problematical."

William M. Seabury, who represents the Essanay company in the action brought against it by Charlie Chaplin following the V-L-S-E distribution of the "Burlesque on Carmen," in which he was featured, received advices from his Los Angeles office today that the comedian had been served in that city in a counter suit in which the Essanay company asks $500,000 damages.

In the complaint, the Essanay company charges breach of contract, alleging that Chaplin failed to appear in and assist with the production of four comedies called for in his contract. According to Mr. Seabury, the Essanay company values each Chaplin two-reel comedy at $125,000. On this basis they contend that, as the result of the holding up of four films, the loss to them is $500,000, the amount of the suit.

Films Reform Fijis

The uplift movement is being experienced in the Fiji Islands these days, according to Sir Beckham Sweet-Escott, Governor of that portion of the earth. The cannibals have quit their old-time profession of eating their fellow beings every time they feel meal-time approaching and have substituted going to the motion picture shows instead.

E. K. Lincoln has announced that the reports to the effect that he has signed a long-time contract with the World company is in error. He appeared in but one World film.

"The Right to Live," the Chicago-made photoplay dealing with the political and whtie slave situation in Chicago, which was held up by the local censor board for some time, is at last to have a premier at the Band-box theater in West Madison street, and contrary to the rule regarding plays of this nature, children as well as adults will be admitted.

New Stars for Metro

Marguerite Skirvin, a brilliant and charming young artist, has been engaged by Metro, and will be seen on that program in the leading female role in "The Quitter," a five-part Metro-Rolfe wonderplay in which Lionel Barrymore is starred. Miss Skirvin has the role of a western girl, which is entirely to her liking, as she hails from Oklahoma. There, as a young girl, she learned to ride wild horses, swim treacherous streams, and do other things she is called upon to do in "The Quitter" before the camera.

William Sherwood, Metro.

Robert E. Wilson, the well known young juvenile actor, has been engaged by Metro to play juvenile roles in the Metro-Drew weekly comedies in which Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew are starred. Mr. Wilson has been with the Thanhouser company for three years, where he won an enviable record in prominent roles. Mr. Wilson was born in Stonehaven, Scotland, twenty-two years ago. He planned originally to take up a newspaper career, but after working as a reporter for six months he gave it up and went on the stage. His first engagement was with the Horne Stock Company. He worked with Marion and Madeline Fairbanks and Sidney Bracey for nearly two years with the Thanhouser company. Mr. Wilson is extremely versatile and is an expert at riding, swimming, diving, motoring and other outdoor activities.

P. Thad. Volkman, assistant director who was associated with Edgar Jones at both the Lubin studios and later with Metro has joined forces with Charles Horan, one of the best directors on the Metro staff. Mr. Horan and Mr. Volkman have begun work on "The Quitter."

ACROSS THE OCEAN NEWS

Exhibitors Estimate British Amusement Tax Will Put $75,000 Daily Revenue from Films Into Exchequer —A Nuisance for Exhibitors

The Chancellor of the Exchequer expects to derive a revenue of $25,000,000 from his new amusement tax. There are about 4,500 motion picture theaters now open in the United Kingdom, with a daily average attendance of about 800. The average admission price is six cents a head and the corresponding tax under the new measure will be two cents a head. This will bring in a total daily revenue of $75,000, and the estimate of $25,000,000 will probably be exceeded.

The case of the picture theater is much more serious than that of the ordinary theaters, for practically all the revenue is derived from seats costing 24 cents or less. There are many of the picture theaters in poorer districts which make a special feature of two-cent matinees for children. Unless the proposal is changed children will not have to pay 3 cents, or an increase of 50 per cent, as against 10 per cent increase for the purchaser of a stall in a West End theater.

Unusual as it may seem the exhibitors have expressed their general approval of the measure.

The American correspondent of the London Bioscope writes:

There is considerable interest, not unmixed with anxiety, in our (American) producing circles over the proposed exclusion of American and other foreign films from the British market. With the advancing cost in production our American manufacturers have often been compelled to look to the European, and especially to the British, market for their profits. A high import tax on American films will mean a severe blow to most of our manufacturers.

News of the proposed measures in Parliament have been vague and fragmentary and has served to heighten rather than lessen the anxiety.

The Pathe Freres is operating motion picture theaters in Hanoi and Haifong, in Tonkin, and at Hue and Tourane, in Annam. The Hanoi theater seats about 500. It is open every evening and Friday and Saturday afternoons. In Haifong the entertainments are held in the cafe of a hotel owned by the Morin Freres Company. At Hue the pictures are shown in a special room of the Morin Freres Hotel, accommodating about 300. The pictures are shown two nights a week in Hue and Tourane. The prices are uniform, 20 cents to one piaster. The Pathe films are used exclusively in these theaters, and the program contains the usual range of subjects. Since the beginning of the war theaters are closed, dances are forbidden and the bands no longer play in the public parks and these motion picture shows form practically the sole form of amusement.

The Fox Film Corporation, represented by Winfield R. Sheehan, are starting an exchange bureau in England, to be known as the Fox Film Company, Ltd. The organization will be entirely British. The export department for Europe, Africa and India will be a five-story building in the heart of the film center of London. Branches are being established in Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Newcastle, Glasgow, Cardiff and Dublin.

The Ideal Film Company is gradually obtaining the services of a fine lot of players. In addition to Ellen Terry, the company has induced H. B. Irving, son of the late Sir Henry Irving, to act for them.

Proving the Real Cowboys

A sombrero and jingling spurs will no longer make a real cowboy. The time has come when he must prove his right to that title. To weed out the masqueraders from the worthy ones a contest will be held during the course of the "Stampede," a big western jubilee to be conducted under the patronage of Harry S. Harkness, at the Sheesphead Bay Speedway for eight days next August. The coterie has donated $50,000 in prizes for world's championship contests in frontier sports and pastimes and more than 2,000 cowboys and cowgirls are coming from the ranch and range to compete.

A casual suggestion that the occasion offered opportunity to conclusively determine the true abilities of the men who whoop and shoot and ride and rope for pictures has met instant approval and the studios will send their contestants for the prizes.

"His Brother's Wife"

A Five-part World-Premo Feature, Featuring Carlyle Blackwell. Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman

THE love of two brothers for the same woman is not the most uncommon thing in the world, but it seems uncommon. Especially when the woman is married to one of the brothers does it seem unbelievable that the other brother should make love to her. This production is chiefly concerned with the working out of that theme. Intelligence has been used in the handling of it. Most plays dealing with that proposition are generally so much overdrawn that they become absurdities. There is too much deep dyed villainy in them and audiences do not take them seriously.

In this production, however, Carlyle Blackwell as the unmarried brother, behaves himself as a brother in love with his brother's wife might reasonably be expected to. He gives a dignified portrayal of a man having an inward fight with himself; a fight to be loyal to his brother, and a fight with his inward desires. He settles it all logically in the end by going away to another part of the world. One of the nicest parts of the story is its probability. The love affair starts as a flirtation. Blackwell arrives in America with a fortune after a number of years hard work in Australia. He meets his sister-in-law accidentally in a curio shop and determines to know her better. Never dreaming that she is his brother's wife he makes an immoral proposal to her and earns her contempt. At the end of the story, however, they part with the greatest of admiration for each other, in consequence of the discovery of noble traits in both of them.

It is distinctly a three-part play. All others in the story are decidedly secondary, and the plot keeps right close to the two brothers and the wife every minute of the time. The three principal parts have been entrusted to high class actors, and they give a splendid performance. Ethel Clayton, as the wife, is perfectly cast and altogether convincing. Paul McAllister, a very well known actor, is excellent in the part of the elder brother. Harley Knowles "picturized" the story and also directed it. He is deserving of considerable credit for hte way he has done both. The photographer's name is not given, but it should be, because his work is very fine, and fine photography in a photoplay counts for much more than most people think it does.

The Adirondack snow scenes were particularly beautiful. The interior scenes were very swell where swell settings were called for, and other scenes were always consistent with the story. The story tells how a young American cleaned up a fortune raising cattle in Australia, and opens after he has sold out and is starting for home. His brother in America has lost his fortune by fire, and as a result of worry he has developed tuberculosis. The younger brother meets his brother's wife in a curio pawn shop. He notices that she is desperately trying to raise money and he offers to be her "friend." She is willing to make the sacrifice for her husband's sake. When Blackwell finds this out he admires her greatly and gives her money without asking anything in return. Later he traces his brother and discovers when they meet that the woman is his brother's wife. He sends them to the Adirondacks and later they send for him. While there the younger brother tells her of his love. They are discovered by the husband and a separation follows. The wife makes a success on the stage and this leads to a reunion, after which the younger brother sails away to Australia.

"Her Husband's Wife"

A Five-part Ivan Drama Released June 2. Reviewed by George W. Graves

IVAN ABRAMSON'S ever busy pen is prolific in stories pertaining to society. His latest drama, "Her Husband's Wife," manifests careful attention to plot detail, and affords many dramatic moments for the three stars, Sally Crute, Mignon Anderson and Augustus Phillips. Miss Crute has a large share of strenuous work which she performs convincingly, while Mignon Anderson makes a very charming daughter and Augustus Phillips, an interesting theatrical manager. Others making up the large cast are Edward Mackey, Kittens Reichart, William Bechtel, Bradley Barker, Arthur Law and Brindsley Shaw. Mr. Abramson also directed the picture.

The story has many situations of dramatic force but a plot less complex would have improved it as a whole. The last reel is exceptionally good. "Her Husband's Wife" will find favor with the following which has been created by previous Ivan offerings.

Belle Ducet, the wife of a motion picture actor, inherits the brutal propensities of her deceased drunken father. She is secretly in love with Jean d'Arcy, a Parisian sculptor. After a violent quarrel between the two men Ducet leaves for the studio, where he dies as the result of a sudden attack of heart failure. Meanwhile Belle has eloped with d'Arcy. Her little child, Viola, is adopted by Paul Manon, a musician.

which Billy Burke is featured. It is mostly a flirtation at the opera between Gloria and Freneau (David Powell), who quickly remedies his blunder of not recognizing the grown-up Gloria. But it is so well presented that it is not only amusing but interesting, and a large audience at the Studebaker theater, Chicago, watched its progress with very evident delight.

Richard Freneau, the man wrongly credited with the rescue of Gloria from the Indians, determines to carry on the flirtation begun five years ago in Florida. Gloria has imagined herself in love with Freneau throughout her school girl career, and the broker, interested in her money, wishes to marry her. He has, however, been carrying on an affair with the wife of Gloria's brother, Lois Stafford, well played by Jule Powell. Freneau's attention to Gloria arouses the jealousy of Lois, and in this fact, Dr. Royce (Henry Kolker), who really loves Gloria, sees a means of breaking up Freneau's unfortunate influence over Gloria. Others who are beginning to suspect the intrigue between Lois and Freneau are David, Lois' husband, and Judge Freeman, her father.

The chapter ends with Gloria's "coming out" party, to which, in spite of her aunt, who is managing the affair, Freneau is invited. But in this and other things, Gloria's daring goes almost too far, and the next chapter promises to show the trouble which comes of it.

Single Reel Paramount Offerings

Latest Issue of "Pictographs" and Animated Cartoon. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IN ADDITION to sketching some pictures, which by the way are capitally animated, the movement of the figures being as smooth as cartoon characters have ever been on the screen, Earl Hurd or somebody wrote a scenario for "Bobby Bumps Goes Fishing," a Paramount-Bray split-reel offering. "Bobby Bumps Goes Fishing" tells a story, a full day's events, or it were better perhaps to say the events of a full day in Bobby's mischievous young life are shown in this thoroughly amusing animated cartoon.

Bobby and his father are out in a row boat for a bit of fishing. Whether seated in the front or rear of the flat and not spacious craft, Bobby's line is always busy. Dad changes places with his son several times and each time it seems as though Dad purposely moved out of the way of a good-sized fish in order to let son make the catch. Dad grows irritable so Bobby thinks it best to leave. He and his ever faithful dog swim ashore. Bobby purchases a large doctored fish, one that has been a property in the fishing-supplies store for some time. This he fits out with a motor and propeller. Dad makes a wonderful catch and is telling mother about it when the cat which was driven away from the workship by Bobby, exposes the fraud to both Dad and mother.

This is on the same reel with a Dr. Raymond L. Ditmars' animal study entitled "Our Animal Friends and Foes." While most people look upon the domestic cat as a friend and snakes as enemies, this picture tells us just the opposite. The photography is good and snake, cat, rat, all the actors in the cast, in fact, excepting the stuffed bird, act well. It is interesting.

In the latest issue of Paramount Pictographs, the first and most interesting article is by Henry Reuterdahl. "The Making of a Sailor" gives some particularly interesting views of activities on board one of the big battleships. One panoramic view of the deck at a busy hour is especially good. The sailor's many duties and sports are shown. The "Better Babies" department urges parents to see that their charges have a visit in the country during the vacation time. The advantages to the child of a stay on the farm are truthfully and attractively shown. "Before the Doctor Comes," a first aid to the injured article; "Jobs You Would Not Want," and the animated toys at the end of the reel are other subjects which help to make this a good issue of the "Screen Magazine."

"Reggie Mixes In"

Douglas Fairbanks in Enjoyable Triangle-Fine Arts Comedy. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS has plenty of opportunity to be energetic in "Reggie Mixes In," and a role suited to him is all that is required to insure a performance of particular interest to the picturegoer. He is energetic, also amusing, and, like all phases of this offering from the Fine Arts studio, his performance will register a big hit with the public. In the first few scenes he gives an exhibition to the surprised manservant of his physical agility, and these stunts have more purpose than that of making an interesting scene, for Reggie is at once established as a young man well able to "handle" himself, which he later proves in various fights at the cafe where he, the wealthy Reggie Morton, gets a job as bouncer.

"Reggie Mixes In" is by Roy Somerville, and it tells of a rich young man's search for adventure in the underworld. He finds both adventure and love there. The little girl who dances at the cabaret is placed in temptation's way often, and Reggie decides to protect her. After many battles with a gang whose leader is bent on getting the bouncer out of the way, he arranges matters so that Agnes will be received into his social set. Then, just to test her love, he appears as the bouncer and she agrees to marry him and go back to the slums. Reggie, inside of eight minutes, is in his dress clothes, and he walkes into the room to claim his reward.

It is a well-constructed play and its success seems assured. Of course, one would rather the author did not make use of the letter from the wealthy girl, which is duly left in a place where the little dancer cannot help but see and read it. Letter-finding is so well worn now that it is best to avoid it if possible. In this story its use brings about only one scene, and it is not a very impressive one at that. But for the opportunities it gives a uniformly able cast and the breeziness of its action, "Reggie Mixes In" is a story which will appeal strongly to audiences.

Bessie Love is Agnes, so it goes without saying that Agnes is vastly charming. One never questions Reggie's affection for this girl who dances to earn a living for her mother and herself, both of whom have known more prosperous days. Nothing could be more plausible than a deep interest in Agnes. Joseph Singleton, W. E. Lowery and Walter Higby are also well cast.

The production and the direction is a credit to William Christy Cabanne. The hand of an intelligent director is visible at all times. Reggie's fight with Tony is one of the fiercest and most stirring ever seen in a picture play. Fairbanks and Bennett must have been aware that they had indulged in a bit of physical exertion after it was over. Doubtless, "Reggie Mixes In" will prove an immensely popular attraction.

"Chip's Carmen"

Two-Reel Chaplin Burlesque by Juvenile Film Corporation. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THOUGH appreciating full well its uncertainty, we doubt that the future holds concealed in its gray mist a day when we will not be filled with amused wonderment at mimetic talent when possessed by beings of such tender years as the two Monahan children, Joseph and Janethel. We were treated to the experience again the other day while viewing the latest offering of the Juvenile Film Corporation.

"Chip's Carmen" burlesques a burlesque. Joseph Monahan, who is Chip, takes a nap after a visit to the picture show where he saw the "Carmen" of Chaplin and then in a dream he does a little "Carmen" himself. Don Jose became Darn Hosiery and now it is Bon Doze. In "Chip's Carmen" Bon Doze falls under the spell of Carmen's charm, not that there is anything unusual about that as long as the play is "Carmen," but the fights between Bon Doze and the Torreador with Carmen favoring first one and then the other with her calculated but alluring smiles make up the action of this one-reel comedy. There is a bull fight and in the crowded arena Bon Doze wages a victorious tussle with the fence-climbing bull. At this point Chip awakes to find that his pet goat has appeased the appetite of an enviably non-temperamental stomach with chunks of his nice white suit.

Joseph Monahan's Bon Doze is an excellent imitation of the Darn Hosiery of Chaplin. With more opportunity than previous Juvenile releases have given her, Janethel Monahan as Carmen is, to be sure, very remarkable. In this picture little Janethel scores a personal triumph. A diminutive Carmen in skirts the length, of which is compatible with the years of the impersonater, gives expression to the real character she sets out to portray.

Note the consummate coquetry of this veteran vampire.

The director, James A. Fitz Patrick, with the release of "Chip's Carmen," adds another to the list of successful pictures credited to him. Now well under way, Fitz Patrick is doubtless headed straight for a brilliant reputation in his chosen field. In producing such pictures as the "Chip" comedies he is doing a great deal for the children's program. The most notable thing is that the guardian need have little fear of being bored should a visit to the theater showing "Chip" pictures be decided upon by the powers that be.

"Whispering Smith"

Signal-Mutual Special Feature Released June 5. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

ADAPTED from a novel by Frank H. Spearman, this five-reel western drama has at once the advantages and the faults of common to such adaptations, advantages in material, in incidents and characters which a play written primarily for the screen would not have, faults in that much of this, when transferred to the screen, is not clear unless one has read the original story. While some of the actions and situations of this play are confusing, still into the pictures has been put the spirit and the vigorous action which characterize the Spearman novels. There are a number of spectacular scenes worthy of note, the wrecking and burning of the freight cars, for instance.

J. P. McGowan, who directed the production, also plays the title role, that of a sheriff who is sent into a lawless district to investigate the frequent cases of looting wrecked trains. Suspicion points clearly to Sinclair (Paul G. Hurst), leader of the wrecking crew. "Whispering Smith" is disturbed when he meets Sinclair's wife, Marion, whom he had formerly loved. Helen Holmes, as Marion, has a role different from her usual style and she handles it very creditably.

Smith learns that Marion is unhappy with Sinclair, and his sympathy for her reawakens the old love. Because of this, he resignes from the district, asking that his brother be sent in his place. The brother is killed, and Smith comes back determined to punish those responsible. In the meantime, Marion has left her husband and is supporting herself in the village.

Much of the story is filled with the spectacular events in the battle against Sinclair and his band. Marion aids Smith in at lease one instance against his enemies. Things gradually straighte out more or less, and Sinclair, who has never been proved guilty, asks for another chance. Because of Marion, Smith tries to help the man. And although he loves Marion, he persuades her to return to her husband.

The installment ends here, but the further events of the novel will be given in the sequel, under the title, "At Medicine Bend."

The cast of players who appeared in "The Girl and the Game" serial are prominent in this play. McGowan again shows his power of creating a vivid character which stand out even in the midst of a play of exciting events. Beside the featured players, the cast includes Paul C. Hurst, Thomas Lingham, Chance Ward, Leo Maloney, N. Z. Wood, Sam Appel, F. Van Norman, Walters Rogers, William Brunton.

"The Pilgrim"

Two-Reel "Mustang" Offering Released June 9. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A NUMBER of western scenes and characters have been assembled in this picture. The leading roles are taken by Frank Borzage, Anna Little and Jack Richardson. Dick La Reno and Mary Gladding are also in the cast. The story deals with an odd character called "The Pilgrim," and his adventures in western localities. He appears in various surroundings, accompanied by his pack-burro, and he lives the life as he finds it. He meets a girl, falls in love with her, only to learn that she is engaged to another man. Then he journeys on.

This is the theme of the story, but in the presentation there is much which is not clear. The pictures of western life are interesting, and well photographed, typical of the scenes in "Mustang" offerings, but the spectator wonders frequently just what it is all about.

The Pilgrim arrives at a ranch about the time that the foreman's daughter, Nita, arrives home from school. When another employe of the ranch is hurt, Nita assists the Pilgrim to care for him, and in this way they become good friends. But when the Pilgrim declares his love, Nita shows him the photograph of the man she has promised to marry.

The two reels contain many typical western pictures, riding contests, dance-hall scenes, et cetera. These do not compensate, however, for the lack of an interesting tale.

"The Thousand Dollar Husband"

Blanche Sweet in Lasky-Paramount Melodramatic Comedy. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE THOUSAND DOLLAR HUSBAND" gives screen patrons an opportunity to see the popular and attractive Blanche Sweet in the role of a Swedish domestic servant who inherits a fortune from her long-lost uncle. This part takes nothing from the charm of its player; in fact, the player is more Blanche Sweet than she is Olga Nelson, maid of all work in a boarding house.

Miss Sweet and some of the members of her supporting cast give pleasing performances, but they are handicapped somewhat by the play they enact. This comedy, with its many touches of melodrama, is both thin and colorless. Occasionally in the course of the first four reels the play presents a good situation, but in the last reel the spectator finds himself interested only in the players and the artistic settings.

But in the case of this offering indifference ends with the story itself. The acting in most cases and some scenes whose humor is the result of the director's skill in supplying business make "The Thousand Dollar Husband" a picture not incapable of holding its audience interested throughout.

The story concerns itself with a girl who works in a boarding house catering to college students. Olga shows a preference for a young man named Gordon. His room receives special attention and at the table his every wish is ministered to by Olga. Her rich uncle's will provides that she will receive all his holdings only in the event that she be married before her next birthday. Olga can think of no one to marry and the birthday comes within the week.

Gordon is in debt, and to make matters worse his wealthy father has lost his fortune. When Olga learns this she is struck with an idea. If Gordon marries her she will receive the fortune and she will see to it that he gets the thousand dollars necessary to pay his debts and return to his father. The youth has a vision of his mother and sister spurning the servant, and he refuses. Then he has another vision. This time it is of his heart-broken father, and he accepts. Immediately after the wedding they part. Gordon goes back home and Olga delivers herself and her fortune into the hands of a fortune-teller who has promised to make a lady of her.

Strangely enough, Olga is taken to the town where Gordon lives. When he meets her again he is surprised to see her so beautifully dressed and so well able to carry herself easily in the drawing room. His first impulse is to pay her the money he received for marrying her, but then he is made to realize that she is in the clutches of criminals. Then he says he will do his duty and announce her as his wife, but Olga don't want his duty any more than he wants her money, so it takes a little melodrama to bring the lovers together.

Theodore Roberts is the ailing, crabbed uncle, and his acting is, as usual, most agreeable; enough so to make one feel a bit sorry that the uncle had to die so early in the play. Tom Forman, Horace Carpenter, Lucile La Varney and E. L. Delaney have the other prominent parts and Camille Astor and James Neill complete the cast. Paul Perry, the cameraman, deserves a word of praise. The photography is one of the pleasing features of "The Thousand Dollar Husband."

"The Secret of the Submarine"

Chapter Five of the American-Mutual Serial. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE various parties interested continue their attempts to locate the books of Dr. Burke, which have been sold at auction and two of which, at least, contain the coveted secret of the submarine. In the last episode, the list of purchasers had been discovered, and the American, Morton, Olga, the Russian adventuress, the Jap spy and Cleo (Juanite Hansen) and Lieutenant Hope (Thomas Chatterton) all rushed to the dwelling of the first on the list of buyers, Stephansky, the bomb-maker. There there was a fight and a bomb explosion.

The fifth episode in this serial, which deals with an invention which would revolutionize submarine building, begins just as the smoke has cleared away after this explosion. Cleo, it appears, had been rescued, just before the explosion, by "Hook" Barnacle, the eccentric character so well played by George Clancy. The other people were more or less shaken up, but no one was killed. The book which Stephansky purchased at the auction proves to contain no secret, after all. So all of the rivals set out for the dwelling of the second purchaser on the list. This is a Mrs. Del Marr, who is giving a reception that evening. Only Hope and Cleo are invited, but the others manage to gain admission under various pretexts, and during the evening try to get possession of the precious books. Olga, the adventuress, finds secret doors and passageways in the house, and is prepared to take advantage of them, while the Japanese agent, disguised as a servant, puts through his schemes.

Before the evening is over, there is a conflict between the seekers. In the confusion which follows, Cleo gets the books, but just as the picture ends, a mysterious hand opens one of the secret panels and takes the books away from her.

A new complication enters the story in this installment when Morton's wealthy uncle dies and in his will reveals that Cleo Burke is his niece and his heiress and that Morton will inherit the fortune only after her death. Morton, therefore, has another reason for working against Cleo.

So the story continues, with its various thrills and twists. This chapter will be released June 19.

"Saints and Sinners"

Famous Players-Paramount Version of Jones' Play. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

WITH the acting of the British star, Peggy Hyland, and the production given it by James Kirkwood as its outstanding features, the Famous Players picturization of the Henry Arthur Jones play, "Saints and Sinners," will meet with the approval of picturegoers; for the story it tells is really sympathetic, contains some good dramatic moments and, best of all, it is simple and clearly told. "Saints and Sinners" is an old-fashioned melodrama, and while it may have lived its life as a stage play, it has been successfully revived, with such changes as were necessary, in this Famous Players film.

The picturesqueness of the settings chosen by Mr. Kirkwood and the atmosphere they give to the action has much to do with the generally pleasing impression this picture creates. But it is not only in the beauty of many charming pictures which excited our admiration for Mr. Kirkwood's work. In a number of scenes the direction is alone responsible for the effect they have upon the entire story. As an example, one may mention the scene in which the hotel guests are attracted to the room where Captain Fanshawe and Kingsmill struggle. Here the extra people conduct themselves quite naturally and the way they all file out of the room and disperse is equally natural and a bit humorous.

If Peggy Hyland's future performances before the camera are the equal of her impersonation of the sinned-against Letty whose father is a minister and whose affections go out to a villainous albeit attractive captain, she in a short time will find herself comfortably enveloped in the favor of many screen patrons in this country. Miss Hyland is comely and engaging of manner. Furthermore, she acts with much intelligence and natural restraint.

The story is of a girl who finds a visitor to the country town in which she resides very attractive. Her father warns her that they know little about the stranger. Contrary to the promise she made her father, Letty meets Fanshawe just once more. He tricks her and she finds herself in the city and obliged to stop at a hotel he selects. A trustee of the church who wishes to use the minister to further a crooked business deal forces the girl's father to resign his pulpit. However, the end brings happiness to Letty, who marries the now prosperous Kingsmill, her loyal friend, and the minister is asked to return to his old pulpit.

The supporting cast is good. Albert Tavernier is real and he wins sympathy for the minister; Hal Forde is well cast in the heavy role, and Wm. C. Lampe is a satisfying George Kingsmill. Clarence Handyside is a good crooked banker whose side whiskers curve and taper into sharp little points which grow into the corners of his mouth, and Estar Banks and Horace Newman complete the cast.

"The Sorrows of Love"

SURROUNDED by true Italian atmosphere, procured at no little effort on the part of the producer, and an effective but not consistently strong supporting cast, Bessie Barriscale invests the character this love romance gives her with the remarkable acting skill she possesses and so faithfully does she enter into the spirit as well as the appearance of the part that an appealing personality and some beauty remain hidden somewhere within the person of the black-haired, dark-complexioned Beatrice.

The character as played by Miss Barriscale is not without personality, however. Beatrice is not only convincing because she looks Italian. Actions supplement appearance and the result is that Miss Barriscale's Beatrice, if not charming, is impressive.

This story of an Italian nun's adventure into the world beyond walls whose protection she has enjoyed since childhood is admirable of construction. For what impressiveness the picture contains depends upon characterization more than strength of plot. To repeat, the acting and the production are the main features of "The Sorrows of Love." The story is by Elaine Sterns and J. G. Hawks.

Beatrice receives her first desire to enter the world of which she knows so little when she hears the account of the Contessa Angelica, whose guardian has placed her in the convent to put an end to her love affair with a painter of low birth. At first Beatrice condemns the Contessa, but the latter's retort is that she knows nothing of love and the sufferings of the world beyond the convent walls. On her death bed the Contessa gives the nun a ring and receives her promise to carry it to her lover, Carlo Parodi.

Parodi belongs to a society of workers who, under the guidance of Guido Perli, strive to defeat the oppression of the poorer classes exercised by the wealthy, whose champion in the Council Chamber is the Prince Candoni. Beatrice attends some of the metings and she successfully pleads with the members to overcome Cadoni's measures through the eloquence of their leader. Between Perli and Beatrice there comes a strong love. Through an error, she believes him faithless and deserts him. Perli becomes bitter. He leads his followers to the Palazzo of the Prince. Upon arriving they find the soldiers awaiting them. Numbers are killed, among them Perli, who lives just long enough to hear the confession of the sorrowing Beatrice and forgive her. Beatrice then returns to the convent.

Next to the acting of Bessie Barriscale, the Carlo Parodi of Wedgwood Nowell is the most convincing and impressive character portrayal in the picture. William Desmond is not well cast. His Guido Perli is satisfactory, but that is all. Ora Carew and Herschel Mayall are others in the cast. The detail and the artistic effect of the scenes throughout reflect credit on the director.

town, judging from the number of official positions he held, Otis Harlan is very funny. His work is a delight throughout the story, and his change from one role to another as he changes the labels on his cap is much more amusing than the slapstick scenes on which the humor of the rest of the play depends.

Although apparently intended as a satire on "uplift" movements, the plot is not handled well enough to attract attention because of cleverness. It is more of a burlesque than a satire. The story concerns a town which votes itself "dry." The druggist, who led the campaign, expects to sell liquor as a "tonic," thus gaining the business the village hotel has had. But Mink Jones runs a "blind pig" and the drug business goes on as slowly as before. The campaigners, who are the minister, the druggist and the doctor, investigate the affair, and have Jones fined. But just before that, Jones had brought to the town a group of flirtatious damsels who succeeded in compromising the uplifters, and, unknown to them, Jones had taken a motion picture of their gambols. When these are shown on the screen, the investigators lose interest in the campaign and the fine is remitted.

The cast of players includes Grace Darmond, John Charles, James Bradbury and Leslie King. T. N. Heffron is the director.

"Shadows"

Knickerbocker Star Feature Released June 2. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

MAKING use of the double role, mistaken identity, dramatic invention and one or more developments which do not convince, "Shadows" is a three-reel Knickerbocker star feature that will bring favorable comment from audiences in spite of the shortcomings its story may have. At least its credulity straining moments lead to situations that compel interest, which is not a screen play's most common asset.

The double exposure scenes—the reviewer always feels in duty bound to mention these scenes because the producer and the press agent invariably have so much to say about them, if they happen to be good—are splendid examples of the technical side of motion picture production. In this picture the double exposure is really well used. The timing is perfect and the scenes are attractive.

The production in all details is very satisfactory. The story is unfolded in a realistic atmosphere and the acting is agreeable in every case. Taken as a whole, this picture compares favorably with the Knickerbocker's best offerings. The attention of the spectator is held from the beginning to the end.

The main issue is the ever-popular "falsely accused" one. A young man defends a woman who is being attacked by his employer. The woman is the employer's sister-in-law, who has come to ask his aid for her husband, who has become blind and requires an expensive operation. While the two men are struggling, Agnes helps herself to some of the money lying on Howard's desk.

Howard accuses Duncan of the theft and because the latter happens to have some bills in his pocket, he is arrested. The jury finds him guilty, and though Howard is now aware that Agnes stole the money, he does nothing to help Duncan. When he is released from prison he meets his double, who is wealthy. They exchange places and identities. Agnes is without employment or money, her husband having killed himself, and when Duncan meets her he engages her as secretary. The wealthy man, garbed in old clothes, is arrested for going into his own home. This leads to Duncan's vindication. Howard is shot by Agnes, who does it to protect Duncan, in whose arms she is seen when the end of the picture is reached.

Frank Mayo and Lillian West play the leading roles. Mayo has most of the work and he performs it effectively. Miss West also plays her part well. She is an appealing Agnes. "Shadows" was produced by H. M. and E. D. Horkheimer.

"Our People"

Three-Act Essanay Drama Released June 3. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE small-town atmosphere caught in this offering is its best feature. There are a number of interesting, human situations in this story, which concerns the editor of a small-town paper. Bryant Washburn is the editor, the hero of the drama, while Hugh Thompson is the villain. Gertrude Glover, an especially pleasing ingenue, is the heroine. Miss Glover's work has freshness and charm. Another pleasing role is that of the heroine's Aunt Hattie, played by Florence Oberle, who proves the good fairy in her niece's love story. This type, not unusual in real life, is not overdone in pictures. In fact, this sort of character is all too infrequently met with on the screen.

In spite of minor inconsistencies, the plot is presented so sincerely that one wonders at the introduction of the village miser, played by Richardson Cotton. Small towns may contain such eccentric characters, but in this case at least, the introduction of one is not convincing and spoils the realism of the cast.

The title of the picture is taken from a book which the hero writes. He is Ed Bruce, the editor of the town newspaper, and in love with Ellen Calhoun, who is a reporter on the staff. Ellen's father is the banker of the village, and does not approve of this love affair. A rival suitor persuades the father that Bryce is a gambler, and Ellen is forbidden to see him. But Aunt Hattie, who has come from the city, approves of Bryce, and when she learns of his book, uses her influence in securing a publisher. Later the rival suitor, who is employed in the bank, uses some of the bank's funds, and to cover his misdeeds, starts a panic. But Bryce, through his influence with the people, is able to assure them of their safety. So the father withdraws his objections to Bryce as a son-in-law and the romance is allowed to continue.

The picture ends with few scenes which tell of Aunt Hattie's own romance. While these drag the play a bit, after it is obviously finished, still sufficient interest has, perhaps, been aroused in the character to warrant them.

The photography throughout is good. The subtitles are worth noting, their bright style adding to the spirit of the play. Charles McQuirk is the author of the story.

"The Mysteries of Myra"

Chapters Sixth, Seventh and Eighth—International Serial. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IN the sixth, seventh and eighth episodes of "The Mysteries of Myra," it is most gratifying to note, one finds that the element of suspense marks practically every scene. This is surprising only in so far as the promises of the first two episodes are being lived up to, which puts "The Mysteries of Myra" in the select class of see-the-next-episode photoplays.

The wealth of material presented by this unusual subject is being splendidly utilized. The author of the story, Hereward Carrington, is the source of the statement that gives us to understand that nothing depicted in these episodes has been imagined merely for the sake of making novel situations in the story, but instead such things as thought photography, the projection of the spirit body, its materializing into a body of substance and weight, and the other strange occurrences treated in this picture are based upon the conclusions of experts in the field of psychical research.

While those who have made a study of the subject and are convinced of the possibilities of such phenomena have as yet been unable to give the other majority anything very concrete, the subject is mighty interesting, and in "The Mysteries of Myra" it is handled in this manner. Even if you don't believe a word of it, there is no getting behind the fact that the play is interesting, and what more can the entertainment seeker ask for?

The outstanding feature of these three chapters is the production given them. The Whartons have accomplished some wonderful effects with the camera. The change of expression in Myra's face at times when the spirit of the Grand Master, whose astral body is in possession of her material body, strongly asserts itself, and several other remarkable effects which the story calls for, really set a new standard in motion-picture production.

The sixth episode finds Myra's body dominated by the spirit of the Grand Master of the Order. Payson Alden cannot persuade Mrs. Maynard that this is so, though she cannot account for the strange actions of her daughter. The Master plans Myra's death after he has sent his astral body to take possession of his own material body. Myra, imbued with his soul, goes to a hut in the hills and there commences the operation. Dr. Alden is guided there by a message from the spirit of his former servant. He cannot harm the Master without harming Myra, so he is helpless to do anything but rescue the girl after the Master's spirit has changed bodies with that of Myra. Together, the two reach safety.

The next chapter tells of an attempt upon the life of the girl by both Varney and the Master. They project their astral bodies and upon arriving at the girl's home the spirit body materializes. With weight and substance her destruction is possible to the leaders of the Black Order, but Varney's faltering at the last moment proves her salvation in one case and a trap set by Alden is the means of saving her in another.

The trial of a disobedient member of the Black Order opens the eighth episode. This member is promised life if he will kill the girl. Thought photography aids Alden in defeating this plan.

Jean Sothern deserves very high commendation for her acting in these chapters. They give opportunities and she proves herself richly deserving of them. She is particularly good in the sixth episode, in which as the girl imbued with an evil spirit she creates a very favorable impression. Howard Estabrook, Allen Murnane and M. W. Rale are also excellent in these chapters.

"The Spider and the Fly"

William Fox Drama Featuring Robert Mantell. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A TALE of "madness and sadness and woe," with enough tragedy packed into five reels to supply an ordinary producer for a year is this typical Fox offering, directed by J. Gordon Edwards. Franklin B. Coates is credited with the story, and in combining the horrors which might befall particularly ill-starred human beings during the most wretched of lives, his ingenuity is amazing. If there is one sorrow which is omitted, the spectator will not be able to recall what it may be. A review of the play must resemble a catalogue of crime.

The picture is well done. Photographically it is beautiful. With Robert Mantell, Genevieve Hamper and Stuart Holmes leading the cast, the acting is, of course, good. Holmes is especially notable in his role of Lantier, whom he makes one of the most despicable characters imaginable. Miss Hamper's beauty is very effective in this play. She does not display great emotional force, but with so much drama around her, her particular type of loveliness forms one constant high light in the story, around which all the tragedy surges.

The story begins when Delano (Robert Mantell) kills his best friend in a drunken quarrel. He vows never to touch liquor again, but he breaks his vow and becomes a lover of Blanche Le Noir (Genevieve Hamper), a noted adventuress, who wins his love on a wager. Blanche's favorite is Lantier (Stuart Holmes). The most painful scene in the play is the one in which Lantier puts his own daughter into the power of the adventuress. The girl, Nana (Claire Whitney), is saved by a young American who later marries her. However, even these two do not escape from the wholesale tragedy of the play, for the young man's sister becomes a victim of Lantier. In the end, the American kills Lantier, and Delano denounces Blanche, who is converted to a religious life, and goes about repairing some of the damage she has done. But Delano dies, still mocking her.

This is a sketch of the principal tragedies. There are a number of others. There is vague attempt to throw the blame for things on liquor. But the idea of the play is plainly to "thrill." As a variation, an exhibitor may offer a play of this sort to his patrons. It is well enough done to fit into a high-class theater, whose patrons, however, will not take it too seriously. There is an overloading of sensations. Not too much tragedy, but too many tragedies kill the artistic effect of this drama. Any one of the plots could be used to produce a haunting, thrilling tale of disaster. But when one dissolves into another, as in this case, the tension becomes too great to last and we cease to respond. The danger in using too many plays of this sort is not, to most audiences, a moral danger. The danger is to the finer taste and keener sensibilities of the photoplay patrons.

"The Lights of New York"

Vitagraph Blue Ribbon Feature Released May 29. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A SERMON delivered from the pulpit of one who vehemently opposes such worldliness as is indulged in by frequenters of cafes where dancing is the attraction, could hardly paint more vividly the so-called cabaret form of amusement as an evil striking at the very foundations of society than the one set forth, not intentionally, perhaps, in "The Lights of New York." In this story a crook decides to go out for big game, so he buys dress clothes and a few dancing lessons, visits a cafe and wins a wealthy girl's consent to marry him.

Though "The Lights of New York" is not purposely preachy, and as a matter of fact it is not a preachment, still it does remind one of some utterance from the pulpit. One or two true to life incidents are overdrawn and the rest of the story is improbable altogether. "The Lights of New York" is frank melodrama and what weaknesses it has come not so much from the melodramatist's license to deal in possibilities instead of probabilities, but more from the distortion of facts. A crook, both vicious and brutal, who has never experienced a single good impulse, whose life has been spent in bullying his physical inferiors in a low environment, cannot masquerade as a foreign nobleman and convince people of refinement and culture that he is just because he has taken a few lessons in deportment from a dancing master.

The settings are good, the photography satisfactory and the acting not bad, but "The Lights of New York" falls considerably below the Blue Ribbon standard. The picture must suffer adverse criticism because of this. Surely one cannot compare it with such excellent offerings as "The Suspect," "The Law Decides," "God's Country and the Woman" or "The Two-Edged Sword," to mention only the recent Blue Ribbon releases.

A crook robs an elderly banker and the victim dies from shock. The banker's daughter is inconsolable and to prevent her going into a decline, her physician advises some entertainment. She visits a cafe and meets the crook, but does not recognize him. He now wears dress clothes and carries himself faultlessly, and when he speaks he even sounds the final 'ngs, and that is that, not "dat." She falls in love with him and the marriage ceremony is about to take place when two of his former associates who have been aided to a higher plane in the social scheme expose him. The girl then turns to her friend, the settlement worker, who has long been in love with her.

Leah Baird, Walter McGrail, Adelle De Garde, Arthur Cozine and the other members of the cast played conscientiously and we have praise for them. The picture has action, and it must be understood that it will satisfy the audience whose tastes run toward the melodramatic to the extent that improbabilities are willingly overlooked, even jars to the intellect unheeded, as long as the heroine is lost, then saved and the villain finally put in jail.

"Sherlock Holmes"

Seven-Act Essanay Drama Featuring William Gillette. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

IN THIS offering, William Gillette enacts for the screen the role which he has made famous on the speaking stage, "Sherlock Holmes," the master detective created by Conan Doyle. The photoplay is adapted from the stage play, which was built from two of the shorter detective stories. The main thread of the plot concerns the recovery of important letters from a young woman who holds them in order to get revenge on their writer, a nobleman who ruined her sister. This episode will be remembered in the story, "A Scandal in Bohemia." The woman in the case, "Alice Faulkner," by her cleverness aroused the detective's admiration. This serves as the basis of the love story contained in the drama.

The play is frankly a melodrama, well produced. Arthur Berthelet directed this screen version and has succeeded in presenting its thrills effectively. Many of the settings are interesting and unusual. Much of the photography is very good. A number of big scenes stand out prominently, in which the suspense is cleverly managed. But as a whole, seven reels seems lengthy; the play drags in the first part and some of the story is vague. The acting is in keeping with the melodramatic situations. Gillette shows himself a clever screen actor in the title role. Ernest Maupin is very good as the master criminal, "Professor Moriarty," while Edward Fielding, in the small part of "Dr. Watson," the chronicler of the adventures, stands out vividly. Another small part which stands out is "Billy," the office boy, played by Burford Hampden. Marjorie Kay is pleasing in the leading feminine role, Alice Faulkner.

Sherlock Holmes, in the employ of a noble family who is seeking to regain the letters, is not the only one who wishes them. Alice is made a prisoner by a band of crooks who want the letters for use in blackmailing the writer of them. Alice is saved from the crooks by Holmes, who does not get the letters. Professor Moriarty, the chief of the criminals, calls on Holmes, intending to kill him. But Holmes outwits him. This scene is very well presented, perhaps the best in the play. Later the gang plot to kill Holmes when they lure him to their den. Alice learns of the plot and follows to save him. She is discovered and imprisoned. Holmes arrives but saves her and himself and has the place raided by the police.

Alice still has the letters, and Holmes predicts that she will finally return them herself. Since she has fallen in love with the detective, she gives him the letters rather than have him denounced. But Holmes also has come to love Alice and will not accept them, so she returns them to the nobleman and then goes back to Holmes.

"East Lynne," which will shortly be shown as a William Fox photoplay with Theda Bara, Stuart Holmes, William H. Tooker, Stanhope Wheatcroft and others in the cast, has been played since 1863 on the legitimate stage. Such famous players as Frederick Warde, John McCullough, Lucille Western, Wilton Lackaye, McKee Rankin, Marie Wainwright and Clara Morris have appeared in it.

ESSANAY'S JUNE RELEASES

Exceptional Short Releases as Well as Two Multiple Reels, "That Sort" and "According to the Code"

The popularity of the shorter pictures is being reflected in the releases of a number of the film companies. Essanay was quick to discover that the public was tiring of the all feature program and is turning its attention to good short films as well.

On the June program are a number of these shorter plays as well as two features.

Among the three-reel releases are "Our People," featuring Bryant Washburn and Gertrude Glover; "Fool's Gold," featuring Darwin Karr and Nell Craig; "The Promise Land," and "The Little Volunteer," featuring Joyce Fair, the 11-year-old star.

Among the two-reel releases are, "Orphan Joyce," featuring Joyce Fair; "Putting It Over," featuring Marguerite Clayton and Harry Beaumont; a reissue of "The Girl at the Curtain," and "The Voice in the Wilderness," both featuring Francis X. Bushman.

The one-reel releases include Canimated Nooz No. 11, Wallace A. Carlson's cartoon drawings on news events of the day; a sketch book of Berlin by Vernon Howe Bailey, showing all the points of interest in the German capital, including the Kaiser's Palace, the Kaiser himself and his special bodyguard; and one of George Ade's famous fables, that of "The Undecided Brunetts."

The first of the multiple reel features is "That Sort," in which are shown a number of scenes at Monte Carlo, in the Riveria, on the Spa and mid-ocean scenes taken on the liner Imperator. These are actual motion picture photographs taken by Charles J. Branbin a few months prior to the breakout of the European war. This play features Warda Howard, Ernest Maupain, Duncan McRae, John Lorenz and Betty Brown.

The other multiple reel is "According to the Code," a drama which takes place in both the Civil war period and the present time. Lewis S. Stone and Marguerite Clayton are co-stars in this play. The scenes were taken in the exact location covered in the Civil war period showing Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, Chicamauga Park, Signal Mountain, and other famous battlegrounds of the south.

"Police," Charlie Chaplin's latest feature, has been released. This is said to be even beyond the regular Chaplin standard and to come under the head of a comedy classic. In this picture Chaplin is a released convict. If there is anything funnier than Charlie's walk it is his run, and this is worked overtime in "Police," as he is constantly dodging these guardians of the peace.

Henry B. Walthall has returned from the coast, where he has been taking a month's vacation after completing his work in the fifteen episodes of "The Strange Case of Mary Page." Although Mr. Walthall has acted in nearly forty reels of film since the first of the year, he says his short vacation has completely rested him and he is ready to begin work on his next play, a feature, the title of which has already been announced.

Runa Hodges, the eight-year-old, who captivated New York in support of Elsie Ferguson in Hall Caine's "Margaret Schiller," has been engaged by Jesse J. Goldburg, the general manager of the Rialto Film Corporation, lately organized with middle western capital for the production of feature photoplays, for an important role in the initial release of that company, the name of which is being withheld from publication.

"The Mortality of the Films"

To the Editor, MOTOGRAPHY:—Heaven bless you; it is bad enough to be misunderstood by the hoi polloi; but I am alarmed that one professional writer should misinterpret another. When you and I, who are (believe me) both men of genius, are at cross-purposes, how then shall we instruct the uninformed? Permit me accordingly to break a lance against the shield of your editorial on "The Mortality of the Films" in your issue of May 6. You err, friend. I said in "Harper's Weekly" that the making of motion pictures—photodrama, scientific, travelogue, or what you will—was not an art for reasons other than that of mere persistence. My phrase "That art should perish so!" was a mere ironical aside, you will grant me.

Immortality is not the sole test of art, of course. Your words and mine die daily and weekly. I agree with you that "the vast majority of new literature dies in infancy." This being very hopeful for everybody. You will agree with me that this vast majority is not art, I feel sure. Let us not quarrel about mere terminology. Milton, Shakspere, Praxiteles, Rembrandt and Palestrina will be alive and full of vigour when Laura Jean Libby, George Cohan, the inventor of the Kewpies, Bud Fisher, and Irving Berlin are entirely forgotten. Even you, camarado, are (if I can read your heart) secretly ashamed of the most immortal of the long-livers of the screen—"The Fly Pest."

I am quite open to conviction on this subject of art in motion pictures. There were nine Muses, you know; and in my article in "Harper's Weekly" I only dealt with two of the Arts in their relation to the screen. Read, I beg you, the conclusion of Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe" wherein the scientist finds something of which to be really proud in being the result of evolution from the triumphant gorilla, smashing his way splendidly through primeval forests. So, too, would I far rather be known as a master in a great handicraft (comparable to some of those mysteries and forgotten crafts of the mediaeval times) than try to shade myself in the doubtful penumbrae of any of the unwarranted arts, and be called an artist by the uncomprehending, be unheeded by the many, and be derided by those who really know. My hearty congratulations to you, none the less, in having opinions of your own.—CHARLES E. WHITTAKER, NEW YORK CITY.

Photoplaywrights Killed

The film colony on the coast recently mourned the death of two of their members and the serious injury of another. While driving in from a beach resort the machine in which Malcolm Strong, Clinton Holland Stagg and George Foster Plant were riding lost a tire and was hurled against a telegraph pole. Strong was killed instantly, Stagg died a few minutes later, and Plant was taken to a hospital in a very serious condition.

Mr. Stagg and Mr. Plant were members of the Lasky force, and Mr. Strong was a free lance writer.

Newspapers of the east are circulating a report to the effect that Mary Pickford will shortly become a member of the Vitagraph players. The Famous Players state that Miss Pickford will remain in their employ. The story is that some weeks ago Miss Pickford signed a contract with B. B. Hampton of the American Tobacco Company and assumes that Mr. Hampton has transferred the contract to the Vitagraph company.

The American Correspondent Film Company, Inc., producers of "The Battles of a Nation," recently announced their removal to new offices at the Godfrey building. Seventh avenue and Forty-ninth street.

MUSIC SCORES FOR PARAMOUNT

Frieda Hempel, Metropolitan Prima Donna, Discusses Proper Musical Accompaniments—Show This to Your Orchestra Leader

Frieda Hempel, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera House, has been very much interested in the proper musical accompaniments for film dramas, and was very much pleased when she was informed that the Paramount Pictures Corporation would hereafter

Show this to your orchestra leader. When such a scene as the above blossoms in the screen the theme below, from the love music of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," is the proper thing according to Frieda Hempel, prima donna.

send out complete scores with every play on its program, the proper selection being supplied for each scene appearing upon the screen.

The prima donna believes that by the proper adaptation of music the photoplay house will be raised to a much higher artistic plane, and that music is a prime necessity for the future success of moving pictures.

Frieda Hempel is quoted as saying: "It seems to me that in Wagner's music there is everything adaptable to any drama ever conceived. I would like to suggest to motion picture producers that there are no greater lover themes ever written in music than the love motif of 'Tristan and Isolde.'

"Take Bach's music, for instance. I can imagine nothing so suitable for a scene in a Pullman sleeping car as some of his fugues. The music of the 'Barber of Seville' would be excellent for thrilling situations. There must be substance and thought to the music selected for a big dramatic story, not only tunefulness and emotion.

"I was particularly impressed by the fact that in the production of 'Diplomacy' I enjoyed the poetic feeling of the play because of the ideal music selected, which I had not felt when I saw the play produced abroad. You see, music always idealizes."

Health Pictures Well Received

The North Carolina State Board of Health has prepared an educational picture show which they are exhibiting all over the state. The first trial of showing in a rural district was made at Fairview and was very favorably received.

The show was started off with a comedy, then followed the health pictures showing the care of the teeth and one showing the dangers of contagion from tuberculosis and the prevention and right living. Familiar songs were thrown on the screen between the films in which the audience all joined. The performance was given as a trial and no admission price was charged, but the audience requested that another show be given them next week with an admittance charge of five and ten cents to help defray the expenses.

New Manager for Swanson Theaters

Harry A. Sims, for a number of years one of the foremost film men in the intermountain motion picture world, has resigned as director, secretary and manager of the Swanson Theater circuit, comprising the American, Rex and Liberty theaters of Salt Lake City, Utah. Mr. Sims has acquired motion picture interests of his own in other cities. He plans to operate a string of houses in the smaller cities of Utah and Idaho, and has already secured options on four theaters.

William H. Swanson, owner of the circuit of theaters, has announced that Mr. Sims will be succeeded by W. Maurice Tobin, an internationally noted amusement man who first presented motion pictures in Madison Square Garden, New York. More recently he was with the New York Strand. He was in Japan when Mr. Swanson wired him regarding the new work. Charles W. Meighan, formerly of Ogden, is to be Mr. Tobin's assistant.

Duty on Films in Canada

According to a report made by the Canadian commissioner of customs, the following rates of duty hold in Canada:

Cinematograph films (developed) are dutiable in Canada, under tariff No. 657, at 32½ per cent ad valorem (general rate, applicable to United States products) and the minimum dutiable value of the films is fixed at $0.08 per foot. In case the actual purchase price (and, consequently, the value declared in the invoice) is higher than the minimum valuation, the duty is levied on the basis of the invoice value. Posters and other advertising matter are classified under No. 178, and are subject to a duty of $0.15 per pound when imported by mail (whether or not customs duty stamps have been used). If sent by freight or express, however, such articles are subject to an additional duty of 7½ per cent ad valorem upon importation from the United States.

"Picture Trust" Raises Prices

The picture-loving population of Macon, Georgia, is up in arms over a so-called moving picture theater trust which is charging them exorbitant prices for pictures. It is claimed that "The Battle Cry of Peace," which has been shown at Montgomery and other cities for 10 cents is raised in price to 25 cents in the afternoon and 50 cents in the evening in Macon. Also it is agitated that although the theaters were originally started as five-cent theaters, the "special admission" sign charging 10 cents has not been down for some time.

The reason given for this is that the three picture houses are all owned by the same concern, and the further fact that this concern is paying rent for two stores to keep out opposition.

The moving picture patrons declare they are going to demand a standard price for the pictures and at the same time a better class of pictures.

EXHIBITING IN SOUTH AMERICA

South American Film Performances Portray Some Unusual Features Which Might Be Copied by the Northern Exhibitor

An interesting study is offered to the film world in comparing the manner in which moving pictures are exhibited in South America with the theaters in the United States.

While the average motion picture theater in Argentine and Brazil compares very favorably with the houses in the states the South Americans have one peculiar feature in their "cinema bars." These "bars" are cafes in which motion pictures are exhibited and they take the place of the regular theater in many towns, especially those outside of Buenos Ayres.

Another peculiar custom followed in Argentine is the dividing of the performance into four sections, each running an hour. You can purchase a ticket for just one of these sections or for the entire performance. If you want to drop in for just an hour you state which one of the four hour sections would best suit your leisure time and a ticket is issued for that division. Although each of these sections consumes only one hour the performance seems much longer because the managers divide a reel, which we ordinarily term a "single reel," into three parts. The light are flashed up for an instant and the spectator has the unconscious impression that the performance is longer than is really the case.

The managers in Brazil have a very clever scheme for making their theaters social centers and raising the standard of the moving picture theater to that of the legitimate theater. All of the first class theaters are built with a huge lobby which is fitted up as a reception room and in which an orchestra is stationed. If the patrons arrive at the theater during a performance they are not allowed to enter the house proper until the program is completed, so they wait in the lobby, visiting and listening to the musical program. This custom is so generally in force that it has become the habit to make the lobby a social meeting place for the display of fashions in women's attire. It has become a daily habit to array one's self in one's best clothes and display them to the admiring throng in the lobby. These lobbies have become, in fact, veritable "Peacock Allies."

Buenos Ayres is celebrated as one of the greatest operatic centers of the world and the people of this city are very fond of the films in which the operatic and legitimate stage stars appear.

San Francisco May Get Studios

San Francisco has always been rather jealous of Los Angeles because that vicinity had been chosen for locations of the big studios, but it looks now as if there might be an exodus from Los Angeles toward San Francisco.

The moving picture producers have been rather displeased with the attitude of Los Angeles toward the industry, and have felt that for the amount of money they were pouring into the city they were receiving very little consideration and very few advantages. Scenting this discontented feeling many communities all over the United States have made propositions to the Motion Picture Producers' Association to move to their particular locality, but none was framed so attractively as that of San Francisco. It was pointed out that San Francisco had much more to offer in scenic effects within a small radius than Los Angeles because mountains, woods, brooks, bay and ocean are practically within a stone's throw.

A quartet of film magnates from Southern California visited San Francisco recently, primarily to attend the meeting of the Police committee of the board of supervisors, but nevertheless they spent a great deal of time studying studio sites. The producers represented in the party were Frank W. Wood, manager of the D. W. Griffith Fine Arts studio of the Triangle Corporations; J. Barney Sherry, personal representative of Thomas Ince of the Triangle concern; Harry Kerr, representative of Mack Sennett of the Keystone Company; and Attorney Neil McCarthy, representing Jesse Lasky of the Paramount Company.

Claimed New Translucent Screen Described by Scientific American Would Allow Projection In Fully Lighted Auditorium

A moving picture screen, by means of which the pictures may be shown in a fully illuminated hall, is described in the Scientific American.

The screen is translucent. Instead of placing the projecting lantern in the theater, among the spectators or back of them, the apparatus may be located back of the stage and in a fireproof room entirely away from the audience. This fact, and the absence of darkness, are spoken of as contributing to greater safety. The screen, described as fireproof, was invented and developed by John F. Troeger. Because the light rays pass on directly to the spectators, and because of the nearness of the projector to the screen, a very high illumination is said to be made possible, contrary to the usual white screen and more remote lantern. Further, it is said that the eyes are not taxed by the contrast between the dark hall and light screen.

Another effect, described as due to the character of the surface of the screen, is the giving of an image of more depth and not so marked with the "flatness" common in moving picture displays. The front of the screen is marked vertically by very fine ribs or prisms, which produce this result. "The camera," says the Scientific American article, in discussing this point, "is a one-eyed instrument, and two eyes are necessary to get the double image which produces the sense of depth. The projecting apparatus ordinarily simply reproduces the flat photograph. But the ribs on the Troeger screen give our two eyes the duplex images we are accustomed to, and thus we get the so-called stereoscopic effect which nature intends we shall have when viewing any object that has form, and not flatness."

Gospel Preached by Moving Pictures

The First Congregational Church of Lima, O., has a complete motion picture outfit which will be used for entertainments two or three evenings during the week and also for preaching the gospel Sunday evenings. The Rev. Chester Bucher, pastor of the church, says he will base his sermons on the pictures showing the life of Christ, the story of Esther, David, Joseph, Elijah, Samson, Solomon, and a number of others.

ABOUT BUDDING PLAYS, AND NEWS OF THE TRADE

Unity Purchases Serial

The Unity Sales Corporation, through negotiations conducted by Andrew J. Cobe, its vice-president and general manager, has purchased the serial "The Yellow Menace." Edwin Stevens is starred in the feature.

Simultaneously with its appearance on the screen the novelized version of "The Yellow Menace," written by Louis Tracy, will appear in eleven hundred newspapers throughout the country. Mr. Cobe also intends to inaugurate a nation-wide publicity and advertising campaign which promises many sensational and unusual features.

It is understood that the largest sum ever paid for a serial was expended in the purchase of this film, and that the initial payment alone was $50,000.

The story of the play deals with the helplessness of America under present conditions to combat an Oriental foe. It points out the weak nature of the United States' defenses and her inability to defend herself against an invader from across the Pacific. The scenes range from China to New York.

Two Metro Features

"The Flower of No Man's Land," is the title of the five-part Metro-Columbia feature in which Viola Dana will make her debut on the Metro program. The supporting cast includes Duncan McRae, Mitchell Lewis, Harry C. Brown, Fred Jones, Nellie Grant Mitchell, Eldine Steuart and Marcus Moriarity. The scenes are laid in New York, the great American Desert and a western mining camp. Also there are a number of scenes depicting Indian customs and lores which are quite unusual. This feature will be ready for release on June 19.

Another release for the near future is "The Purple Lady," in which Ralph Herz and Irene Howley are co-stars, produced by the Rolfe Photoplays, Inc. This is a picturization of Sydney Rosenfeld's stage success. Miss Howley played on the legitimate stage, and in vaudeville before coming to the screen. Her latest screen success was with Lionel Barrymore in "A Yellow Streak."

Adelaide Woods with Pallas

Adelaide Woods, well known among patrons of the screen through her effective portrayal of character leads, has been engaged by Pallas Pictures to appear in important roles.

Miss Woods has appeared on the screen some three years, having been identified with Biograph for two years. After six months with Balboa she returned to Biograph. Her greatest work on the screen was evidenced in "Paths That Crossed" in which she scored a personal triumph. Preceding her affiliation with motion pictures Miss Woods played on the concert stage in many successes.

As Mrs. Cleave in "The American Beauty" a forthcoming Pallas Pictures subject starring Myrtle Stedman, Miss Woods will make her initial Paramount apearance.

Bostock Animals in New York

The greater part of the famous Bostock collection of wild animals has been removed from the big arena at the David Horsley studios and sent to Coney Island, New York, where they will be placed on exhibition at Luna Park, and will also be used in pictures.

The shipment of the beasts necessitated four private cars carefully laid out. Those to leave California were an assortment of lions, pumas, leopards, bears, elephants, polar bears, monkeys and kangaroos.

Ten of the Horsley force of players are also in New York.

Horsley Completes Nine Reels

The last half of the month of May has been marked by increased activities in the Horsley studios. Nine reels of film have been completed, and three new pictures have been started.

The completed subjects are "The Fool's Game," a two-reel drama, written by Crane Wilbur, who is also its star. Mae Gaston and John Oaker make up the supporting cast under the direction of Robert B. Broadwell.

In "The Star of India," also a two-reel subject, Margaret Gibson and William Clifford are co-stars, and the Bostock animals are used in large numbers.

Film Men Give Monster Show

The film interests, under the name of the Dallas Screen Club, will probably give a monster picture and vaudeville show at the Majestic theater soon, for the purpose of securing funds to complete the organization and secure a home for the Screen Club. At a meeting of exchange men and exhibitors to talk it over were Max Graf, manager of the World; Ned E. Depinet, manager of the Consolidated; E. T. Peter, manager of the United; W. G. Underwood, manager of Pathe; F. A. Logan, manager of the Paramount; E. H. Hulsey, of the Hulsey theater; W. M. Byrd, manager of the Fox; C. A. Clegg, manager of the Mutual, and P. S. Brinch, of the New York offices of the Triangle.

Otis Skinner Weeps

When at San Rafael, California, recently, watching the work of Beatriz Michelena in "The Woman Who Dared," Otis Skinner saw "The Unwritten Law" in the "California" projection room.

During the seven parts of the production and right up to the end the famous

The '49 western dance given recently by Douglas Fairbanks, the genial Fine Arts comedian. Among the notables present in their pioneering boots and "wooly west" costumes were Paul Dickey, Mary Alden, Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks, Al Jennings, John Emerson, Willie Collier, Elliot Dexter, Oscar Apfel, Edna Ferry, Charlie Chaplin and W. S. Hart. Fairbanks is seen at the hub of the group between the two white gloves. Marie Doro smiles at his side. The two vast, substantial smiles at his right are De Wolf Hopper and William Farnum.

actor sat in tense silence. Then came the big court room scene with Beatriz Michelena, as Kate Wilson, on the witness stand. This is said to be the greatest scene in which Miss Michelena ever displayed her talent as an emotional actress. Pretty soon Skinner reached over and touched Scott on the knee.

"She's got my pumps working too," he whispered.

ACTRESS MADE UNCONSCIOUS BY EXPLOSION

Miss Juanita Hansen is admittedly one of the most daring young leading women on the screen. She has taken about every possible kind of personal risk and seemingly enjoyed it. In taking a scene for "The Secret of the Submarine" recently, a house built on the edge of a high cliff was blown up while Miss Hansen was standing on the veranda.

The director desirous as he was of obtaining the greatest possible realism to the scene warned the brave little lady that she had better be running when the powder charge was exploded. She laughingly replied she would take care of herself but when the scene was taken Miss Hansen, working to get the acme of realism into the scene, was standing on the veranda when the house, lifted upward by the force of the explosion, toppled over into the sea.

The accompanying picture shows the actual explosion and hidden in the surrounding smoke is Miss Hansen. Members of the company rushed to her aid. Director Sargent gave her a sound lecture for her foolhardiness but congratulated Miss Hansen on having given to the big Mutual-American photoplay a scene, which for absolute sensationalism has few, if any, equals in motion picture production.

Shannon Fife's play, "Susie Snowflake," written for Ann Pennington, and especially selected by Famous Players to mark the debut of this dainty star on the Paramount program, is rapidly nearing completion under the direction of James Kirkwood. Fife's play gives Miss Pennington opportunity to display every angle of her versatility, from classic dancing to the more strenuous role of heroine in a big fire scene. It will be released on the Paramount program June 22.

Fife has also just completed a new Metro feature for Mabel Taliaferro.

One of the interesting characters who will be seen in "The Spell of the Yukon," a forthcoming Metro production in which Edmund Breese is starred, is Chief White Hawk, a genuine Sioux chief. Like many other intelligent Indians, he is a natural actor, and plays a very striking role in "The Spell of the Yukon." He was last seen on the Metro program in "The Lure of Heart's Desire," in which Mr. Breese was starred, and he made such a decided impression upon Mr. Breese that he was engaged for his present engagement.

Chief White Hawk will probably devote all his time to motion pictures in the future. He took "The Lure of Heart's Desire" to his tribal camp in Pine Ridge, South Dakota, recently, where he showed it to a large number of Indians. A majority of them had never seen a motion picture before, and when they saw their chieftain on the screen they were amazed. That night they held a pow-wow in honor of Chief White Hawk. They thought there was something spiritual in the appearance of their chief upon the screen. He said that before he left he explained, as best he could, this new art. Nearly all the Indians expressed a hope to appear some time before the camera.

MOTOGRAPHY, Chicago, Ill.

"The House of Mirrors," the first picture to be released by the Popular Pictures Corporation, will be ready for a premier showing within a few days. This picture is the first one to be produced by the Rialto Film Corporation, and no expense has been spared in an effort to make it the best that the picture art can produce.

A 10,000-mile jaunt to Hawaii and Japan is shortly to be taken by Director J. P. McGowan, Helen Holmes and numerous others of the cast, in order to obtain the proper realism for a number of the exterior scenes of "The Diamond Runners," a forthcoming Signal-Mutual five-part feature starring Miss Holmes.

the great waste, the west which offers its mighty deserts, sage brush, coyotes, mountains and stars, and she is a convert.

"For," says Miss Brockwell, "there is no life so free as that of outdoors. Give me a pony, supplies and a compass and I'll warrant I could pass a month on the Mojave desert with never a regret. I have often heard of the prospectors who spent their lives on the deserts and in the mountains and the stories of their love for their surroundings always seemed far fetched and exaggerated to me. But now I know it was the truth I heard. There is a lure to the desert in its awful mystery, and a certain comfort in the stars. It is a wonderful life, out of doors, and I'm mighty glad 'The Honor System' called us to the desert. I can hardly wait to return."

HARRY WEISS, METRO MGR.

Harry Weiss is 28 years old—but look at his experience.—In 1905 he worked for old timers like Bill Swanson and Carl Laemmle as an operator. Later he went to work for a Chicago Film Exchange. He had four of his own theaters in 1908 and 1909 and a year later was made manager of the Feature Film Sales Company; 1911, district manager for World Film Corporation; 1915, made manager of Metro Pictures Service, Chicago.

A strange coincidence is the fact that all the firms he was ever with he took positions with when they were small and put them over. This can be confirmed by referring to his record with the World and Metro Corporations. His favorite hobbies are automobiling and hustling contracts for his firm.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

The Girl Across the Way—Biograph re-issue—June 5.—Featuring Mae Marsh and Robert Harron. It was a lonesome old burg the boy found, back for his vacation. Interesting possibilities appeared in the girl across the street. He started in to show her life. It lifted the veil of his intention. Then came his repentance. She forgave as the "book of books" directed. The mother of ambition and wealth stepped in, but the boy took off his coat and got to work. As for the rest, a mother's a mother.

Otto the Reporter—Lubin—June 5.—Featuring Davy Don. Otto, a reporter on the Morning Argus, and single, is assigned to settlement work, where he sees many disagreeable sights. The women are masters and handle the men harshly. It happens that Dorothy, the city editor, and the feneral manager, a married woman, of the Argus, whose husband stays at home to mind the baby, are both in love with Otto, a shy and bashful man, and between the two he has his troubles. Dorothy finally wins Otto and the men who are trying hard to again get control of politics, look to him for their leader. Otto is missed from home by his wife, Dorothy. She goes in pursuit of him and finds him addressing a meeting of men. Dorothy enters, denounces them and takes her husband home; she puts the baby in his arms and tells him home is where he belongs.

A Temperance Town—(Three Reels)—Selig—June 5.—Featuring Otis Harlem and Grace Darmond. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

The Yaqui Cur—(Two Reels)—Biograph re-issue—June 6.—Featuring Lionel Barrymore, Robert Harron, Kate Bruce and Walter Miller. The prospector had taught the Indian boy the doctrine of peace. When his tribe resisted the attack of another tribe the boy did not take part. The din of the battle, as the horsemen circled them again and again, the moans of men caught under falling horses, struck terror in the boy's heart. The incensed warriors cast him from the tribe with the brand of a coward. It was then that his opportunity came to follow the white man's wonderful doctrine, "Big love man lay down life for friend."

Orphan Joyce—(Two Reels)—Essanay—June 6.—Featuring Joyce Fair. After losing their little girl Mr. and Mrs. Mason adopt Joyce, who resembles their lost daughter, from the orphanage. The girl, however, resents the selection of a new butler and exhibits a distrust of Jenks, who is in reality the tool of Jim Vaughn, the notorious leader of a daring band of crooks. Mason finds that he must produce $5,000 next morning or be declared insolvent and goes out to visit a friend. Joyce left alone goes up to her room and later in the evening hearing a noise down stairs, grasps her father's revolver and covers Jenks and Vaughn, who were about to escape with all the silverware they could find, and then phones Mason her predicament. The crooks are captured and Joyce is given $5,000 which was offered for their capture and she immediately turns it over to her father to save him from bankruptcy.

Vernon Howe Bailey's Sketch Book of Berlin and Scenic—Essanay—June 7.—This split reel offering is suggested as an extremely timely release. The German controversy has created a tense interest in the capitol city of the Kaiser's empire and the sketch artist has to offer in motion drawings, a picture of the city more clear than any photographs. His pencil has caught the principal government buildings, where the emperor's aids are now directing the great war, together with the famous palaces are located, have been transferred to the screen by this versatile artist who has made repeated trips to Germany. This release is highly instructive and at this time will satisfy a natural American's curiosity concerning the city of Berlin. Scenic from western America shares the reel.

The Scapegrace—(Three Reels)—Lubin—June 8.—Featuring George Routh, Adda Gleason, Alan Forrest and Evelyn Page. Jimmy Pierce, in love with Isabel Hammond, is accused of stealing money from the bank in which he works, and of which Mr. Hammond is president, but later on through Mollie "The Little Wild Girl" of the village, it is learned that Vernon Hammond is the guilty party and when Vernon learns that his father knows all he shoots himself rather than face him. Bird Hopkins and Aldelaide Bronti complete the cast.

Fool's Gold—(Three Reels)—Essanay—June 10.—Featuring Darwin Carr, Nell Craig, Patrick Calhoun and Marion Murray. Helen Rowe, wife of a wealthy business man, meets Gilbert Judson and Lois Bedford, who run a gambling house. She participates in their games, winning of course as the beginner always does. Her luck changes, however, and she begins signing I. O. U. slips for Judson. She gets deeper into debt than she can afford and becomes desperate. She receives a piece of jewelry from her husband which contains an unusually large diamond. She takes this to Judson, who suggests that there are other ways of paying. Gunther, a detective, saves Mrs. Rowe from Judson, he having found one of her I. O. U. slips. He gives Mrs. Rowe back her diamond piece and having learned her lesson she returns home to her husband.

Two Smiths and a Haff—Lubin—June 10.—Featuring Francis Joyner and June Daye. Betta Haff permits her parents to select a husband for her and they select John Smith, son of prominent but rather poor people and Betta consents to an engagement on account of his social position. Her brother, Haffen Haff, comes home from the East and brings with him Jack Smith, his chum and business partner. A few evenings before the wedding Betta receives a call from Eva True, who tells her that John had been engaged to her, but jilted her to marry Betta. Betta enraged tries to break her engagement, but is dissuaded from her purpose by the elders of the family. John gives a bachelor dinner the night before the wedding and the proceedings are so hilarious that the police are called in and all are arrested. Betta when she hears of the affair determines that the wedding shall not take place, but Haffen suggested that everything aimed at by Betta's marriage could be attained if Jack were to take the place of the other bridegroom and he does.

It is our aim to make this department as complete as possible, although to do this, we must have the co-operation of all the manufacturers of film in the United States. If brief stories of the films you are releasing this week are not contained in this department, it must be due to the fact that you have not supplied us with synopsis sheets. In that case please see that we are advised of your film titles and release dates, and furnished with a brief synopsis of the story. This department is intended for every film manufacturer, whether he uses our advertising pages or not.

Going West to Make Good—Selig—June 10.—Featuring Tom Mix and Victoria Ford. Tom Gilmore, a wealthy young easterner, loves Vicky, but she refuses to marry him because of her thoughts of the great free west. Vicky visits her uncle, a western ranch owner. Tom decides to follow Vicky westward, and try the life of a cowboy. However, he reaches the west before Vicky, and soon learns the ways of the cowpunchers. Vicky is soon to arrive, but in the meantime, three outlaws plan to hold up the stage. The bandits kill the driver and the stage team runs off with Vicky inside. Tom sees the driverless stage going at break-neck speed. He overtakes it in a desperate ride, rescues Vicky, who finds that the easterner has become a westerner.

Mutual Program

Jealousy's First Wife—(Two Reels)—American—June 5.—Featuring Vivian Rich, Alfred Vosburgh and George Periolat. Helen, the wife of Homer Withington, leads a terrible existence because of her husband's jealous fears. He accuses her of a flirtation with Randolph Truax, who up to that moment she did not even know. Later Truax's auto knocks Helen down and he takes her in his machine to her own home. He places her on the davenport and just as he is placing a pillow under her head Homer enters. Homer seizes a heavy cane and knocks Truax unconscious. Thus both places are left to stand on the bare merits of their food.

John Brewster's Wife—(Two Reels)—Thanhouser—June 6.—With Ernest Howard and Ethyle Cooke. John Brewster's wife, tired of the narrow town life, returns to the stage. Brewster later finds his wife in a compromising position and immediately suspects her. He forbids her to return to his home and circulates the report in town that she has been killed. Long afterward the wife saves her husband's bank from being robbed, fearing that he may be accused and the child's future marred. Then she subjugates pride and writes to her husband, explaining his false accusation. At last his New England sternness and pride also melt and he sets out in search of the wronged woman.

The leader of the spies tries to bribe Rube, who makes it rather warm for him. The spy then approaches the Aviator, who desiring to get even with Rube for taking the Colonel's daughter from him, tells the spy he will get the code for him. Rube gives the code to Madge for safekeeping and he is taken up in a plane with Art and up in the air he tries to get the book. Special Correspondence for Motography.

FOR the week ending May 20th, when "Salvation Joan" was running, the Clemmer front showed a motif of ivy climbing over white walls and flowers in window boxes in the two windows painted on the side walls, while real ivy was gracefully draped over the box office, and the doors were French windows through which faint black figures could be discerned.

The V. L. S. E. office in Seattle has just announced several changes in the personnel and duties of its force, due to the resignation of R. Clinton Montgomery, who has been selling Big Four features throughout the western part of the state of Washington. This territory is to be taken by Dan Donnellan, who has been editor of "Pals," the district organ published weekly for the benefit of exhibitors using V. L. S. E. productions. Mr. Donnellan's duties as editor have been assumed by Ryland Sizer, who has been with the organization several weeks, familiarizing himself with the publication of "Pals" in preparation for the position he is now to fill.

The Moving Picture Operators' Union, Local No. 154, of the International Association of Theatrical Stage Employes held a meeting in Seattle recently at which the following officers were elected to serve during the ensuing six months: W. W. Ladd, president, re-elected; George Smith, vice-president, re-elected; Arthur Bohnert, recording secretary, re-elected; Gene Havelick, financial secretary; H. F. Lampman, business representative, re-elected; M. F. Lorenz, treasurer; Jack High, sergeant-at-arms; H. H. Clark and F. W. Jiencke, executive board members at large; Frank Myers and H. F. Lampman, delegates to the Central Labor Council. The union begins the new half year with favorable prospects and with but three theaters, the Crown, the Circuit, and the Madison Street, refusing to deal with the organization.

Manager William Smythe of the Strand announces that he has just closed a contract with William Fox that will give the Strand the exclusive Seattle rights to Fox photoplays. The policy of the Strand as announced by Mr. Smythe will be the showing of one Fox production each week for either three or four days. Metro features, which are at present shown at the Strand, will continue to occupy the screen for half of each week.

A new policy is being tried out at the Class A Theater, a five-cent, first-run house in Seattle. Longer feature productions are being run than have heretofore been put on at that house. Five and six part films will be the rule for the present instead of three-part plays. The feature will be accompanied by one or more short plays, principally comedies.

The Pan-American Theater of Seattle, formerly the Pantages, has been leased by Manager Alex Pantages for a long term to the Fifth Avenue Amusement Company. This concern has renamed the house The Oak, and recently opened it as the home of first class vaudeville and feature motion pictures.

The Fifth Avenue Amusement Company, of which S. Morton Cohn, prominent theatrical man of Portland and Seattle, is president, operates a chain of theaters under this policy in a number of coast cities. Mr. Cohn is one of the fathers of popular-priced vaudeville in Seattle, having opened the old Star in 1905.

The Coliseum of Seattle, about which an article appeared in Motography at the time of its opening two or three months ago, has just installed a new curtain; not that the first one was unsatisfactory, but there had been a slight improvement made, and true to their policy of the best in everything, the Greater Theaters Company ordered the new screen for the Coliseum. The screen, which was purchased at a cost of $1,100, was shipped to Seatle without a blemish. Owing to the large size some trouble was expected in setting it in place in the theater, but none was experienced. The clarity and sharpness of detail as shown by this screen is said to be almost perfect.

TEXAS FLICKERS

By S. G. Parker

Special Correspondent for Motography.

The Wonderland theater at Enid, Oklahoma, opened up again the first of May under the management of M. A. Blackburn. This house has been closed for some time. The new management is using feature productions and a few acts of vaudeville.

The summer theater in San Antonio, Texas, is operated in a park especially built for the motion picture business, covering about one-fourth of a city block in the heart of the business district of the city. The walls are decorated with vines and flowers; there is a bandstand and band of twenty-five pieces; a hundred and fifty tables are situated so as to command full view of both screens, which seat six or eight hundred; and the main auditorium in the open air will easily care for three thousand with comfortable benches and chairs. Cushions, similar to those used in baseball parks, may be had at an additional 5-cent piece.

Upon two screens, situated so that the audience may view either, pictures are projected from two operating rooms. One screen carries comedies only, one and two-reelers. The other screen carries a five, six or larger film.

What may be called the main auditorium (for it's all open air) is excavated about five feet, giving a beautiful effect of the many terraces in the grounds.

Three ticket booths are distributed to get the dimes; yes, it's 10 cents admission—one booth facing on Commerce street, one on Crockett street, and another on Houston street.

The man who conceived this novel show-place is Dr. W. F. Box, owner and operator of the Petticlair theater, a five-hundred seat house along the usual lines, in the city.

The place is called "Donton Park"—as Dr. Box explains it, "Downtown Park" with the "W's" left out.

One may deposit a dime at any box office, walk in and enjoy beautifully rendered band selections, two picture shows simultaneously, sit at a table, be served with almost anything in the "eat and drink" line, and in addition enjoy the natural advantages of any park in summertime, when we of the southern section hunt cool places.

Donton Park opened May 27 with "Silver Threads Among the Gold."

"The" baseball game—for it is likely to go down in film history in Dallas as that—happened in May between the Konsolidated Film Katz and the Motion Picture Cubs, the two film teams in the Major City League in Dallas.

Much to the despair of one Jimmy Kelly of the Consolidated Film & Supply company, the Cubs took the game by a 2 to 0 count.

E. T. Peter, president of the United exchange, is also the big mogul of the Motion Picture Cubs.

E. T. Peter, manager of the Exclusive Feature Film Service, Dallas, handling the six-reel heart-interest picture, "Silver Threads Among the Gold," has unearthed some interesting information on the success of this film in various Texas towns. He wrote to a number of the exhibitors who had played it, asking of their success. One reply, from A. Martini, Dixie, Galveston, brought back the information that he "had only done $903.20 in two days" on this production. L. M. Ridout, Star, Denison, came back with: "It was a bad day when I played it, but I had a big crowd—I haven't the exact figures, but it was an extra good business." O. L. Billingsly, Auditorium Theater, Whitney, a town of around a thousand population, said, "Weather was bad when I played 'Silver Threads,' and I want to play it again in a couple of months." P. G. Cameron, Crystal, Dallas, said: "I broke my house record with it, and turned away 10,000 people in the four days of my first engagement."

John D. Jones, one of the partners in the Crystal Amusement company, Greenville, Texas, operators of the Rex and Crystal at that city, has sold his interest to F. E. Newman, his partner.

The Mirror Theater at Denison, Texas, built about a year ago by J. C. Colby, has been sold by Mr. Colby to J. V. Smith. The Mirror is a modern house, well equipped, and getting good business.

F. H. Logan has succeeded Max Graf as manager of the World Film corporation in Dallas. Mr. Logan is an old film man, having been in the southwestern territory with one or two exchanges and having been in charge of one of the larger picture houses in Atlanta for about a year. It is not known just what connection Mr. Graf, the resigned manager, will make. There is a rumor that a new manager will be seen in the World exchanges in Atlanta and New Orleans within next week. The World office at Memphis has been closed.

J. A. Holton, general manager of the Port Arthur Amusement company, Port Arthur, Texas, operating three houses in that town, visited Dallas recently seeking information relative to a cooling system to be installed in his houses. He also secured some big productions.

Hernandez & Garcia have secured the Star theater at Eagle Pass, Texas. They also have the Majestic, which they have closed.

R. W. Lynch, who is a brother of the president of the Southern Paramount Pictures company, S. A. Lynch, has taken charge of the Dallas office of the Paramount, succeeding F. H. Logan, resigned.

C. W. Holley, formerly at Eagle Pass, Texas, visited in Dallas last week, securing film and equipment for his new airdome at Uvalde, Texas. It is named the Electric Palace.

Motion picture houses in Oklahoma City are having a "time of it," to repeat a film man's expression. The various houses are running a large number of reels of film and giving several acts of vaudeville for small prices, in an effort, presumably, to "put the other fellow out."

The Overholzer opened last Sunday week with five acts of vaudeville and six reels of pictures. The prices are five cents for matinee and five cents and ten cents at night.

The Folly is running Blue Bird features at five cents admission. The Empress is sticking to a straight picture policy, with usually a five-reeler at ten cents. The Lyric gave seven acts of vaudeville and a five-reel feature at prices of ten cents and ten cents and twenty cents.

The Liberty gave five acts of vaudeville and five reels of pictures at ten cents and twenty cents; and the Met spun out twelve reels of pictures for a "jit."

M. L. Levine has remodeled his roof airdome at Corsicana, Texas, and will soon open with pictures, for the summer.

The Soledad Roof Theater at San Antonio, Texas, opened last week with feature productions. The Soledad Theater has been closed for the summer.

The picture show men on the Mexican border are not "bluffing" the exchanges when they write "business is on the blink." The people are so afraid of Mexican bandit raids that it is impossible to get them out after dark to the theater.

One exhibitor in a border town wrote an exchange man: "If I had a ten-reeler with Mary Pickford, Francis Bushman, the Gish girls, and all the other stars in it, I couldn't get over half a house."

San Antonio, Texas, is now in the throes of an evangelist aggregation, who is getting the crowds, while the picture shows are not. The well-known Ham & Ramsey, evangelistic team, are tarrying in the city for a spell. As yet they have not started their "picture show knocking" that usually comes out after being in a town for a few days. It was the Reverend Ham who stated from the platform that "picture shows are usually found in every community where low-class, ignorant people are found"; and otherwise, expostulating against the moving picture.

Among the visitors in film row in Dallas last week were W. B. La Nicca, of the Topic theater, Sherman, Texas, who came in to look over some feature productions; C. W. A. McCormack of the Crescent, Austin, Texas, who was "just looking around," as he said; both Phillips, from Fort Worth, "Daddy" Joe of the Odeon and "Brudder" E. H. of the Egypt; and another Fort Worthite over was R. A. Healy, of the Healy Theater.

"Betty's Dream" is the title of a one-reel film advertising a local bank, automobile concern, laundry, etc., made in Dallas by the Royal Film company.

E. F. Walker will open an airdome at the corner of Colonial avenue and Peabody street, in South Dallas, soon. Triangle and Paramount service will be used.

The new suburban motion picture house being built by E. L. Malone, near Jefferson avenue on Taylor street, in Oak Cliff, one of Dallas' populous suburban districts, is nearing completion. An $8,000 Fotoplayer will be installed in the house, and it will seat around 600. The front is concrete work, in the form of logs, which will be finished in colors to represent an old-fashioned log cabin structure.

Julius Levy, Brady, Texas, has purchased one of the big style U Wurlitzer orchestra pipe organs for his new theater. This is the lately invented instrument with the Duplex roll system, which permits the operator in the machine booth to change the music instantly from rag or popular refrains to deep, classical music, to fit the picture.

Another exhibitor to better his music is W. R. Fairman of Bryan, Texas. Billy bought one of the style U Wurlitzers some days ago.

Among the recent sales of the Western Automatic Music company of Dallas are:

V. J. Grunder, Cuero, Texas, bought a style O Wurlitzer orchestra organ; Sam Hefley, Cameron, Texas, who bought the first automatic instrument for a picture house in Texas, came back for a specially-built style K Wurlitzer; L. B. Green, Rotan, Texas, purchased a big automatic Wurlitzer; the Garden, managed by L. B. Crute, Jefferson, Texas; and the Elk, managed by F. A. McConicho, Marshall, Texas, also purchased Wurlitzer orchestra organs from the Western.

Tyler and Everidge have recently opened the Star Theater at Rising Star, Texas. They have a light plant and new projection equipment, and are getting started rather well.

J. R. Wells, from Denison, Texas, has bought the Garden summer theater at Longview, Texas, from H. R. Yates.

The Four States Amusement company was incorporated at Texarkana, Texas, last week for $750. They will operate the Lyric, Queen and airdome.

A. L. Teagarden, for several years with the General Film company in Dallas and Oklahoma City, has resigned the managership of that company in Oklahoma City, and will become aligned with another concern in the southwest.

The Consolidated Film Cats baseball team were the guests of the Consolidated Film & Supply Co., at a banquet at the T. M. A. clubrooms Friday night, May 26th. In addition to the Cats team, those present included Ned E. Depinet, manager of the Consolidated; Jas. B. Kelly, assistant manager; E. T. Peter, of the United; R. D. Thrash, of the Southern Theater Equipment company, and others.

Sam Dembow, manager of the World exchange in Atlanta, has resigned. Joe Marientette, manager of the General in Atlanta, succeeded Dembow.

Upon the resignation of Chas. D. Touchon as manager of the Houston office of the Consolidated Film & Supply Co., Harry T. Peebles was placed in charge.

Jess Cook has opened the Brookstone airdome at Denison, Texas. They are running vaudeville, light stock and pictures.

The Electric is the name of the new theater which opened at Commerce, Oklahoma, recently. The house is modern in every detail, seats 600, has a new model Simplex projector, and is using Bluebirds, Fox and short subjects.

A new picture house is reported to be in the field at Muskogee, Okla. When completed it will be 40x70 and will be across from the Yale theater.

L. C. McHenry has sold his interest in the Southern Cabiria company, of Dallas, to his partner, F. J. Boyer. This exchange handles "Cabiria" and the California M. P. corporation production, "The Unwritten Law." Mr. McHenry was formerly manager of the World. His future plans are not known now. Mr. Boyer will manage the southern "Cabiria" concern.

Baseball is still a big interest in the exchanges in Dallas. The city major league has two picture teams, the "Consolidated Film Cats" and the "Motion Picture Cubs." They play each Sunday afternoon, and the games usually draw a bunch of film men and exhibitors.

A. W. Lilly, known among his friends as "Jack," operating two houses in Commerce, Texas, has purchased the two theaters in Wolfe City, a town not far from Commerce. The houses were the Sunset and Busby, but immediately after Jack got them, one of them was changed to the Hippodrome, which is the name of one of the Commerce houses.

C. J. Musselman's new motion picture house in Paris, Texas, will be modern in every particular and will be rather large. Though it will seat around 900, at least 200 chairs more could be used in the building, but C. J. wants comfort for his patrons first. Paris was visited by fire some weeks ago, and Mr. Musselman lost his three theaters. He is now operating a "temporary" house.

SOME NEW THEATERS

Michigan

One of the most uniquely arranged motion picture theaters in the city is rapidly nearing completion at 425 East Lansing, Michigan. J. J. Randall is erecting the building and will be assisted in the management of the theater, which is to be in operation by June 1, by Rex Durand. The unusual feature of the new theater will be the placing of the screen at the front of the building adjoining the entrance. The seats will face the entrance and the machine booth will be located in the rear of the building where ordinarily the screen would be placed. It will have a seating capacity of nearly 300.

TRIANGLE PLAYS

KEYSTONE COMEDIES
Are Released Only by TRIANGLE FILM CORPORATION

MEMORANDUM

May 31st, 1916.

TRIANGLE FILM CORPORATION,
1459 Broadway,
New York City.

Gentlemen:-

I've just had a last look at "The Love Comet", the latest Keystone which is being shipped today, and it's one of the best yet. I doubt if I can make Comedies any better, but now I am going to try to make more of them.

By the way, this is the 56th Keystone we have finished for TRIANGLE exhibitors and we're all at work completing ten more. At the present time there are fifteen companies in the field, and before the summer rolls around I hope to have twenty working.

Last November when we first began shipping Keystones everyone said we could not keep up the fast work -- that either the quality or quantity would have to go, and that we could never live up to the reputation we had attained for producing the best comedies in the business.

Now we are willing to stand on what we have accomplished. Fifty-six comedies in seven months is almost a record, and I personally have received enough letters from exhibitors and moving picture fans to assure me that Keystones are now and will continue to be the most popular comedies.

Sincerely yours,

Mack Sennett

Years ago Mack Sennett discovered the knack of producing a comedy that could be guaranteed to furnish reams of joy, roars of laughter, and has kept up the good work ever since until now Keystones are even better than ever if that is possible.

Time, effort or expense, are never spared in the making of Keystone Comedies. The orders are to make the best pictures regardless of cost. The wrecking of an expensive automobile, or the burning of a two story house, are trifles. A dip in an icy lake at the top of a snowy mountain or a leap from a moving train are details, while a journey of five or six hundred miles for a special location at which to take a few scenes is all in the day's work.

Keystone Comedies are acknowledged to be the best comedies today, and the exhibitor who can show these pictures to his patrons is sure to please his audience. Keystone Comedies are released only through the Triangle Film Corporation and as a part of TRIANGLE PICTURE PLAYS.

Permanent Headquarters Plan Grows

CHICAGO NATIONAL CONVENTION SPACE GOING FAST

SAM H. TRIGGER, owner of the Tremont Theater in New York City, has cleared the way for the making of Chicago the permanent headquarters of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America by absolutely refusing to run for the presidency of the organization, thereby eliminating probably the most popular and one of the most successful motion picture showmen in the East and one who is known across the country.

Several weeks ago it was suggested in MOTOGRAPHY that New York would bring forward a dark horse to run for the presidency in opposition to Frank J. Rembusch of Shelbyville, Indiana, the choice of the showmen of the West, Middle West and of many of the showmen of the East. No names were mentioned pointing to the identity of the dark horse, but the showmen of the East immediately took for granted that Sam Trigger was the man. Mr. Trigger was swamped with letters and telegrams. According to his own admission he received letters and telegrams from Rochester, Boston, Buffalo, Philadelphia, Cleveland and Pittsburgh asking him if he was the "dark horse" of MOTOGRAPHY's story. He was not. He said so himself.

"I am not a candidate for president of the League," said Mr. Trigger in explaining his position to MOTOGRAPHY's New York representative. "I am not in the race for anything but desire to remain as a worker in the ranks. Unless MOTOGRAPHY will take the trouble of denying that I am the 'dark horse' it had in mind at the time of publishing the previous story I will have to engage an extra stenographer to put my friends right."

While refusing to become a candidate for president, Mr. Trigger has materially strengthened the position of the men who are working to have a permanent headquarters for the League with an executive secretary in charge. He will work with the showmen of the West and Middle West and will control enough votes of the New York delegation at the coming convention to form a serious obstacle to any portion of the New York delegation not in sympathy with the permanent headquarters and "one show-one convention" idea.

It is conceded by the western contingent that there are enough showmen of Greater New York loyal to their municipality to desire to have the headquarters of the National League in that city. Their opposition is being met with the argument that the New York State branch of the League will have its headquarters in New York while the National headquarters should be in Chicago, which is accessible to all parts of the country.

That Chicago is to be the permanent headquarters of the League and that the question will be settled at the convention to be held at Chicago, July 10 to 18 inclusive, is practically conceded. The question now foremost is the manner in which the headquarters shall be financed. A conservative estimate places the cost of a permanent headquarters at about $18,000 a year. This estimate includes the salary of the executive secretary and his office force, his traveling expenses, rent, stationery, telephones, postage and incidentals.

This estimate of $18,000 is conceded to be rather small comparing it with the cost of headquarters of other national associations, many of which are of far less importance than the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and with far less influence. But the consensus of opinion appears to be that the start should be made on a modest scale rather than in any elaborate manner.

The man chosen to be executive secretary must be a man thoroughly acquainted with all branches of the motion picture industry. He either must be or must have been an exhibitor with organization ability and with the force to meet all of the big manufacturers on their home grounds. It is generally acknowledged that the man for the place should be a former showman who has kept his hands on the pulse of the business continually. A former showman who is known to have sold his theater interests is believed to be better capable of filling the position than an active showman who may carry the worries of his private buiness into the office.

In discussing the salary to be paid the executive secretary, the men in the forefront of the movement to place the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America on the same high standing of other large national organizations say that the salary attached to the office should be not less than $6,000 a year and that another $3,000 should be set aside for traveling expenses. They feel that they cannot get the proper man to fill the position.

It is believed that the permanent headquarters should be financed through a separate maintenance fund, assessments being levied on the membership in proportion to the seating capacity of their houses. In discussing this assessment proposition figures have varied. The generally accepted idea is that the assessment should be one cent a seat per year. On this basis the owner of a house with fifteen hundred seats would be assessed fifteen dollars a year in addition to the regular dues. And on this basis the league could maintain splendid headquarters.

In the furtherance of this idea the membership committee is in communication with the biggest showmen throughout the country asking for their co-operation. The committee has written such men as Poli of New England, Kunsky of Detroit, Loew of New York, Rothapfel of New York, Keith of the Keith Circuit, Broadway Amusement Company of Louisville, Davis of Pittsburgh, Divine of Chicago, Asher Brothers of Chicago, Jones, Linick & Schaefer of Chicago, Hamburger of Chicago, Levy of San Francisco, Jenson & Von Hanberg of Seattle, Turner & Dahnken of San Francisco, Fichtenberg of New Orleans, Moore of Washington, D. C., Crandall of Washington, D. C., and hundreds of other real showmen throughout the country who own a string of theaters and many of whom have failed to take an active part in league affairs in the past.

If the big showmen of the business will support the league not only with their money, but with their influence, in a short time it will be one of the strongest organizations in the country, and the members of the committee in charge of interesting these men are optimistic that the campaign will be a huge success.

Another matter that is coming in for considerable thought is the booking proposition, which will be given serious consideration during the coming sessions of the annual convention to be held in the Coliseum at Chicago July 10 to 18, inclusive. While it is a tremendous undertaking, it is thought that it is possible to install a booking department in conjunction with the permanent headquarters of the league and through the booking department so arrange the distribution of films as to eliminate competition between neighboring houses to a great extent. This plan has not been worked out to a finality, and it may not be possible to do so, but an effort will be made to settle this question with the assistance of the manufacturers and exchange men.

The committees in charge of the show exhibits are working like detectives in a metropolitan police force. They have been paired off, and each pair has been assigned lists of business concerns upon which they must call. These committees are made up of Chicago showmen, all of whom are devoting their entire time to making the show a tremendous success, and are forced to neglect their business to do so. But they are doing their work willingly and are getting results. Much of the show space has been sold, and it is anticipated that during the two weeks just preceding the show there will be a tremendous scramble for space and many accessory motion picture concerns will find difficulty in exhibiting their goods to the representatives of approximately twenty thousand showmen who will attend the convention.

Space at the show already has been contracted for by Pathe Exchange, Inc., General Film Company, Universal Film Manufacturing Company, Nicholas Power Company, Metro Pictures Corporation, World Film Corporation, International Film Service, Midwest Theater Supply Company, Selig Polyscope Company, Essanay, National Cash Register, E. E. Fulton, National Carbon Company, Vitagraph Company of America, Ivan Film Productions, American Standard Motion Picture Corporation, Emerald Motion Picture Company, Bartola Instrument Company, Eastman Kodak Company, Mirror Screen Company, Exhibitors' Supply Company, Sosman & Landis, Bell & Howell Company, American Seating Company, American Photo Player Company, Bluebird Photoplays (Inc.), Melies Manufacturing Company, Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company, J. P. Seeburg Piano Company, Motion Picture News, Moving Picture World, MOTOGRAPHY.

More than three-quarters of the space in the tremendous Coliseum has been engaged, which proves that the two hundred accessory manufacturers who have not made their reservations will have trouble unless they make arrangements immediately. The Chicago show, in connection with the convention, is the only opportunity the accessory men have to display their products to the exhibitors throughout the United States without depending upon jobbers or traveling representatives.

Numerous showmen have written to MOTOGRAPHY recently designating supplies for which they are in the market. These showmen have been advised to keep out of the market until after the July convention and show, where they will be able to see an actual demonstration of the machines they desire.

The hotel which will be the headquarters of the convention delegates has not been designated as yet, owing to an unfortunate mixup. According to the best information obtainable, one of the officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America several months ago without authority entered into an agreement with one Chicago hotel to make it the headquarters. The hotel committee, while not absolutely repudiating this agreement, has ascertained that it may make much better arrangements with another hotel but the management holding the alleged contract is attempting to hold the League to its terms. A committee of the hotel men have the matter under advisement and no doubt will reach an amicable settlement within a few days.

Every effort is being made by the Chicago showmen to make the visiting delegates remember their trip to Chicago and the visitors may be assured that there will be no dearth of hotel accommodations nor will they lack all forms of entertainments. A committee now is working with a view of placing a fleet of automobiles and drivers at the call of the visiting delegations, these machines to be at the call of the visitors at all times except during the sessions of the convention and during certain hours every day when the visitors will be expected to visit the Coliseum show.

Another treat in store for the visiting delegations probably will be an address by Commodore J. Stuart Blackton of the Vitagraph Company. An invitation is to be sent to Commodore Blackton requesting him to make every effort to visit Chicago during the convention and address the showmen, explaining to them the ideal condition between showman and manufacturer and giving them suggestions as to how that condition may be brought about.

One question of vital importance to both showmen and manufacturers to be discussed during the convention is to find some method by which films may be shipped through the mails. This question has been brought to a head by the strike of the drivers for the express companies which has caused havoc among some of the motion picture theater owners, especially those in the smaller towns who have had to depend upon the express companies for deliveries.

It is believed by persons in close touch with the situation that a container for films which will receive the indorsement of the postal authorities, may be manufactured by which films may be shipped as parcel post or as merchandise. This question will be thoroughly threshed out to a finality and no doubt a committee will be appointed to confer with the postal authorities with a view of standardizing some container.

appear to be worse than at any previous time. Fortunately most of the exchanges and film distributors have learned their lesson well and now are prepared to handle the situation. The "bookers" employed by the various companies are not making promises they cannot fulfil, so the showmen know just what to expect. If a film is promised to them, they get it; if it it cannot be delivered, they are so informed in order to allow them to get a substitute or book elsewhere.

One thing is absolutely assured regarding the local show—it will be the most magnificent, in the point of decorations, ever held in the history of the industry. Notwithstanding that the Board of Trade called upon that master of decoration, S. L. Rothapfel, and told him to go just as far as he liked in the matter of decorations. "Roxy" did splendidly but "Bill" Sweeney and his Chicago co-workers have done just a little bit better, financially at least.

They have arranged to retain intact all of the decorations placed in the Coliseum for the Republican National Convention which convened on June 7th. Thousands of dollars were spent by the Republicans to make the big convention hall attractive. The color scheme was that of the American flag, red, white and blue, and scattered all over the tremendous building were electric fans to keep the three best known American colors rippling at all times.

It cost in the neighborhood of six thousand dollars for the decorations of the Board of Trade show recently held in New York city and the decorations of the Chicago show will not cost a cent through the astuteness of the men handling the matter. It would have cost more than six thousand dollars to dress the Coliseum in a manner fitting for the convention and show of the motion picture men, but under existing circumstances all of this possible cost is saving and every cent goes toward the betterment of the motion picture men throughout the country.

More than 200 Chicago exhibitors contributed to the Actors' Fund 15 per cent of their proceeds, May 15.

The Leopard Lady

HOW PRINCESS OLGA CELESTE MAKES THE SELIG ANIMALS ACT

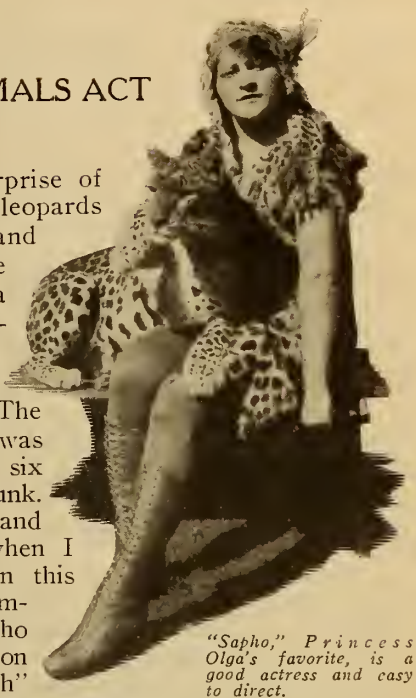
By Genevieve Harris

IF an angry leopard turned and snarled at you, could you love the beast because he was so "fresh"? If a temperamental tiger kept you waiting from nine o'clock in the morning until three in the afternoon before he graciously consented to pose for the camera, would you regard him as a rather naughty but dear child? The ability to do this, plus steady nerves and quiet, never-failing courage, gives a little brown-eyed woman, known professionally as Princess Olga Celeste, complete command over the "big cats" who are important members of the casts of so many Selig picture dramas.

When those delicious thrills which come when the defenceless heroine faces a roaring lion or a treacherous tiger are to be put into the films for the patrons of your theater, the leading lady may very well "register" terror (a terror more real, perhaps, than the audience knows), but there must be nearby someone who is not afraid, who can soothe and command the animals, someone whom they love and respect. And this "man behind" in the Selig animal dramas is frequently a woman, Princess Olga.

"Working with animals in a picture drama is harder than in any exhibition or circus for the reason that the animals must really act for the films, not just go through mechanical stunts rehearsed many times before," says the little trainer. "Yes, many of our animals are excellent actors. Talent varies with them as with human players. As a rule, I think wild animals have more ability than domestic animals. They get your idea more quickly and, if they wish, are more clever in working it out. A leopard is much easier to train than a dog. Leopards are usually good actors. They are my favorites because they are never afraid. They will attack any other animals, even larger than they, and they are not at all afraid to attack a trainer." Miss Olga's tone implied that her love for the animals was largely founded on this trait. I doubt whether it would increase my affection for the spotted creatures, except when they are behind strong bars, but since the princess had demonstrated her fondness for her pets by bringing five of them with her on her trip from the coast to Chicago, I could not doubt her sincerity.

"Then, too," she continued, "leopards are willing to use their own originality a bit. They frequently invent bits of 'business'. For instance, in the comedy, 'A Boarding House Ham,' the players rush madly from the room when the leopards appear, and one of the men drops a roll of bills. To the surprise of us all one of the leopards picked up the money and gave it to one of the players. That was a play in which everything went well with the animals, and there were few re-takes. The most dangerous part was when we packed six leopards into one trunk. They got to fighting and were quite peevish when I pulled them out." In this drama, you will remember, Miss Olga, who plays a role, curls up on a bed with her "peevish" pets, just out of the trunk, beside her.



"Sapho," Princess Olga's favorite, is a good actress and easy to direct.

"The animals gave us much trouble in the play 'Thou Shalt Not Covet.' We worked for days on some scenes. And I nearly lost my life on several occasions in the 'Kathlyn' series. There is always danger in an animal act. We know when we begin one that our animal partners may turn against us for any slight reason. But we really are not afraid, for one thought of fear would be instantly detected by the creatures, almost before we were conscious of it ourselves. So we must eliminate all fear and nervousness. Close study and love for the animals helps us in this, but the ability to command them is largely a gift. Instinctively they respect some people. I have worked with the Selig studios for seven years, in Florida first and later on the west coast. I love the animals, those who are good because they try to please, those who are bad because they have so much spirit. And I guess that is, after all, the real secret of my influence over them."

"Of course, the animals have to be properly disciplined. They are taught that the trainer is master. I use a heavy whip to make them obey. This whip is my only weapon when I am working with them. I never carry a revolver. In working in the studio in an animal act, our best protection is a well planned set of exits, so that we can easily escape. However, we must be very careful never to let the animals know we are running from them. That would be fatal. One of my favorites was nearly ruined as an actor one day because, as I led him across the studio yard, one of the girls saw him and ran away. He snarled and tried to follow her and when I jerked him back, he sprang at me. I fought him off and finally subdued him, but I could never be sure of him again." But most of Princess Olga's pets accept her authority without questioning it. Rather, they are glad to do as she orders them.

"There is always danger in an animal act."

EXHIBITORS ON WAR PATH

Lee Ochs Guest at Brooklyn Meeting Held at Triangle Theater on June 1—Delegates to Chicago Selected

At the regular semi-monthly meeting of the Brooklyn Exhibitors' League held at the Triangle Theater, Thursday evening, June 1, a strong spirit of co-operation was evidenced in the organization's appointing two committees to take up certain grievances with two large film companies. This committee is entrusted with full power to cancel every contract now in force between the exhibitors and these concerns should proper redress be refused them.

Lee Ochs, president of New York Local No. 1, was present at the meeting and was called upon to speak. In a brief address he pointed out the many advantages and great strength of Brooklyn exhibitors' compact body, and complimented them upon the effective manner in which they work together for common good.

Committee reports were heard on the newly proposed plan of having the organization buy theater supplies in bulk, thus saving in price and securing better material and service for the members. This applies to films as well as the things necessary to the physical maintenance of the theater. Acting as a committee, Louis L. Levine and William Brandt are arranging for the purchase of ten thousand tons of coal which will be distributed to the theaters according to order and at a much lower rate than the exhibitors could purchase the coal individually.

From this it is seen that the Brooklyn exhibitors are working together as one man to put their end of the business upon the highest plane of efficiency. Their theaters rank among the best in the country. Each meeting of the association is an open forum. The members bring up anything they think needs the attention of the committees, and make such suggestions as they believe will work out for the good of all.

A committee has already been named to take up with the board of license the matter of churches, Y. M. C. A.'s , and other institutions showing pictures without a license. They base their protest upon the grounds of unfair competition.

It is expected that later the organization will book all of the features for its hundred or more members. The Brooklyn league can book pictures solid for at least one hundred days. This means that exchanges or manufacturers who attempt to work hardships upon the exhibitors by asking for too much money in advance or in other ways will be met with the possibility of losing their Brooklyn patronage.

This system of booking would also mean pre-release showings for the exhibitors' committee, thus eliminating their present loud and plaintive howl—that every now and then the programs put over a bad picture on them. After the meeting the men enjoyed a splendid luncheon as the guests of the Triangle Theater which is owned by the Wm. H. Kemble Theaters Corporation.

The Brooklyn Exhibitors' League, which is Local No. 3 in the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, announces the following as the exhibitors who will represent them at the coming Chicago convention: President Manheimer, H. Clark Mooney of the Triangle Theater, Ben Title of the Avon Theater, L. L. Levine of the Regent Theater, William Brandt, ex-secretary, Associated Exhibitors of Brooklyn, and Mr. Bland, alternate.

TRIANGLES IN THE MAKING

Triangle Kiddies Share Honors With Stars—Douglas Fairbanks, Mae Marsh and De Wolf Hopper at Work on New Features

Although their names have not been listed in the cast nor are they given star parts, yet the kiddies who have appeared in a number of the recent Triangle productions have made their way into the hearts of the audience, by their personality as well as their acting, and are watched for in all Triangle productions.

The oldest of these diminutive players is only eight, and their names are George Stone, Violet Radcliffe, Carmen de Rue, Francis Carpenter and Ninon Fovieri.

"Somewhere in France," the last story written by the late Richard Harding Davis, is now being adapted for the screen in the Triangle-Ince studio.

Russell E. Smith, the writer of feature film stories, has recently been added to the staff of the Triangle-Ince scenario department and has started work on a feature for Douglas Fairbanks.

Douglas Fairbanks, who has always hankered after heavy-roles, and who made a success in his first feature of this class, "The Good Bad-Man," is rejoicing that he is to enact another role of this character in Brete Harte's "In the Carquinez Woods."

Mae Marsh, the Triangle star who will next be seen in "A Wild Girl of the Sierras," has submitted the outline of a book of poetry to an eastern publishing house. The poetry was all sent to Miss Marsh by admirers who have seen her on the screen.

One of the features of a Lambs Gambol held a few years ago was the delivery by De Wolf Hopper of the famous Marc Anthony speech from "Julius Caesar." A scene in the Triangle picture on which Hopper is now working calls for the same speech, and everyone around the studio stopped to listen while Mr. Hopper was giving it.

A man representing himself as Ford Sterling, the Triangle actor, buncoed merchants of Charlotte, N. C., out of various sums of money. A telegram to the Triangle Company from the police brought back the answer that Ford Sterling was working quietly in the studio at Los Angeles, and led to the arrest of the impostor.

The women who use the screen as a study in the latest modes must not miss seeing Louise Glaum in her latest Triangle release for she wears no less than nine gowns all in the extreme of fashion, and all designed by Miss Glaum herself.

Photography during the height of a snow storm in the Santa Clara mountains is a feat which was accomplished during the production of "The Primal Lure," Ince's Triangle-Kay Bee feature, in which William S. Hart is starred.

The American Express Company has just had itself filmed by the Authors' Film Company, Inc., of New York. About 6,000 feet of film were taken, showing everything from the officials of the company to the handling of express at the big city terminals.

Model Program for Children

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

Director, Rialto Theater, New York City.

ONE of the chief subjects for discussion at the biennial convention of women's clubs held in New York the latter part of May was the motion picture program for the children. In response to a request to give these women from all parts of the United States my opinion on this subject, I invited them to the Rialto theater and arranged a model program for children for their benefit, as I did not believe that a large proportion of them realized that such a program really could be made.

This "ideal" presentation included travel and scenic pictures, a dramatic feature, pictorial news events, topical subjects and cartoons, as well as a special musical program. For the feature I chose "The Bugle Call," in which the young star, William Collier, Jr., is appearing. This is not what would be counted as one of the so-called films for children, as it was produced with a view to being shown on the regular program for the older people, but it is my idea of the kind of play which will appeal most strongly to the child.

The chief difficulty with these programs for children is that not enough thought is given to what the small folk really want to see; the subjects are selected from the standpoint of what the older people think they would like, and I have found that most children do not care to see the so-called children's pictures. As a matter of fact, these films are really enjoyed more by the grown-ups than they are by the little ones.

I have studied this question thoroughly trying to look at it only through the eyes of the child, and I find that children want good, wholesome things with plenty of action, and have a strong leaning toward comedy. They want to be amused and they like to laugh, for laughter comes easily with them, and the comedy appeals to them more than anything else.

There is more attention being paid to this subject of special programs for children all the time, and many exhibitors are trying it out in their houses, but I do not think that the special performance is going to be a success until some company is organized which will arrange a program to be distributed and not to be released except in program form. As it is now the manager is rather discouraged when he tries to collect material for these entertainments because it is so difficult to get it together. He has to pick up one film here and one there and go from one manufacturer to another until he can assemble enough to fill his programs for a month. How much better if he could have this program sent to him as a whole ready for his entertainment. I think this problem lies entirely with the exhibitor himself, and if enough of the theater managers demand this complete program for the kiddies they will soon be supplied by some progressive manufacturer.

Many of the exhibitors are too narrow minded in their views on this subject and they do not realize all its possibilities. Any first-class manager who is a live wire and good showman will, if he sees the demand or wishes to create a demand, present from time to time such programs as he thinks may be accepted by the mothers of these children, and anything that is good and wholesome will pass. He must be careful, however, not to transgress and go over the line of good judgment.

Although these special performances may not be profitable for him in a materialistic way, they certainly will not be a loss, and a great deal of capital could be made in the advertising value. They will give his house a good standing in the neighborhood and he should also make an effort to arouse the mothers and club women in that locality to co-operate with him. The difficulty is that the women themselves do not know just what they want, but by getting together with the exhibitor each might help the other very greatly in this movement.

On the other hand, the club women who are endeavoring to further this campaign for the benefit of the rising generation must realize that catering to the public taste is extremely difficult. The only way this movement can be made successful is for them to go direct to the managers of the respective houses and talk the matter over with them and in this way get together in this campaign. And it is worthy of note that any manager who would fail to meet these women half way is losing a splendid chance for publicity and some good co-operative work in his community. The expense of a morning performance or a performance in the afternoon or even the evening would be trivial compared with the results obtained.

Theater for Children Proposed

By William Noble

A community theater for the purpose of showing films especially for children has been proposed by local club women of Topeka, Kansas.

A children's matinee is now being given each week by the club women at a local theater. Next winter the club women expect to either rent a hall and picture equipment and give special shows for children or launch a campaign for the community children's theater, promising liberal support if the latter enterprise is carried out.

"Puss in Boots" Filmed

"Puss in Boots" will be the first children's photoplay to be produced in Cleveland by the Babyland Film Company of that city. The filming of the production will be started June 22. More than 250 children are to take part. Vroman DuFais will be the prince. Geraldine Herman and Esther Amsler are to have important parts.

Headquarters of the recently formed Rialto Film Corporation, the new producing concern headed by Jesse Goldberg, will be in Detroit. Marshall Farnum has been engaged as chief director, with Hugh Jeffries as his assistant.

W. A. Commick has sold his picture theater at Montgomery, Minnesota.

Secretary A. J. Moeller of Michigan State Branch, M. P. E. L., Issues Last Call for Annual Convention, June 13 and 14

Exhibitors throughout the state of Michigan are planning to attend the annual convention which is to be held at the Winona Hotel in Bay City, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 13 and 14. In order that a large percentage of the exhibitors of both the upper and lower peninsulas of the state may be urged to attend, Secretary A. J. Moeller, of Howell, has issued the following final appeal:

Through the columns of Motography I wish to thank the many exhibitors who have written me of their intentions to be present.

I am making a last appeal, however, as we want to make this the banner convention thus far held, and I urgently request every exhibitor, large or small, who can arrange his affairs to be in attendance.

National President Herrington, the "little big man," will be on hand to help us, and what Fred Herrington can do and has done, the majority of you already know.

Bay City's Board of Commerce has extended the glad hand and will welcome us.

You may rest assured that this will be remembered by all who attend as one of the biggest stepping stones toward thorough organization in the state of Michigan.

Make up your mind now to be present. You are expected. Don't disapoint us.

With the backing of the prominent and live officers of the Michigan branch of the league there is no room for doubt in regard to the success of the coming Wolverine convention.

KENTUCKY EXHIBITORS CONVENE

One Session Held—Much Business Transacted—Officers Elected and General Discussion of Local and National Conditions

At the Seelbach Hotel, Louisville, Kentucky, was held the fifth annual convention of the Kentucky Branch No. 7 of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

The local attendance was very good, although there was a poor showing of exhibitors from other parts of the state. The meeting was of an executive nature, with no one present except members and only one session was held, which was given over to general discussions of local, state and national discussions.

The election of officers resulted in the re-election of president, Louis J. Dittmar, Louisville; vice-president, J. H. Stamper, Jr., Lexington; treasurer, H. B. Strube, Louisville; and secretary, Fred J. Dolle, Louisville.

Pennsylvania Exhibitors Meet

The Pennsylvania State Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will be held in Pittsburgh June 27 to 29. The exposition will be held at the New Moose temple on Penn avenue.

The officials of the league are working with the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce to make the affair a thorough success.

Two rooms will be used for exhibits and business meetings will be held in the main auditorium. A large number of speakers and several screen stars will be present.

MILWAUKEE JOINS LEAGUE

Motion Picture Exhibitor's Association Fights Billboard Law Which Infringes on Rights of Its Members

To Fred J. Herrington, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitor's League of America, belongs the honor of having presented the subject of becoming affiliated with the national association so forcibly to the local organization at Milwaukee that they have come into the fold. Mr. Herrington stopped over at that city recently on his way to Minneapolis, and stirred up the exhibitors to prompt action, as the result of which they joined the National League and elected five delegates and ten alternates to attend the convention in Chicago in July.

The exhibitors in Milwaukee have been wrestling with the billboard ordinance. Three different exhibitors were arrested for violating this law but even the police could not tell them just why as they did not seem to be able to explain the ruling themselves because of its indefiniteness. Consequently at the meeting of the local organization of theater managers a committee was appointed with instructions to confer with the proper legal officials concerning this same ordinance, and report to the association immediately.

The investigation divulged a fact which speaks well for the effectiveness of the organization. It was found that the first two exhibitors arrested for violating this ordinance were not members of the association and being alone and without funds to fight, were forced to pay their fine and hope they would not be arrested again. The third arrest was a member and immediately steps were taken to investigate, to protect the exhibitor from this ordinance and find out its exact meaning, and appeal will be made to amend the law so that its requirements will be applicable to the photoplay theaters without working any injustice to the exhibitor.

EXHIBITORS CALL ELECTION

Wichita, Kansas, Managers Join in Association to Combat Sunday Closing—Put Question Up to People to Decide

A new organization of picture theater owners has taken form in Wichita, Kansas, recently in which practically every exhibitor has a place. The association has been planned for the special purpose of combating the drastic Sunday regulations which are in force there and which prohibit every kind of amusement on the Sabbath. The film men are being backed by the most powerful business men of the city.

The plan of the organization, which holds that the local ordinance is unconstitutional, will be to call a special election asking the people of the city whether or not they want Sunday motion pictures. The only alternative is the tedious one of dragging the question through a series of court trials. The city is taking unusual interest in the campaign, and a hotly contested vote is expected.

Most of the Kansas towns have similar laws, so it is probable that the owners of theaters in other parts of Kansas will take the action of the Wichita people as an indication of what to expect in their respective towns. It is very doubtful if similar laws could be repealed in all the Kansas towns, but as Wichita is the second largest city in the state, there is an even chance for the moving picture men.

Applied Methods of Former Business

By James Gilosky

Treasurer and Manager, Twin City Amusement Company, St. Paul, Minn.

THE principal reason for my success is that I used the same methods as I did while in the jewelry business, in which I was engaged for 30 years. I was obliged to give that business up, due to poor health on account of being confined indoors so much. I then embarked in the picture business in 1909. From the beginning I gave it my personal attention, and used the same business methods as I did in my previous line, made it a point to be around most of the time, and saw that my employees were courteous to our patrons and that the theaters were well ventilated and very clean. I insist on good music, whether I used one or more musicians. Above all, good, clean pictures, well projected, are the main thing. I also made it a point from the start to pay all bills promptly and to treat everyone with courtesy.

When our local and national film organization was started about five years ago I took an interest in it to help the good cause along, and have been in the harness ever since. I feel there is something to be done all the time that requires attention, such as Sunday closing, higher state and city license, censorship, and other things too numerous to mention, and I have always felt it is my duty to do my share for the welfare of the picture business while I am connected with it.

Ask Mayor for Chaplin Holiday

By S. G. Parker

Special Texas Representative for MOTOGRAPHY.

The Old Mill theater, Dallas, Texas, recently played Charlie Chaplin's first Mutual release, "The Floorwalker," and the first episode of the Billie Burke serial, "Gloria's Romance." In itself, this is a bit of good showmanship, for the Chaplin film secured the crowds and created more interest in the serial than had it been run with some other film. An extra large attendance was registered for the first Billie Burke episode and it may mean a large thing in the success of other chapters.

Lawrence Stuart, the Old Mill manager, put over a nifty publicity stunt during the middle of the week prior to the showing of these films. He wrote the following letter to the mayor, suggesting that a holiday be declared in honor of "the most popular man in America," Charlie Chaplin. It got over in the newspapers like this:

Want Mayor to Name Holiday in Chaplin's Honor.

Saturday will be a holiday! The city will turn out to celebrate the coming of the country's most famous personage. That is, if Mayor Lindsley assents to a letter sent him by Lawrence Stuart, manager of the Old Mill theater. Stuart advises the holiday, and no doubt several thousand clerks are in favor of his advice. What do you think of it?

Mayor Henry D. Lindsley,

Dear Sir:—The most popular man in America, if not in the whole world, will return to Dallas Saturday after a long absence.

Since the beginning of the world, statesmen, warriors, philosophers and philanthropists have arisen, flourished, died and been forgotten, but none of these ever brought so much happiness into the world or made men and the children of men laugh, or brought joy to kiss and bless the cheek of woe as this man has done.

There is no greater benefactor of mankind than he who makes two smiles to grow where only a grouch appeared before.

Columbus discovered the country and Washington made it free—and a grateful and remembering people celebrate their birthday anniversaries as holidays to do them honor. Shall we do less for the man who has made our country happy? For this man we ask that a day of holiday, feasting and celebration be set aside to do him honor and to testify to his greatness and his glory.

As citizens of the Empire City of the Southwest—a city which great purposes doth conceive and greatly doth achieve them—which heads the forefront of modern thought and progress—which is to the other cities of our common country a shining example of civic righteousness and civic leadership—as citizens of such a city we respectfully request that you, our mayor, proclaim as a holiday to be appropriately observed by our people the 13th day of May when will be celebrated at the Old Mill theater the return of Charlie Chaplin.

Respectfully, Old Mill Theater,
Lawrence Stuart, Manager.

Scale of Prices Increases Profits

By R. B. Wilby

Walton Theater, Selma, Alabama.

After reading Mr. Rembusch's article in your issue of June 10, it occurs to me that there is one point about the exhibition of motion pictures which has seldom—I believe never—been discussed.

A motion picture exhibition is the only amusement enterprise of which I know for which one fixed price is charged. A baseball game can be seen for a dollar, or seventy-five, or fifty, or even twenty-five cents; a prize fight has a four or five-price scale; theaters and vaudeville houses sell different seats for the same performance at different prices; so, too, with circuses and with the large photoplay houses.

In the average city the man to whom the amount spent for amusement means almost nothing deposits his dime right along with the man to whom that represents the maximum expenditure, he couldn't pay more if he wanted to. But if those two men go to any other amusement place from grand opera to a bush league baseball game, the first buys the most expensive, the second the cheapest seat. You can't raise on the first in pictures, according to Mr. Rembusch, because the second will stay away, and you have gained nothing.

And so, according to him, there should be two houses, that both may be taken care of.

That, of course, is economically unreasonable. There should be two or more prices for the same house. A vaudeville theater splits its price at the fourth row of the balcony, not because the fifth row is so much less advantageous a place from which to see the program than is the fourth, but that the maximum amount to be spent by the individual may be secured. New York's Strand is a fifty-cent theater, but New York's Strand is also a fifteen cent theater to the man who prefers to pay that amount, or a twenty-five cent one to the man who wants that. So, too, "The Birth of a Nation" was a two dollar attraction, but it was also a fifty cent attraction. One engagement of five performances of which I know averaged less than one dollar per ticket sold. You will recall that the theater managers declared that the pictures hurt them in the beginning by closing their galleries, and from the cry made it is to be supposed that they were badly hurt. Consequently those two dollar theaters must have been depending also upon their fifty cent seats.

I know of a theater in a town of some six thousand in which the average receipts had remained constant for four years while the expenses increased. The house has three floors and now charges three prices, with a resulting increase in the gross of approximately twenty per cent, with about the same number of people attending.

In practically every advancement made the motion picture has come closer to the methods of the theater proper. And the theater has always in modern times been dependent upon the several different prices of admission for the gross business necessary for its operation. In this, then, picture exhibitors would be but following an already proven path.

Co-operate With the Church

By A. H. Yoemans

Manager, Rex Theater, Fessenden, N. D.

I started in the motion picture business in my home town, Gananoque, Ontario, with a population of 4,000 and one competitor, who was a dead one and he knew it. He was in the undertaking business also, so he kept them alive as well as dead. He often said after I started up that there was more money in them dead. He sold out within six weeks after I started and the next man that took the place turned it into a dance hall and made good with a rent of $35 per month. The man that rented the place was my hired man who was working under my direction, with my money backing him. I quit after two years with $7,000 for the very small investment of $150 down and the balance, $450, in six months, which I easily paid, and I sold the business for $1,500 cash two years later, besides clearing the $7,000.

I went to Winnipeg and bang came the war, and I went away to the H. M. S. Niobe. But my wife would not stand for it, and after about one month I was served with papers to proceed to Winnipeg and get my wife's consent to join the navy—I am neutral now.

My thoughts then turned to the U. S. A., and within ten weeks I was started in the "movies" again in this town of Fessenden. I find that I can get better and cheaper service in this country, and a better admission. I charge ten and twenty cents and sometimes as high as fifty cents. My seating capacity is 250. I use a Power 6B, motor driven, the house is well ventilated and supplied with good, neat opera chairs.

I work very closely with the churches and remember them occasionally. Recently they were in need of hymn books and I met the Ladies' Aid Society and told them I would help them, and if they would get up a concert I would furnish a few pictures. They only needed $25.00. I took my poorest night, and after giving them the $25 I was $50 to the good myself. I intend to co-operate with the church often, as it helps them and also helps me. Our local minister very often preaches on the pictures and brings scenes and subjects to the attention of the congregation.

Storm Sweeps Alaskan Theater Lobby

By A. R. M. Sutton

Northwestern Correspondent for Motography.

Manager John Spicket of the Orpheum Theater, Juneau, Alaska, recently had some trouble in putting up a lobby display for the "House of a Thousand Candles." When the show was changed there was a wild storm raging, sweeping in upon Juneau from the sea, and in order to protect his display, Manager Spicket had to board up the entire front of his theater and leave it so until the storm passed. You will notice two totem poles form part of the lobby display.

The Alaskan theater which was flooded by big storm.

Manager and Mrs. Spicket were in Seattle on May 6, when they said that they expected better business than ever this summer, because of improved conditions in Alaska. Big Four features will be used in the Orpheum.

Chicago's "Boul Mich" Theaters

Alfred Hamburger advertises his Fine Arts and Ziegfeld Theaters, Chicago, to the tune of $500 a week each, on the average. Approximately three-fourths of this, states Manager R. E. Harmeyer, goes into newspaper space. The remainder is pasted upon general bill boards and upon the poster boards of the Elevated and Illinois Central railroads. From time to time, when a special feature of interest to its readers is offered space is taken in the German papers also.

Mr. Hamburger and Mr. Harmeyer co-operate in securing the best features obtainable, without reference to company or cost. When it is found at any time that a film does not appeal to the public so much as was expected it is "hooked" and another is slipped into its place. The Fine Arts Theater has just finished a two weeks' run of Vitagraph's "God's Country and the Woman," and as it happened, the same company occupied the screen at the Ziegfeld with "The Suspect," which stars Anita Stewart.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

EVIDENTLY this question of the value of the reviews of the films published in the trade journals is of importance to the exhibitors for a number of them have been ready to express their opinion on this subject, and we hope more will do so. We are publishing two of these criticisms of the reviews which are interesting from the standpoint that they are so very different. The exhibitor will undoubtedly enjoy seeing what his fellow-manager thinks and does. We hope you will all come forward with your opinions, whether they be favorable or adverse, for we want to get at both sides of this question while we are discussing it, and this department is open to everyone.

There seems to be one point on which all the exhibitors agree—they all read the reviews—so, whether they admit it or not, they must get something out of them or why otherwise would they bother to read them at all?

Here is an opinion given by a manager young in years and young in the theater business, but who is alive and full of ideas and aspirations for his house, which he means to make the very best of its kind in the city where it is located. His theater is situated in the downtown district of a large city. It is a small house charging fifteen cents admission and doing a very profitable business.

Here is one man who is taking the reviews in just the spirit in which they are intended, and assuming just the attitude that the trade journals desire—that of using the material in them simply as a guide to assist him in forming his own opinion of the picture.

The reviews are such a help to me that I have worked out a regular system of using them so they will be of the most benefit to me, which I would like to pass along to some other theater manager whom it might help.

I subscribe for all the motion picture trade journals and always read every one of the reviews. I cannot say that the personal opinion of the reviewer has anything whatever to do with my reason for reading them, because I don't know any of the reviewers by name or by their work, but as a whole what they write is good and is very helpful. Personally I use these reviews as a sort of voice of the people—as a gauge to the way in which the theater audience would look upon the same picture. As a general criticism, would say that the reviews are very good and they give the exhibitor just what he wants—another's opinion of the play—and so call his attention to many good or bad points which might not otherwise occur to him. Although I cannot say that I really choose my program by the reviews, still they do influence my opinion to this extent. I always try to see all the films before showing them in my house. After I have seen the film I read the reviews of that picture in all the trade journals to see if they agree with my opinion, and if they do, then I am pretty sure that my audience will also agree with us—and in this I find I am usually correct. Sometimes I read the reviews before I see the picture and then I try to keep in mind what the reviewer has said as the picture progresses to determine whether I agree with him. Now and then it happens that I cannot see the film myself before booking it and then I depend upon the reviews entirely. I read them very carefully to see what each reviewer has said about this picture, compare all the criticisms and then form my opinion from their combined views. This I find to be a very satisfactory method and the results have been very good. I do not see why any exhibitor in a small town who does not have a chance to see the films before booking cannot do this and feel perfectly sure in planning his program in this way.

Sometimes the critics are rather severe on a picture, or perhaps most of them may like it, but one or two rather condemn it. In a case like this I try not to be biased against it, but take that adverse criticism simply as a warning to be very critical myself in viewing it on the screen and to be sure it comes up to the standard of the pictures I have been showing and think it over carefully from all standpoints before I decide to show it, taking my class of patrons into consideration.

Another manager of one of the big theaters in the loop in Chicago takes a very different opinion and calls attention to the influence the reviews have on the "fans."

I always read all the reviews in the trade journals, but simply to see if I can get any news from them, or any new ideas. Some of them are very clever and some are exceedingly poor. I would never think of letting them influence me in planning the program for my house, nor do I believe any of the exhibitors do. They probably all read them, but simply to see what someone else says about the pictures. I think that the reviews do more harm than good to the exhibitor, because the fans all read them and they get too much information. It is a very common sight to see old women, boys, men and young women sitting on the street car with a copy of the trade journals in their hands and I always know they are going to read the reviews before they get through and I wish they wouldn't. The trade journals are for the trade and not for the fan, and they give too much information to the motion-picture public. They know too much about the business; it makes them too particular and the exhibitor cannot please them. They think they know more than the exhibitor or the manufacturer about the moving picture business. They don't read the reviews just to see what plays they would like, but to see what is the matter with them. It does not help to educate them to liking the better kind of picture, but overeducates them until they think they know it all; and it makes them very critical of all productions and very hard to please.

31—I am having a good deal of trouble in my theater with patrons staying over to see the performance through more than once and keeping others out. The children especially do this and sometimes stay in all the afternoon. I have a small theater which does not seat very many people and it is the only one in the town, so it is always crowded and people are standing outside. Some of the people have been complaining lately because they have to wait so long before they could get into the theater, and the reason is that so many of them stay over. In the evening it is the same way; a lot of the girls and fellows come in and just sit there and talk the whole evening. I don't want to make any hard feeling by turning them out, but it certainly is spoiling my profits and working against the popularity of my house. Can you suggest any way I could manage to get them out without making them sore on me and on the theater?

Evidently your theater is the only place of amusement in your town and the people are making the most of it.

It certainly is exasperating to have your profits cut down in this way. You have a rather delicate matter to handle for you do not want to antagonize the patrons either against yourself or your house. The best way to handle this is not as a personal matter with the people who are staying too long, but by changing the general rules of your theater so that they will apply to all alike, and the young folks will not feel that it is directed against them in particular.

One good way of handling this matter is through the system of taking up tickets. Until the first show begins take up the tickets at the door; after it has started tear off a portion of each person's ticket and give them the rest, just as the checks are handed to the people entering a legitimate theater. Tell each person to keep the torn ticket as this will show just how many entered after the show started. Between performances have the ushers collect tickets from all those in the theater. Those who have no tickets will have seen the whole show and will be asked to pass out, or pay another admission fee.

When this system is first inaugurated it may make a little feeling but it probably will not last long. It might be well if at the same time you would make some other changes in your regular routine of managing the thater, no matter how trivial they are, so it will look as if you were establishing a number of new rules. If you use a program have these new rules all printed in it so that the patrons will become familiar with them. If you do not use a program it might be well to run a slide announcing the new system and asking the patrons to co-operate with you in carrying it out.

38—My program consists of two features and one short comedy, and I run the same show for a week. Sometimes one of the features comes under the "No children admitted" sign, but the other feature is perfectly good for the young people to see and the comedy always is. Can you think of any way I could keep the children out while the pink slip feature was being shown and let them in during the rest of the performance?

The children might object to paying to see a performance and then only be allowed to see part of it, but if you want to try this plan it would be a good idea to publish a notice to that effect in your program telling at just what time the feature and comedy which the children would be allowed to see would be shown. Then have the ticket taker watch the screen and keep them outside until the objectional film was finished. Just before the censored film is shown run a slide stating that no children are allowed to see the feature and asking that all children in the house please pass out. This might work all right, but I think the best way to do is to bar the children entirely for the week.

Dallas Film Men Frolic

By S. G. Parker

The Film Frolic and Vodvil presented to the Dallas people Sunday, June 4, afternoon and evening, under the auspices of the newly organized Dallas Screen Club was a success in every sense of the word.

Every exchange manager in Dallas worked like fury to boom the affair and it was put over with a bang. Billy Byrd of the Fox exchange was the "vodvil director," C. A. Clegg of the Mutual was "ticket man," Ned E. Depinet of the Consolidated office had the treasurership, C. A. Logan of the Southern World exchange directed the publicity and advertising campaign for the event, while E. T. Peter of the United was one of the "house committee." Then Lew Remy, Triangle champion in this section, was the official "programmer," and every exchange man in the town was something or other. In addition to the exchange managers, R. H. Campbell of the Local Labor temple assisted in securing music, Jimmy Kelly of the Consolidated and C. A. Walker of the Motion Picture Journal were responsible for the making of a novelty film.

Beginning Thursday afternoon the downtown district of the city was invaded by thirty-four pretty girls, stenographers and inspectors from the various exchanges, in a ticket selling contest. The stunt was repeated Friday and Saturday, and the house was sold out for both performances.

The show included four acts of vaudeville, a pianologue, a sister team of singing and dancing, a real "nigger" comedian, and a harmony-four that was strong on all brands of "song stuff." Then, mixed between the vaudeville, was six reels of new film, pre-release stuff, and the one-reel novelty.

The novelty film contained more stars than ever appeared in one film before. There were five or six prominent on Triangle program, four from Paramount's producing organizations, two from Fox, four from World, eight from V. L. S. E., one from Kleine—all the prominent film stars were in that single reel. With the co-operation of the exchanges the film was made by clipping that part of the first reel where "introduction of characters" takes place, and the many short strips combined in one reel. With Charlie Chaplin sandwiched between Billie Burke and William S. Hart, and Mabel Normand mixed up with Theda Bara and Clara Kimball Young the crowd nearly had hysterics.

The Dallas Screen club was recently organized to afford an organization for the exchange men and exhibitors where matters of importance to the trade could be thrashed out. The success of the show means that a great deal of important work may now be accomplished by that body.

Exhibitors Praise Billie Burke Film

No matter how inclement the weather, Billie Burke, in "Gloria's Romance," is proving such a box-office magnet the country over, that it draws capacity business. Below are a few reports from the different Kleine exchange managers.

B. T. Hardcastle, manager of the Kleine offices in Atlanta, Georgia, says: "The Piedmont opened Monday in a drizzling rain, but played to full houses all day long, most of the other theaters not having at any time more than a handful of people. The following day it cleared up in the afternoon, but a hard rain throughout the morning and noon hours, and an overcast sky, frightened people against coming out. However, at night, the Piedmont was jammed and everyone went away delighted with the production they had witnessed."

Foster Moore, of the Kleine branch office in New York City, writes under date of May 25: "G. F. Hall, proprietor of the Hall Circuit in New Jersey, states that the Billie Burke in 'Gloria's Romance' business at his Hoboken, U. S. Photoplay Theater was an absolute turn-away for the three days, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, though Tuesday night there was a heavy rain. At his Palace Theater in East Orange, where he charges 25 cents admission, his opening Monday night was to capacity and on Tuesday night, in a rainstorm the house record was broken."

Charles M. Thall, of the Minneapolis Kleine exchange, reports: "The New Princess Theater in St. Paul opened the third chapter of 'Gloria's Romance' last Monday to over 8,000 paid admissions, and the New Palace Theater in Minneapolis is showing to holdout business right along."

Bert H. von Klein, since last October the general manager of the David Horsley motion picture studios, has severed connection with that institution.

David Horsley has elevated John Jasper, formerly the purchasing agent at the plant, to the position made vacant by Mr. von Klein.

The Cost Problem in Film Manufacture

ONLY ten per cent of the manufacturers and merchants know the actual cost to manufacture and sell their products; forty per cent estimate what their costs are, and fifty per cent have no method, but price their goods arbitrarily. Most manufacturers and merchants who do not know what their goods cost are basing their selling price on what their competitors sell for, and with only this knowledge they are frequently cutting prices and demoralizing the industry in which they are engaged. That is the statement of Hon. Edward N. Hurley, vice-chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, after a year's serious study of this country's industrial problems.

The motion picture industry is not unconcerned in this analysis of reasons for success and failure.

We suspect that even more radical and astonishing figures would be needed to express its lack of adequate information on the cost of manufacture and distribution. The only commercial enterprise that can succeed permanently without an accurate reckoning of costs is a monopoly selling to willing buyers. As soon as the purchasers object to the price, or competition starts its warfare, the most careful account of costs becomes a necessity. It is economically better to do no business at all than to do business at an actual loss.

Meeting the demands of customers and the attacks of competition does not take the form of direct price-cutting in the motion picture business. But its freedom from this evil is only apparent.

Giving more value and better quality for the same money is exactly equivalent to price-cutting—and that has become the constant effort of the motion picture manufacturer. True, it is a very laudable and praiseworthy effort, and necessary to the progress of the art; but unless its cost is accurately adjusted it will make trouble.

The average cost per production today is much higher than it was five years ago. The veriest layman can see that on the screen, and the tendency is ever upward. No producer undertakes a really big effort without feeling the ambition to make it bigger and better, and hence more expensive, than any of its predecessors.

Many manufacturers are giving today ten times the value for the money that they gave a few years since. The only hope of continued profit, of course, lies in the sale of a greatly increased number of prints of each expensive subject; yet a little thought must show that this hope is almost an ignis fatuus—a chimera. Only a very few program films can attain extraordinary distribution. It is impossible for any film, no matter how great, to make all the first run houses—the ones that determine the sale of prints.

We must conclude that the film manufacturer either made enormous profits in the earlier days when costs were lower, or is losing money now. Probably both are true to some extent.

Producers who are now making beautiful and costly films are doing much to advance the art and benefit the world.

But what avails it, commercially, that a man gain the plaudits of the multitude if he lose his own substance?

It is necessary for the good of the art that progress continue; that we make better and better films so long as the possibility of improvement exists. That they are doing this regardless of expense we all know, and honor them for it; for the manufacturers know without reading this, that a good many of them are not making money.

Since the days of the old standard price of eleven cents a foot, less ten per cent, a good many methods have been tried of getting greater returns for greater films. The amount a producer receives from an exchange for a print may be theoretically larger now than it used to be; but so long as average rental rates have not materially increased, the net result in money can be no larger.

We have no fear for the future of this business. It is full of vitality and the world likes it.

What we are concerned about is the changes which must be made to establish economic equilibrium—which, at present, the industry has not. The people will not pay a greater aggregate sum; therefore, the theater cannot pay greater rentals; therefore the exchanges cannot contribute more to the manufacturers. And since the manufacturers will not and must not produce inferior films, they face the problem of producing films as good or better at a lower cost.

Since film making is a manufacturing problem pure and simple, the application of cost-reducing principles to it will work the same results as in the automobile business or any other manufacturing industry—except that the motion picture problem is more complex and, perhaps, less flexible. Many of the biggest cost items of picture production cannot be reduced by the application of even the cleverest of cost-reducing systems.

But any gain is worth while, and sometimes even a small reduction in costs would shift the balance to the right side of the ledger. For the industry is no longer a baby: it has grown past the point where, in the exuberance of success, it could afford to ignore inefficiency. It is getting to where the cents count as well as the dollars, as they do in any other healthy line of business.

Screen Engineering

THE mere illumination of rooms is considered a problem technical enough to create its own profession, and a considerable number of illuminating engineers find useful and profitable work. The science of optics is one of the oldest and most intricate branches of physics. Yet the exhibitor of motion pictures puts both of these sciences to the most exacting labor—for whose results he pays twice, once in his lighting bill and once in his patrons' satisfaction—without knowing anything about them.

Some little time ago the "Electrical World" commented editorially on the need for "Movie Engineering"; for the electrical trade is beginning to recognize the picture theater as a highly important customer. Electrical men know that the exhibitors' extravagant consumption of "juice" means nothing but inefficiency. The theater man has no knowledge of the fine points of electrical, optical and illuminating science, and he pays for his ignorance in huge weekly or monthly bills, and in loss of trade because of poor projection results.

All exhibitors know that there are many varieties of screens, from simple and inexpensive to elaborate and costly. Very few know just how a screen diffuses the light thrown upon it, or that a screen designed for a broad house will not do for a narrow house, and vice versa.

The screen, simple as it seems, is really the vital point of the house. There not only the film shows itself, but also the money spent for electric current. Every bit of light that goes through a semi-transparent screen, and is visible on the back, is just that much electricity wasted—paid for and thrown away—and just that much brightness of picture that the public ought to get and does not. Every bit of light that is diffused by the screen into space or onto the walls, where there are no eyes to receive it, is wasted; or, worse than wasted, it lights the house with a false reflection and dims the picture.

Excellence, efficiency and economy in projection demand more study than has been given them.

If the exhibitor of the picture will not take the trouble to study them himself, he will be forced to employ a consulting screen engineer to put the scientific side of his business in proper order.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

SIX pages of the Toledo Times were devoted on a recent Sunday to photoplays and huge broadside ads of the Hippodrome, Alhambra, Princess-Paramount, Temple and Colonial Theaters. The Princess-Paramount took three-fourths of a page, profusely illustrated. The entire section of the paper was very attractive and is an example of the co-operation exhibitors can get from local papers if they go after it. It is safe to say that Toledo has a picture-going population.

Vilies Schultz will soon open up a picture show in a big tent at Gordon, Nebraska.

C. D. Wells has been added to the road staff of the Kleine-Edison Film Service of Minneapolis. He will handle "Gloria's Romance," the Billie Burke serial.

Earl Cram has been elected president of the operators' union, Local No. 154, of Seattle, Washington, to fill the unexpired term of William W. Ladd, who has gone to Vancouver, B. C.

The quality of the lens has so much to do with the quality of the motion picture that the statement, "it's all in the lens," well known as an advertising shibboleth, has much significance.

The Dale Theater, St. Paul, Minnesota, celebrated with a special anniversary program. "Love Liars" was the feature presented and Manager J. B. Reisman gave away one thousand roses to the lady patrons.

"La Povera Piccola Peppina" is the way "Poor Little Peppina" looks in Italian, according to the attractive throw-away gotten up by the Holme Theater of New York. The piece was printed entirely in Italian.

A good composition for dressing a flexible screen is: Glycerine, 1 lb.; white glue, 1 lb.; French zinc oxide, 2 lbs.; hot water, 1 gal. This is applied hot to the stretched material. A sheet so prepared will roll readily without cracking.

The program of the Stratford Theater, Detroit, Michigan, of which E. V. McGrath is manager, is an eight-page folder printed in green on gray stock. The synopsis of each feature is published and numerous cuts add to the attractiveness of the sheet.

Free daily moving picture shows have been provided for its employes by the Sparton plant of the Sparks-Wéthington Company of Jackson, Michigan. The shows take place during the noon hour and the films are secured from the regular releases of various companies.

B. S. Moss, of the Moss Theatrical Enterprises, New York, has a complete little projection room in his summer home. Its object is both business and pleasure, as Mr. Moss there views films for his theaters at a saving of time and also he and Mrs. Moss often entertain their friends at their own little picture show.

The brilliancy of a picture greatly depends on the first-class quality of the lenses used. Therefore, the best is always bound to be cheapest in the long run.

When lubricating motors and dynamos, always use a copper oil feeder, because ordinary tin or iron ones are liable to be attracted by the field magnets, and many serious accidents have been caused in that way.

Manager W. H. Swanson of the American Theater, Salt Lake City, recently issued to all the nobles of El Kalah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., a card of invitation to attend, without charge, of course, a performance at his house. The card also admitted the families of the nobles to the best seats of the house.

And here is another exhibitor using ice cream as an advertising medium. Thomas Bruce, manager of the Electric Theater in Hoquim, Washington, has caused a local confectioner to invent and place on sale a "Paramount sundae." It has a definite formula and is different from any other cream concoction.

Not every exhibitor conceives and executes the idea of taking full pages in three dailies at the opening of his theater. That's what The Muse in Omaha did. The various exchanges, the firms that worked on the house and a buffet "on the way to the Muse" took up part of each page. Another good example of what progressive thinking and co-operation can do.

Alfred Hamburger, who has a string of 14 theaters in Chicago, had six camera men on the job of winding in the big Chicago Preparedness parade on June 3 and showed pictures of the event in his theaters before the 250,000 marchers had finished parading. He also furnished some score or more of other houses with the film.

Sidney Smith, manager of the Kedzie Annex, Chicago, Illinois, gets out a small four-leaf program which is very concise but at the same time contains all the necessary news regarding the features to be shown and the time of their showing. A notice reads to the effect that the program will be mailed to anyone leaving their name and address at the box office.

Manager Lee Goldberg of the Mary Anderson Theater of Louisville, Kentucky, is always on the job. He sent to Cincinnati and got a cameraman to make films of the Shakespearean pageant held in Louisville in May. The pictures had fine runs at the Mary Anderson, Keith's and Alamo Theaters and later ran in other Louisville houses. Local films always make a hit.

Frank L. Schaffer, manager of the Theater De Luxe, Los Angeles, California, is including a special insert in his weekly program announcing the installation of a Wurlitzer Hope-Jones Unit orchestra. The four-page insert says that the first fifteen minutes of each afternoon and evening performance will be devoted to music alone. Dr. Bruce Gordon Kingsley will preside at the instrument.

The Montclair Theater Bulletin is issued weekly in the interest of the Montclair Theater, Montclair, New Jersey. This is a sixteen page publication which besides the regular weekly program, with a brief comment on each picture to be shown, contains a clever column under the title of "Comment and Gossip." This bulletin contains a large number of local advertisements which must make a nice little side profit for the theater.

The Princess Theater of Calgary, Canada, covers its mailing list with a single sheet folder, advertising both its musical revue and its picture programs. The latest sheet carries an announcement that during the summer months all children will be admitted to matinees free, except on Saturdays, provided they are accompanied by an adult, who pays, of course, full admission. On Saturdays and after 6 o'clock other days children pay five cents.

The program of the Strand Theater, New York City, for the week of June 4 includes "The Evil Thereof," a Famous Players production; a war film which was photographed under the auspices of the German government and shows the cause of the German Allies; "His Birthday Gift," a Max Figman comedy; the Strand Topical Review; a Mutt and Jeff cartoon comedy, and the third issue of the Goldberg film cartoons. Also a special musical program will be given.

J. E. Musgrave, owner of the Olympic Theater at Sequin, Washington, has invented a screen which shows a bright, perfect picture at any angle. Mr. Musgrave has spent much time and money on the perfecting of this screen and has installed one in his theater which has been much admired by his patrons, who say it does not tire their eyes in the least and reflects a sharp clear picture at any angle. Besides the honor conferred on him as the inventor of this new screen Mr. Musgrave's theater is noted as being one of the best in the state.

From Toronto comes the news that by the new theaters and cinematographs act municipalities must grant operating licenses for moving picture theater buildings for which provincial licenses have been granted.

By the new regulation the erection of such buildings shall be under the direction of the municipality. The provincial license will be granted on the certificate of the municipality that the structure complies with municipal requirements. Then the municipality cannot refuse to grant an operating license.

The Eau Claire Profit Sharing Theater Company, operating the Palace Theater at Eau Claire, Wisconsin, will put into operation a plan by which the moving picture patrons will get a rebate on the money spent for tickets. The articles of incorporation provide that a certain per cent of the net profits shall be paid by uniform dividend upon the amount of profit sharing or patronage coupons turned in at their office between the first and tenth of January of the year following the issue thereof.

While the Preparedness Day marchers were parading along Michigan boulevard, Chicago, on June 3, motion pictures of the demonstration were being shown in motion picture houses in the city. This "beat" was put over by H. C. Holah of the Pathe forces. When the first division got under way the cameramen, Joseph Rucker and K. W. Fasold, started to crank, and at 5:40 Saturday evening Orchestra Hall and the Pastime theaters in the loop district, and the Kenwood, Twentieth Century and Kedzie Annex in the outlying districts, were showing the pictures.

Films and Footlights is the title of the miniature magazine published by the Mutual Theater Company of Marion, Indiana, operating the Royal-Grand Theater. Quite pretentious is this newsy little publication containing editorials, notes of the players and information regarding the different releases quite like a real motion picture magazine. It also carries a tabloid review of the showing for the week. The program is made up of Paramount on Tuesday and Thursday, Triangle on Mondays and Fridays, Fox on Wednesday and World on Saturdays.

Stanley Mastbaum, of the Stanley Theater, Philadelphia, has put into effect a profit-sharing plan for the benefit of the employees of his theater. Under the new regulations the wages of every employee in the Stanley service for one year have been raised on a precentage basis; a sinking fund will be established so that all employes will be paid during any term of illness; another fund established for medicines and doctors; a fund for vacation money; and a clause added which says that these percentages are in effect for one year and may possibly be raised. It is to be hoped that more progressive managers will become interested in a scheme of this kind.

Joe St. Peter, manager of the Rose Theater, Everett, is bringing an old stunt known to the circus man into play in connection with his ticket selling, which has materially increased the sales. When the crowd gets too big to be handled at the ticket window he has his brother Fred work outside on the sidewalk with a small box hung on a strap from his neck in true circus style. He goes through the crowd selling tickets and telling the buyers just when the performance begins. This has proved very satisfactory in getting rid of the crowd who buy tickets from the "breaker" and at the same time it makes way for those who would pass on if the crowd was there.

During an investigation made by the department of health and the bureau of licenses, it was found that only 77 out of more than 500 motion picture houses in Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx were properly ventilated. Three hundred and thirty-four houses were declared so improperly ventilated as to be a menace to the public health.

In order to comply with the law, each theater is required to have electrically run fans to expel from the building the vitiated air, and it was found that most of the houses inspected were so equipped, but that little or no use was being made of the device.

The proprietors who have not kept their houses properly ventilated will be required to appear before Commissioner Bell this week to show why they should not either ventilate or close.

The Photoplay Scenario

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT

Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

Note—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of Motography, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

Some Reasones Why Scenarios are Rejected

ARE your manuscripts being rejected? Are they returning to you with appalling regularity, accompanied by a printed rejection slip?

If so, have you stopped to analyze your scenario to find out why it was not acceptable? Do you know some of the reasons why scripts are often not even read further than the synopsis?

To help you in the analysis of your photoplay herewith is given a list of some of the factors which affect the sale of a scenario. Here are fifteen reasons why your play may have been rejected. Study these carefully and see if any of them apply to the manuscript which was just returned to you.

Weak plot.
Lack of originality.
Cast too large.
Too melodramatic.
Will not pass censors.
Lacks sufficient action.
Have not considered camera limitations.
Lacks neatness.
Not of class desired.
Too improbable.
Too expensive to produce.
Not realistic enough.
Too sure of its merit.
Technical construction poor.
Lacks interest.

Weak Plot

Of all the photoplays returned by the film companies marked "not available" or "not suited to our needs," it would probably be perfectly safe to estimate that nine-tenths of them are refused because the plot is weak or they contain no plot at all. Too many amateurs have no conception of what constitutes a plot—and especially what constitutes a strong plot. What the film companies desire is a play that will grip the audience—one that will hold their interest and attention from beginning to end; a story which is strong enough and appealing enough to make the audience remember it, not forget it entirely as soon as the next picture is shown. The film companies are catering to an exacting public and they must please them. A few years ago when the "movies" were a novelty almost any kind of story would interest the audience, but the public has been educated to better things; they are growing more critical and exacting every day. If you want to please the film companies you have to please the motion picture loving public, and they demand that their time be not wasted watching a mediocre film depicting a story with little or no plot—a story such as almost anyone could write.

Lack of Originality

Paralleling the strong plot in importance is the originality of the idea. The public is clamoring for something new, something different, something out of the ordinary. They do not care to go to a theater three nights a week and see the same plot over and over again, one film just like another. They crave variety. It is admitted that an entirely new plot is almost an impossibility, but you can use an old idea and make it over so that it will not be recognized, or if it is recognized will please with its freshness. Be constantly on the watch for new ideas, new incidents that can be used to embellish old plots. You will find these all around you, and in newspapers, magazines and books. Be careful, however, not to borrow plots from stories you admire. It is your ideas, your originality that is desired. And every original idea, every unusual and different plot will be hailed with joy by the film company editors.

Cast too Large

It is well to remember that every person appearing in a photoplay must be paid for their work, and consequently every added character means added expense of production. Also, if there are too many characters the audience becomes confused in watching them all and keeping track of just what part they are playing. A small cast is a good selling point in a scenario.

Too Melodramatic

When the photoplay first started there was a tendency to very melodramatic plots. The idea was to thrill the audience and the only way seemed to be to introduce sensational scenes. There are other ways to hold the audience in suspense, and the film which is full of sensational action and melodramatic scenes is not the most popular at the present time. Also it has a tendency to encroach on the forbidden ground of depicting crime.

Will Not Pass Censors

The film companies do not care to have their productions spoiled by the many clumsy cut-outs which the Board of Censors insists upon in any objectionable film, and so the safest way is not to write plays which are liable to be objectionable. The censors will not allow depiction of crime unless actual committal is covered, or the story teaches a moral lesson; neither will they allow any suggestive scenes. Try to make your play clean. Try to appeal to the higher ideals of the public and then you will not be troubled with manuscripts being rejected because they will not pass the censors.

Lacks Sufficient Action

In writing a photoplay make every scene count. Do not have action enough to fill about fifteen scenes and then pad to make thirty-five. Your action must be swift and consistent to keep up the interest of the audience. The editors will be disgusted if they find a scenario with many feet of film consumed in showing people shaking hands, coming into and going out of rooms, and a multitude of minor details of action which are totally unnecessary. Make every scene count. Be sure there is sufficient action to make the story interesting, and that it is all necessary action.

Have Not Considered Camera Limitations

Many writers do not stop to consider that a camera has limitations. There are just so many feet of action that can be taken at one time without moving the camera. Do not expect to show a whole block of houses in one scene and all the action taking place in the different houses at the same time. Also remember that the camera cannot show your characters in two or three places in the same scene. Consider these limitations and then arrange your scenes accordingly.

Lacks Neatness

It is always wise to make the first impression a good one. That is one step in your favor. Therefore, have your manuscript arranged as neatly as possible. Make it show to the cursory glance that you have spent time and thought on its makeup. Do not dash a scenario off hurriedly and send it to a film company just to try your luck, because you may be assured that you will be "out of luck" and the script will be returned to you just as hurriedly. Also never send a manuscript out unless it is typewritten, because it will be returned to you unread. Use a uniform size of paper and do not write on both sides. In short, make the manuscript as attractive as you possibly can.

Not of Class Desired

Many manuscripts are returned not because they lack merit, but because you have submitted a comedy to a company which is in the market only for a two-reel, heart-interest drama; or you have sent your script to a company which has stated definitely that they are not in the market at the present time. Study the market and be sure the company desires plays such as yours before you waste postage sending them out.

Too Improbable

Make your stories true to life. Do not introduce improbable situations and improbable characters. The audience will not be pleased with the fantasies, but will rather sneer that anyone should think they would be amused with these flights of the imagination.

Too Expensive to Produce

One of the principal points which determines whether a scenario will be purchased is the cost of its production. Do not spoil your sale by calling for elaborate scenes, costly costumes, the destruction of property, or special acts which only a trained specialist can perform. Have as few characters and settings as possible and the more exterior settings the better.

Not Realistic Enough

Make your characters human, make the scenes and the action true to life. It is the regular everyday people and everyday events which are wanted, and these should be true to life and carried out logically and consistently.

Too Sure of Its Merit

Put the very best work of which you are capable into your writing, but do not be too sure that you have a scenario without a flaw. No plot is so good that it cannot be improved by the editor or director, but try to make it so clear and so good that he will not be required to revamp it to any great extent. One trouble with the amateur is that he reads his scripts to his admiring friends and they pronounce them "splendid," and so the writer comes to believe they are. Take into consideration the fact that these critics are your friends, that they do not want to discourage you or hurt your feelings. The proof of the merit is the reception at the studio.

Technical Construction Poor

Perfect technical construction does not mean a perfect scenario because the plot is much more important than the technique. But a knowledge of the correct form makes it very much easier for you to make your meaning clear and helps greatly in the sale of the scenario. A good plot accompanied by correct technical construction will bring the topmost price.

Lacks Interest

The audience wants to be entertained from the start to the finish of the picture and you must be sure that your story contains enough of interest to hold their attention. Also that interest must be steadily increased until the climax is reached. Do not start off with a fine beginning and then grow weaker. Make the interest uniform and well sustained to the end. Also, be careful to choose a subject which will appeal to your audience, and remember that you are catering to all kinds, ages and classes of people.

Herein lie some of the principal reasons why the film companies send you a rejection slip instead of a check. There are others, but if you are sure that your scenario is "fit" from all these standpoints your chances are greater of cashing that check.

Photoplay Market

The following information received direct from the scenario editors of the film companies will show the kind of material each company desires:

California Motion Picture Corporation, San Rafael, Calif.—We are really not in the market for any photoplays as we are only producing adaptations of books and stage plays by prominent authors, and we have already contracted for the film rights of enough material in this line to keep our producing directors busy for many months to come.

Thomas A. Edison, Inc., 2826 Decatur avenue, Bedford Park, N. Y.—The motion picture division wishes exceptional material for five-reel features and two-reel comedies. For five-reel subjects big, human dramatic stories that are plausible and free from morbidity, desired; for comedies, stories preferably of the comedy drama type, with wholesome situations rather than incidents to furnish laughs.

Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, 1333 Argyle street, Chicago, Ill.—We are not in the market for scenarios of any description. All manuscripts submitted to us are returned immediately upon receipt. We are, however, desirous of obtaining published material such as short stories and novels.

Famous Players Film Company, 124 West Fifty-sixth street, New York.—In the market for five-reel features suitable for their stars, Mary Pickford, Marguerite Clark, Pauline Frederick, Hazel Dawn, etc. A good working synopsis of the themes is sufficient. We give decisions promptly and pay the market prices immediately upon acceptance. Just now we are only in need of ideas which call for modern characters in American locations.

Fox Film Corporation, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York, N. Y.—We are always in the market for good, strong, five-reel, modern dramas, comedy dramas or good western stories, same to be submitted in a five or six-page synopsis form.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company, 1600 Broadway, New York, N. Y.—Helen Starr, scenario editor of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, announces that she is in need of good scripts. She does not care to receive contributions from amateur photoplaywrights. The Universal Company would like to receive manuscripts from the most experienced and efficient writers for the screen. At the present time the editor is in need of one and two-reel comedies, one, two and five-reel dramas. The scenario department at 1600 Broadway, New York, buys for both the Eastern and Western studios.

V. L. S. E. Wins Censor Fight

LUBIN V. L. S. E. FEATURE "DOLLARS AND THE WOMAN" VINDICATED BY COURT

FOLLOWING closely upon the order of the highest courts of Pennsylvania prohibiting the lower courts from overruling the decisions of the State Board of Censors, unless such decisions were clearly an abuse of discretion—in other words, unless these decisions were such with which no reasonable man could concur—the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas No. 4, last week handed down a ruling reversing the action of the Pennsylvania State Board of Censors in demanding a series of eliminations in the Lubin-V. L. S. E. feature, "Dollars and the Woman."

The opinion is regarded, in film circles generally, as a most important victory not only for the Lubin and V. L. S. E. companies, but for moving picture interests as a whole.

By the ruling of the Supreme court, the film interests were seemingly completely deprived of obtaining any justice from the lower courts, if there was any room for belief that any reasonable man might agree with the findings of the censors. Pictures were slashed right and left, and there began in the state a perfect orgy of censorship, from which, by reason of the conditions imposed by the higher courts, there seemed no relief for the moving picture manufacturer.

However, the Lubin and the V. L. S. E. companies determined to fight these ruthless actions of the Board of Censors to the last ditch, and so when that body demanded a series of eliminations from the six-act photoplay called "Dollars and the Woman," which had been praised extensively by the press as a production of unusual wholesomeness and merit, they sought to get the court's opinion as to whether such action was not an abuse of discretion.

In the decision which is a sweeping condemnation of the censors, and a most complete vindication of this production, the court holds that the board "abused its discretion and acted arbitrarily and oppressively."

The opinion of the court in part, which is important as a precedent in other appeals of like nature, follows:

The Lubin Manufacturing Company has prepared for the purpose of sale and public exhibition, by means of the cinematograph, a series of pictures presenting the scenes of a drama known as "Dollars and the Woman." In obedience to the act of May 15, 1915. P. L. 534, these pictures were submitted for censorship to the Pennsylvania State Board of Censors. Upon examination by it, they were condemned. A re-examination by two members of the board, resulted in their being approved conditionally. The condition on which this approval is predicated is that certain scenes and certain so-called subtitles explanatory of the progress of the plot of the play shall be cut out and that certain other subtitles suggested by the censors shall be introduced on the films that contain the pictures. Unless that condition is complied with, the whole series is condemned as tending, in the judgment of the board, to debase or corrupt morals. The matter comes before the court upon the appeal of the manufacturer from this action of the censors.

In order to comprehend the matter before them, the members of the court, with the consent of both parties to the controversy, personally viewed, at the factory of the appellant, an exhibition of the pictures upon which the censors had passed. This course finds its warrant in the opinion of the Supreme Court, per Von Moschzisker, J., in the case above mentioned.

The argument of the play is as follows:

DESCRIPTION

Madge Hilyer borrows $250 from Crewe, a former lover, in order that her husband may proceed west to sell a smelting device. His plans fail and he becomes porter in a hotel. A child is born to Madge, and the hospital expenses are secretly paid by Crewe. When Hilyer returns home successful and discovers this, he decides to leave her. But they become reconciled through baby love and explanation of Crewe's true relations.

"This summary outlines the story of the play in the most general manner and fails to give an adequate or just idea of the plot or the method of its treatment. It is referred to, however, as in some degree expanatory of the criticisms of the Board. In the opinion of the Court, an inspection of these pictures cannot fail to convince any unbiased mind of the purity of the underlying motive of the story that they illustrate and satisfy it that the tender pathos of the plot absolutely precludes the impressions and suggestions imputed by the censors to the features that they have condemned.

"The requirements imposed by the censors as a condition precedent to their approval of the appellant's pictures are expressed by them as follows:

No. 1. A—Eliminate subtitle 'Soon it must be enough for three.'
No. 2. A—Eliminate scene showing thief cutting handbag from woman's arm. This means that view of shears, etc., is to be entirely removed.
No. 3. B—Eliminate subtitle 'Myself.'
No. 4. C—Eliminate subtitle 'Could you not leave me even my memories.'
No. 5. D—Eliminate subtitle 'Only a beast could think I meant such a thing,' etc.
No. 6. E—Eliminate subtitle 'I'll never forgive your insult.'
No. 7. F—Eliminate subtitle 'Shame.'
No. 8. G—Eliminate subtitle 'Telephone the Mother's Hospital for an ambulance.'
No. 9. H—Insert subtitle to indicate reason for woman's fall to floor is other than approaching maternity.
No. 10. A—Eliminate all views of woman with baby and of baby in hospital, also as they come from hospital, in street car and in home.
No. 11. B—Eliminate telegram 'You have a twelve pound boy,' etc.
No. 12. —Insert subtitle when baby appears in this reel in mother's arms to indicate its birth.
No. 13. A—Eliminate subtitle 'Men of Crewe's type don't spend money on a woman unless ——'
No. 14. B—Eliminate subtitle 'Unless she pays.'

The appellant is willing to comply with the wishes of the Board as embodied in the second requirement above set forth. So far as the appeal relates thereto, it is withdrawn.

The reasons advanced by the censors in support of the remaining criticisms of the picture are as follows:

(a) that some of the pictures 'exhibit the process of human reproduction;'
(b) that others 'exhibit the processes of a lying in hospital.'
(c) that 'the wife is shown for the distance of 1000 feet in a state of pregnancy.'
(d) that the wife is shown in travail.
(e) that certain subtitles indicate that the woman is in a pregnant condition.
(f) that certain subtitles indicate that an improper proposal has been made to her.
(g) that the pictures 'break down every barrier that exists between boys and girls.'
(h) that they 'show the private relationships of a family.'
(i) that the accusation that the wife's hospital bills were paid by an outsider suggests an immoral idea.

With respect to reasons (a), (b), (c), (d), (g), and (h) it suffices to say that none of these objections in the sense in which they are pressed have any foundation whatever in fact. The other objections relate to scenes or titles which when taken with their context appear to the court to have no immoral bearing or corrupting effect.

Although this was specifically denied from the witness stand by one of the censors, a careful study of the testimony aided by a personal view of the pictures under discussion has convinced the court that in condemning the features whose elimination from them has been directed the Board acted on the theory that all references to such matters as motherhood, birth or the sex relations between man and woman are necessarily productive of lewd and evil thoughts, and that any reference to 'things not usually spoken of with great freedom' is debasing and will probably conduce to immorality. Such a proposition is, of course, altogether too broad. Its adoption as the basis of a hard and fast rule of condemnation is manifastly unreasonable and absurd.

The court finds that in deciding the questions indicated by its elimination requirements (excepting the second) the board abused its discretion and acted arbitrarily and oppressively. For this reason, the appeal (so far as it has not been withdrawn) is sustained; and the order of the board of censors, so far as it involves the condemnation or disapproval of the moving picture films above-mentioned for default of compliance with any of its requirements except the second is reversed.

Changes in Ranks

Last week marked many important changes in V. L. S. E. ranks. The most important change was the promotion of F. F. Hartich, assistant manager of the New York exchange to the managership of the Syracuse branch exchange.

In the Cleveland exchange, A. M. Holah, salesman, has been promoted to the position of assistant manager.

Frank D. Stanton, manager of the Franklin Park Theater, Boston, has left that position to become associated with the Boston branch as salesman.

This Boston appointment will enable George Balsdon, manager, to visit his territory frequently, which he finds essential. Assistant Manager Reardon will take care of office details during these trips.

Important Film Gathering

A notable gathering of film men were present at the "Luncheon and Conference of the Motion Picture Industry," which was held at Delmonico's, New York, Thursday, June 8. The object of the meeting was to bring about united opposition to the enactment of further censorship legislation; the revocation of such existing legislation; and the determination of definite policies on other matters affecting the industry as a whole.

The following prominent picture men formed the committee promoting the meeting:

Walter W. Irwin, chairman; Edward Earl, secretary; J. A. Berst, J. W. Binder, J. Stuart Blackton, L. F. Blumenthal, F. G. Bradford, William A. Brady, William Brandt, J. E. Brulatour, W. Stephen Bush, John F. Chalmers, Harry Cochrane, R. H. Cochrane, Paul H. Cromelin, H. O. Davis, George Eastman, William Fox, John R. Freuler, A. J. Gillingham, David W. Griffith, I. N. Hartsall, Fred J. Herrington, S. S. Hutchinson, L. B. Jennings, William A. Johnston, Ad. Kessel, Jr., Carl Laemmle, Jesse Lasky, Ira M. Lowry, Ben Lyons, E. A. MacManus, Lee A. Ochs, M. Oestreicher, L. J. O'Reilly, Carl H. Pierce, Nicholas Power, P. A. Powers, F. J. Rembusch, B. A. Rolfe, W. R. Rothacker, S. L. Rothapfel, William M. Seabury, Lewis J. Selznick, Albert E. Smith, Edwin C. Thanhouser, B. Tietel, Carl Wilson, John J. Wittman, Adolph Zukor.

War Tax Closes English Houses

To the great annoyance of managers the special war tax on amusements is now in force in England. The tax, which amounts to 10 per cent. of the gross, is collected by the sale of stamps, and every theater ticket issued must have government stamps on it amounting to the sum of the tax. Never before in the history of theatricals has such a nuisance occurred. The delay at box offices, the extra charge and the trouble of pasting the stamps on the tickets is causing all kinds of inconvenience and affecting business at all theaters very seriously.

The government also is selling tickets of its own to the theater managers in various denominations, just like currency, which do not have to be stamped, being already printed with the government seal, and the authorities are making an extra profit on these tickets, which are supposed to be more convenient than the ordinary stamped tickets.

Picture houses all over the country are closing as a result of the tax. A well-posted manager has declared that at least a thousand picture houses closed within a fortnight. The tax also hits the cheaper music halls heavily, and will result in closing some of them.

Club Scores Exhibitors

The Associated Film Exchange Managers of New Orleans has recently been organized. R. King Evans, manager of the V. L. S. E. exchange, was elected president; Karl A. Bugbee of the Metro, treasurer, and H. F. Wilkes of the Paramount, secretary. Exchanges represented at the organization meeting included General, Mutual, V. L. S. E., Paramount, Kleine, Pathe, Universal and Metro.

Declaring that unfair, illegitimate and fraudulent practices and abuses have been and are being indulged in by certain moving picture exhibitors, to the detriment of the film exchanges, the charter of the Associated Film Managers of New Orleans denounces in no uncertain terms the actions of these exhibitors, and lays down a course of conduct that an exhibitor must follow should he do business with the New Orleans exchanges.

Mary Pickford With Lasky

More or less reliable reports from New York have it that Mary Pickford has signed with Lasky at a salary of $10,000 a week. At that rate she would acquire more than half a million dollars a year—and would be worth it. As yet this news is unconfirmed.

Wm. S. Hart will be seen shortly in the Triangle program in a story that is distinct from anything in which he heretofore has appeared when he is presented by Thomas H. Ince in "The Apostle of Vengeance," a tale of Kentucky mountain feudists.

No more visitors are to be allowed at Universal City on account of the interference with work in the studios. This picturesque village has been the Mecca of thousands of sightseers for the past two or three years.

In order to provide the proper atmosphere for "The Bugle Call," the Triangle-Kay Bee feature, Thomas H. Ince constructed at Inceville an army post consisting of twenty buildings.

Talented Director Brought to Light

MIDDLETON OF CALIFORNIA MOTION PICTURE CORPORATION TO DIRECT "KISMET"

ONE of the most unusual and surprising announcements ever made in motion picture circles has just come from the offices of the California Motion Picture Corporation in San Rafael and by virtue of it a new genius has been uncovered in the first rank of motion picture directors.

According to statements which General Manager Alexander Beyfuss of the California concern has just given to the press, the actual directing brains behind the firm's producing activities belongs to George E. Middleton, producing manager, of whom the picture world has heretofore never heard a word.

Middleton has been quietly working in the back ground ever since the corporation's inception, turning out great pictures. He has never associated his name with his work, however, and it is only those most intimately associated with the California corporation that have so much as suspected his existence as a film director.

George E. Middleton.

Among the greatest of the productions which the recent announcement credits Middleton are "Salomy Jane," which has played in this country two years, "Salvation Nell," and "The Unwritten Law," with Beatriz Michelena. Middleton has just completed the film adaptation from C. N. and A. M. Williamson's 'The Woman Who Dared," in which Miss Michelena is playing the stellar role. This picture, according to the officials of the California corporation, will not only be Miss Michelena's greatest, but also the master work of Middleton's art.

Because of the success of these past productions and the confidence they have inspired in his producing genius, to Middleton is to fall the greatest honor yet conferred on any motion picture director. It is under his immediate direction that Otis Skinner, the foremost romantic actor of America, will appear in the stupendous film dramatization of "Kismet." The Oriental atmosphere that must be created for this world famous Arabian Nights tale, with its wealth of sets and costuming will be enough to tax the ingenuity of any director, while the successful translation of the story into film will require the greatest dramatic perspicuity.

In commenting upon his announcement and the reasons for so long withholding it from the public Beyfuss said, "Although Mr. Middleton's work has been of the most artistic and powerful calibre from the first and we have never had the smallest doubt about his continued success, all mention of his directing responsibility has been withheld at his own request.

"It has been the policy of our corporation always to let results speak for themselves and to make no claims without substantiating evidence. Mr. Middleton believed that this should apply to himself as well as the affairs with which he was so intimately connected. Although he had been a close student of all things dramatic and had penetratingly studied picture requisites, he wished that he might work in the background until he had proved his capability.

"His modesty in this respect runs rather to the extreme since it is now only upon the strongest importunity that I have won his consent to this announcement. To his genius the California Motion Picture Corporation owes much of its success in reaching its 'BETTER THAN PROGRAM' standard.

"In the first place he is strictly conscientious. He displays infinite patience, and gets the proper results from the actors who work under his direction.

"He is not wasteful, in either time or material, and is a wonderfully hard worker himself; and, consequently, sets splendid example to all those working under him. He watches every point, and knows every end of the picture business in and about the studio.

"Taking it all in all I honestly think that Mr. Middleton ranks with the few first-class directors of film productions, who may be easily counted on the fingers of one hand."

New Locke Play Coming

"Jaffery," William J. Locke's most popular novel, is to be screened by the Frohman Amusement Corporation. As the author of "The Beloved Vagabond," Locke is well known. Yet this new book, "Jaffery," has already outsold "The Beloved Vagabond."

The story lends itself to very beautiful dramatic treatment and forms in essence a pictured play that might, with only the loss of scenic variation, be quite as effective on the stage.

For the name role, the author's own friend whom he had in mind in writing the book, has been engaged. This is C. Aubrey Smith, the English actor, who played with Marie Doro in the play from another Locke book, "The Morals of Marcus." Mr. Smith has done some strong picture work before, notably in "The Builder of Bridges."

Shakespeare at the Rialto

That Shakespeare was not for an age but for all time was proved once again by the picturization of "Macbeth." The play was so nearly in the required form that the text was followed with scrupulous fidelity, even to the minor details of the subtitles, and only in four or five instances in the entire production did the producers find it necessary to depart from the text to describe the development of the story.

At the Rialto Theater "Macbeth," as enacted by Sir Herbert Tree and Constance Collier, was given its premier. Managing Director S. L. Rothapfel provided an allegorical opening that contributed to the atmosphere and the Rialto orchestra, under the direction of Hugo Riesenfeld, contributed a musical setting. All minor features of the program usually seen and heard at the Rialto, such as topical, scenic and comedy pictures and vocal solos were eliminated to lend continuity to the classic theme.

The premier was watched with anxiety by both the producers and the manager of the theater. So great was the success, however, that the Reliance Film Company will now proceed to film other Shakespearean works.

Manager Rothapfel made no secret of the fact that he regarded the temporary abandonment of the fixed policy of the Rialto to present "Macbeth" as a dangerous experiment fraught with grave financial possibilities, as Sir Herbert Tree's production marks the first serious effort to present Shakespeare on the screen in an elaborate manner. The engagement of "Macbeth" is limited to the current week, regardless of the success it has scored.

PATHE FORECASTS

A Number of Features in the Making Which Will Be Ready for Release on This Program in the Near Future

"A Matrimonial Martyr," the five-part Gold Rooster play made by the Balboa Company, is featuring Ruth Roland and Andrew Arbuckle. This film has been Pathe-colored and will be released on the Pathe program in the week beginning June 19.

In this play Miss Roland appears in a double role, the one a sweet docile girl, the other a waspish termagant. Miss Roland, who is a native daughter of California, has been before the public since she was four years old, having appeared in stock company and in vaudeville before going into pictures, made a great success in "The Red Circle" serial and in "Comrade John," in which she co-starred with William Elliott.

Mr. Arbuckle, a brother of Macklyn, has come into his own as a motion picture star after several years of fighting his way to the front. He also is fat, like the other illustrious member of the family. In "A Matrimonial Martyr" he takes the part of Hugo Stanley, a roly poly, good natured chap, who gets into a series of highly dramatic and ludicrous situations.

The Rolin Film Company, maker of Pathe's Lonesome Luke comedies, has put special effort and a large sum of money on a burlesque of "Julius Caesar," which it is making. Although this is only a one-reel production it has utilized among its hundreds of extras the several hundred pretty dancing girls who took part in the Actors' Fund presentation of the great Shakesperian tragedy which was enacted on May 19 in Hollywood.

The whole studio is being utilized in one gigantic set for this production.

The filming of "Arms and the Woman," has been completed by George Fitzmaurice of Astra, the Pathe producer, and he is now working on a five-reel feature entitled "The Romantic Journey." William Courtney is the star and the cast is made up of well known Broadway actors, among whom are Alice Dovey and Macey Harlan.

Director Mackenzie, who, with Louis Gasnier, is producing a new Pathe serial, can vouch for the ready assistance offered by American ship-masters in general and one in particular. In a recent scene the director was burning a large two-mast schooner a few miles off Coney Island. Just as the fire was nicely under way and the camera was beginning to grind, the captain of a tug boat discovered the fire and running his boat up to the craft applied the fire hose and extinguished the flames. The wind happened to be the wrong way and the captain could not hear the director's calls, so there was nothing to do but start it all over again.

Edna Goodrich Film Finished

The initial Edna Goodrich photoplay to be released by the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company on the Paramount Program has been finished at the West Coast studios. "The Making of Maddalena" is the title of the next Morosco offering and was released June 8.

Early reports from the coast indicate that the photoplay offers another excellent subject for the Paramount program not only because of the fact that it is understood to present the best work of the star and an exceptional cast, but on account of the capable and elaborate manner in which it has been staged. Included in the cast are such able players as Forrest Stanley, Howard Davies, John Burton, Mary Mersch, Juan de la Cruz and Colin Chase.

Simultaneous with the completion of "The Making of Maddalena" another Morosco company has commenced work on Mme. Rita Jolivet's vehicle "An International Marriage," by George Broadhurst. This is expected to be Mr. Broadhurst's initial subject for the Paramount Program as a result of his recent affiliation with the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company and is planned for release in July.

Rialto Presents "Macbeth"

The presentation of "Macbeth" at the Rialto Theater in New York is dignified and elaborate. Director S. L. Rothapfel has arranged an allegorical foreword—the hour glass suspended in midair reversing in unseen hands, emblematic of turning back the sands of time. The Rialto orchestra, augmented for the occasion, will play an appropriate accompaniment arranged by the Rialto musical staff. Sir Herbert Tree, the Macbeth of the play, has written an introductory which will be delivered by Leonard Crask, reader and Shakespearean actor.

The six daily presentations will be timed to a schedule and patrons have been asked to observe it closely in order to avoid marring the beauty of the performance. The schedule opens at 12 noon, with presentations following at 2:15, 4:15, 6, 7:30 and 9:30 o'clock. Between each there will be an organ recital.

Laughter Kills Patron

A retired contractor of Bedford avenue, Brooklyn, by the name of James H. Greene recently found a comedy motion picture in the Parkside Theater, Flatbush, fatal. Greene started laughing at one of the scenes and couldn't stop. His physician, Dr. W. H. Donnelly, who attended him, pronounced death due to heart failure, induced by excessive laughter.

Mr. Greene was 76 years old. He is survived by one daughter.

Theda Bara, the William Fox star, will appear shortly in a screen version of perhaps the most widely read book ever published, "East Lynne."

Mutual Program Teems With Features

JAMES KIRKWOOD SIGNS LONG TERM CONTRACT

TWO five-act masterpictures, a three-reel drama, four two-reel subjects and a number of single reel comedies lend variety to the Mutual Program for the week of June 12.

The two masterpictures feature Crane Wilbur and Winnifred Greenwood. The first of these, "The Inner Struggle," in which Miss Greenwood is assisted by Franklin Ritchie and Roy Stewart, will be released June 12. This play was written by Julian Louise Lamothe and screened under the personal direction of Edward Sloman.

"Wasted Years" is the second feature which will be released June 15. Crane Wilbur is starred in this psychological drama, supported by Mae Gaston, John Oaker and Thelma Salter, the six-year-old actress recently engaged by the Horsley-Mutual studios.

The three-reel drama of the week will be released June 15, under the title of "The Window of Dreams." This is a Thanhouser production in which Grace de Carlton and Bert Delaney have the principal roles.

The short features of two-reel length are "Circumstantial Evidence," in which Edward Coxen and Lizette Thorne are co-stars, released June 12; "Brothers Equal," a Thanhouser production with Barbara Gilroy in the lead, ready June 13. Mustang presents William Stowell and Helen Rosson in "The Sheriff of Plumas," which will go to the public June 16; and Centaur contributes "The Star of India," for June 17, featuring Margaret Gibson and the Bostock animals.

"Real Estaters," starring Claude Cooper and Frank E. McNish, and "Doughnuts," first of the new comedies featuring Riley Chamberlin in the role of Conductor No. 786, are the Falstaff offerings. Other laugh provokers are the Vogue "Love, Burglars and Bulldog," for release June 13, and "Delinquent Bridegrooms," which will go to the public on June 18; Beauty presents Carol Halloway and Johnny Sheehan in "Billy Van Deusen's Eggs-pensive Adventure," for release June 14, and "Pedigree, Pups and Pussies," with Oral Humphrey, for release June 18; Cub offers "Jerry and the Moonshiners," starring George Ovey, on June 16.

James Kirkwood Signs

John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, has completed negotiations with James Kirkwood for a long term contract with the American Film Company, Inc. Mr. Kirkwood will leave immediately for the American studios in Santa Barbara, California, where he will begin the direction of a series of features starring Mary Miles Minter. Mr. Kirkwood began directing pictures seven years ago, after a long and successful career on the speaking stage. His first work was with the Biograph Company; later he went to the Reliance, where he made a record in high-pressure direction, making two one-reel pictures a week for one year.

Constance Crawley, the American-Mutual star, is going to add to her honors on the stage and the screen the fame of a photoplaywright. Her first effort in this line will be released shortly in two acts under the title of "Fear." Frank Borzage is directing as well as acting in this play and Anna Little and Jack Richardson play the chief supporting roles. For a number of years Miss Crawley has been a contributor to various magazines, and she is now at work on the preparation of several other scenarios.

Crane Wilbur comes to the front once more as both author and star in "The Fool's Game," the scenes for which are now being taken in desert land close to Newhall, California. There are but three characters of prominence in the cast, the author takes the lead and the other two principals are portrayed by Mae Gaston and John Oaker.

A visitor at the Mustang studios in the person of an elderly, bronzed man with flowing hair, asked to be permitted to see Anna Little. At first he was refused admittance but when he did come within sight of Miss Little she flew to him with arms outstretched and much joy in her face, exclaiming: "Why, Tom, I thought you were killed in a stampede ten years ago." The favored stranger proved to be a rider for Ann's father years ago, who had been in Mexico for several years. He recognized the grown-up Anna on the screen of a Los Angeles theater and set out to find her.

Chaplin at Work on Third Picture

Charles Chaplin is now at work on his third Mutual feature, the name of which as yet is undecided. In this release the famous laughmaker will be seen in the role of an itinerant musician, in which the violin, which he plays so well, and an accordion furnish the chief music. Edna Purviance, Eric Campbell, Leo White, Charlotte Minneau and the other members of his company appear with him in this production.

"Dare-devils and Danger," is the title of a Beauty-Mutual comedy now in the course of production, in which automobiles, bicycles, motorboats, horses and motorcycles are employed in hazardous "stunts" to produce the thrills. Carol Halloway, John Sheehan and John Steppling are putting the fun into this comedy.

In the center are Thomas Chatterton, who is featured as "Lieutenant Hope," and Juanita Hansen, co-star. Director Sargent is the man with the pipe in his mouth at the right. Fourth from him is William Tedmarsh, as "Satsuma," the Jap.

Murdock McQuarrie, who for the past six months has been directing Signal-Mutual five-reel features, has gone to the American-Mutual studios, where his first production will be "The Sign of the Spade," Alan Forest and George Bebhardt, the most recent additions to the studios, will make their initial appearance in this play.

The Gaumont-Mutual three-part feature, "Flames of Vengeance," will present a novelty in that the two principal parts are played by women, Gertrude Robinson and Iva Shepard enacting them.

Helen Holmes and her company of Signal-Mutual players are now on their way to Hawaii and the Orient where they are to enact a number of scenes for "The Diamond Runner," a Mutual-Star production to be released in five acts. About twenty people are making the trip.

Theater Magnate Operates Machine

Special to Motography

In addition to his reputation as an astute promoter and one of the finest fellows in the amusement business, H. A. Sherman of Elliott & Sherman, owners of the rights to "The Birth of a Nation," for seventeen states, has acquired new distinction. He proved himself a first class motion picture operator.

When the police stepped in during the intermission at the initial showing of the big spectatcle at the Berchel, Iowa, and arrested House Manager Harold Cavanaugh and Operator Hammer, the machines were left operatorless. Here was a dilemma. A capacity house and six reels of the show yet to run. But Mr. Sherman was more than equal to the emergency. He told the operator to run along with the cops and assured him that the show would go right ahead. And it did.

Peeling his coat, Mr. Sherman got on the job. He cooked up his carbons, threaded up the machine, and the show went on without a hitch. Beads of perspiration streamed down the face of the magnate-operator, his hands were begrimed as he oiled parts and trimmed his lamps. But he stuck to his post like a veteran. The operator was on the job at the night performance, but Mr. Sherman was ready to go back to his three hours of heat, grease and toil, if need be.

After considerable agitation on the part of local politicians, lawyers and others directly and indirectly interested, the opposition to the showing of the big spectacle resolved itself into an appeal for an injunction restraining the city from interfering with the showing of the film. The city council had voted that the film should be barred on account of its alleged violation of an unused ordinance preventing theatrical entertainment that would tend to produce a race riot.

What the final outcome will be nobody ventures to surmise. Meanwhile the theater was besieged with applications for seats and, allowed to continue, the big film kept on drawing big crowds for several weeks afterward.

ELIMINATE "RISQUE STUFF"

Herbert G. Hoagland, of the Selig Company, Asks for Better Publicity Material From the Film Companies

Herbert C. Hoagland, general manager of the Selig Polyscope Company, makes some very pertinent observations on the subject of "risque stuff." Mr. Hoagland asks, "Why give the reformers material to work with? Why furnish them munitions free of all charge with which to batter down the defenses of the motion picture industry? This action is being taken by well-meaning but misguided movie manufacturers through several publicity departments."

Mr. Hoagland remarks further that fortunately most of the publicity departments have eliminated the old-fashioned "circus stuff" and send out dignified, newsy material for publication. But the occasional publicity man who believes the more suggestive stuff he writes the more space he will command is condemning the whole industry. Consequently the public has gained an idea that the motion picture studio is thronged with damsels who are most dangerous, with men who are not better than they should be, and that the work of producing motion pictures is just one round of pleasure with the risque stuff in the ascendency.

In concluding Mr. Hoagland enjoins, "Let us join together in issuing honest publicity; let us rule against the suggestive stories and the daring photographs; let us censor within our own baliwicks and then outside censorship will be unnecessary. Let us defend the reputation of the talented and clean-minded men and women known as movie stars."

Another policy of the Selig Company, which is commendable, is the exploiting of stars not only in five- and seven-reel features but also in one, two and three-reel productions released through the General Film Service.

Chaplin Was There

Charles Chaplin, the Mutual $670,000 star, was introduced to Caruso in one of the large New York hotels some time ago.

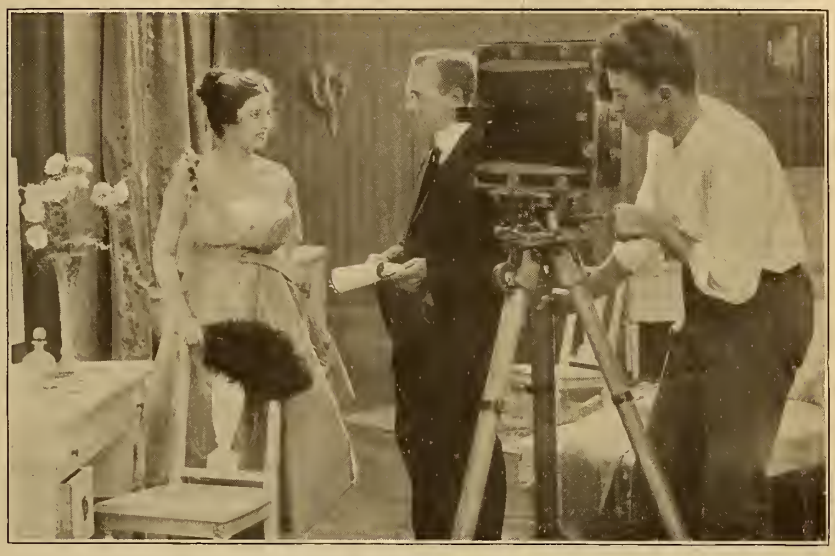
"Ah! ze Caruso of ze cinema, I greet you!" exclaimed Caruso with his characteristic modesty.

Chaplin hesitated only a second, advancing smiling and with outstretched hand.

"Delighted—the Chaplin of the opera, I congratulate you."

Alice Joyce at Work with Vitagraph

FANS WILL WELCOME POPULAR STAR—SEVERAL NOTABLE RELEASES ANNOUNCED



Before the lens again. The popular Alice Joyce working in her first scene for more than a year—Vitagraph's "The Battle Cry of War"—with Director P. S. Earle.

THE hearty welcome which Alice Joyce received when she entered upon her duties in the Vitagraph studios, after a year's absence from the moving picture world, is but a foreshadowing of the greeting she will receive when she again appears on the screen.

A dinner was given in honor of Miss Joyce at the Strand Roof Garden, Sunday evening, June 4. This dinner was attended by the other principals in the cast of the big spectacle "The Battle Cry of War" which is being produced by J. Stuart Blackton of Vitagraph, among them being Joseph Kilgour, Harry Morey, Dorothy Kelly, James Morrison, Naomi Childers, Templer Saxe, Walter McGrail, and Edward Elkas as well as Director William P. S. Earle.

The Vitagraph Company wishes to announce that William E. Wing is the author of "Miss Adventure," the three-part Broadway Star Feature released May 20. Through an error another person was given credit for the authorship of the film.

Vitagraph's offerings through V. L. S. E. for the week of June 12 included "The Redemption of Dave Darcey," starring James Morrison; and Frank Daniels as Kernel Nutt in "Kernel Nutt in Mexico."

"Ashes" is a Vitagraph Broadway Star Feature from the western branch. In it appear Corinne Griffith, Jack Mower and Anne Schaefer.

Another subject from the Hollywood studios is "Her Loving Relations," a one-part comedy featuring Mary Anderson; and "Harold the Nurse Girl," in which William Dangman plays the title role.

"The Man Behind the Curtain" is a five-reel Vitagraph Blue Ribbon Feature in which Lillian Walker is featured. Templer Saxe and John Costello appear with Miss Walker.

Little Audrey Berry, who will be remembered as a popular child artist in motion pictures, was a visitor at the Vitagraph Flatbush studios recently. The diminutive star was compelled to leave the screen for a while to pursue her studies, but she announced that she was coming back as soon as her schooling was completed and hoped to be received into the Vitagraph fold.

As the third picture starring Lucille Lee Stewart is nearing completion Ralph Ince has already started to look up locations for the next picture, a railroad drama which offered opportunities for spectacular effects, and in which Miss Stewart will also be featured.

"Sunshine Mary" Anderson will appear in person at a Los Angeles theater which is showing "Miss Adventure," in which she took the leading part, and give her admirers a chance to see her in the flesh.

Hughie Mack has given up his idea of playing Romeo because he cannot find a suitable Juliet but will appear as Sir John Falstaff in "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Fred ("Bing") Thomson has been engaged by the Vitagraph Company as director for E. H. Sothern who began work at the Vitagraph studios the first of June. Mr. Thomson has been a friend of Mr. Sothern for some years.

Schenectady Men Organize

The motion picture exhibitors of Schenectady, New York, have joined together and organized an exhibitors' association. The officers are John F. Mynderse, president; Gunner Bergstrom, vice-president; and Jacob M. Freed, secretary and treasurer. The charter members of the organization, besides the officers, are: W. A. Zeiser, Grand and Central Park Theaters; Frank X. Shap, Pearl Theater; Morris I. Silverman, Happy Hour Theater; Vincent G. Bergstrom, Majestic Theater; Fred A. Blumer, Jr., Lincoln Theater; John F. Walker, of the same theater; Frank X. Breymaier, Orpheum Theater; G. H. Roberts, Temple Theater. Application for a charter has been made to State President Lee A. Ochs and a committee appointed for securing more members.

Recently two Edison five-reelers, begun the same day, were completed at the same hour. They were "The Girl from the East" and "The Princess from the Poorhouse."

Through General Film the Selig Company will release "The Reprisal," featuring Fritzi Brunette and Jack Pickford, on June 19; "Taking a Chance," June 24, with Tom Mix; "The Sacrifice," June 26; "The Return," with Kathlyn Williams, on July 3. The Tom Mix series of western comedies begin on July 8.

WESTERN FILM CONDITIONS

Herman Wobber, Distributor of Paramount Pictures, Compares Exhibiting Conditions in the East and the West

Herman Wobber of the Progressive Motion Picture Company, distributors of Paramount pictures in the states of California, Washington, Orgeon, Arizona, New Mexico and Nevada, is visiting the offices of the corporation in New York to study eastern conditions.

In speaking of the motion picture business on the coast Mr. Wobber remarked that general film conditions in the far west are not on a par with those in the rest of the country as the average exhibitor on the coast does not make any money but he has been developed to a point where he has a much better understanding of the great value of better pictures, longer runs and higher prices than the man in the motion picture business in the east. He also mentioned the fact that while the western cities have no theaters which will compare with the largest in the east still each has from four to five houses, and one Paramount exhibitor of Seattle is planning to erect a picture house in Butte, Montana, to cost $200,000, which shows the progressiveness of the western theater men.

Paramount pictures are very popular in the west and this company claims twenty-five to thirty per cent of the business. When W. W. Hodkinson, president of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, came east in 1914 he left the management of the offices of the Progressive Motion Picture Company which he had founded, in charge of Mr. Wobber. When this company was organized it occupied two offices covering 350 square feet and now the office space occupies 3,500 square feet. Mr. Wobber has conducted the coast offices along the plan originally outlined by President Hodkinson.

The Paramount pictures for the week of June 19 will be headed by two five-reel Lasky productions, "The Clown," starring Victor Moore, and "Susie Snowflake," introducing Ann Pennington.

The single reels will show the Paramount-Burton Holmes travel picture "Imperial Berlin," showing Europe as it was before the war; the Paramount-Bray animated cartoon entitled "Bobby Bumps' Fly Swatter"; and the weekly Pictographs including "Keeping Time" in the "Testing the Mind" series; how to dress and undress the baby in "Better Babies"; "Training a Lion"; "Preparing Fruit New Ways" and "How to Fall."

The Paramount is issuing a "shell-plate" weekly to all exhibitors, containing pictures of stars and scenes in two of the weekly releases, and urging their use in newspaper publicity. The plan is to sell the entire page of shell plate to the exhibitor for a dollar and a half or two dollars, according to the zone in which he lives.

Paramount Progress, edited by H. I. Day, calls attention to a clever advertising scheme making use of their heralds, conceived by Hannaca & Morgan, managers of the Electric Theater of Glasgow, Missouri. On each Paramount day they mail heralds to all their patrons and in one out of every ten enclose a free ticket to the theater good for that night only. As a result everyone is eager to open the heralds to see if the free ticket is enclosed, and once opened they usually read them. This scheme is also carried out with the country people in the surrounding communities, and in almost every instance the free ticket is presented and accompanied by two or more paid admissions.

Modify Act for Coney Island Pictures

While Mayor Mitchel of New York vetoed the ordinance which would take the motion picture shows at Coney Island from under the jurisdiction of the city, he signified his willingness to sign a modified ordinance granting the same permission to patrons to obtain refreshments while watching the pictures if it were submitted.

The amended ordinance will allow persons witnessing a motion picture show at a hotel to buy drinks without subjecting the proprietor to prosecution for selling them as is the practice now.

The attitude of the mayor was based on the fact that while he did not think it desirable to have the shows at Coney Island run without any supervision, he believed that the peculiar nature of the theaters, which are really nothing more than sheds, with all four sides open, make the danger of fire or disorder practically negligible. While it may not be desirable to allow the serving of drinks in ordinary motion picture houses these places are operated primarily for the serving of refreshments with the films as a side issue, and it is better to have harmless pictures shown than the less desirable entertainments.

Cost of Your Show

Robert E. Welsh, author of the just-published "A-B-C of Motion Pictures," has compiled a number of statistics which answer the questions so often asked about the cost of production. A full evening's entertainment, he says, costs between ten and twenty-five thousand dollars. One-reel pictures, which require about fifteen minutes to show cost usually nearly one thousand dollars to produce, according to him.

International Serial Makes Big Hit

"THE MYSTERIES OF MYRA" GAINING IN POPULARITY

THAT the enthusiasm of the exhibitors and the press in the pre-showing of "The Mytesries of Myra" serial, which the International Film Company gave at the Princess Theater in Chicago and the New York Theater roof, was well founded is shown in the large bookings of this serial.

Supported by the powerful chain of newspapers and magazines controlled by Mr. Hearst, "The Mysteries of Myra" has grown from a mere scenario to one of the livest and most discussed photoplays in the field today. The International Film Service, Inc., Hereward Carrington, Chas. W. Goddard and the Whartons, not to mention Howard Estabrook and Jean Sothern, are responsible for the picture which is unlike any others. The story is most unusual, some say that it is weird, others that it is wonderful, but they all go to see it week after week, and that is the main thing.

The Hearst organization is to be congratulated on their initial effort, and the public will be interested to see what they will produce in the greater features promised for the near future. With such stars as Irene Castle, Nigel Barry, Grace Darling, Harry Fox, Jean Sothern and Howard Estabrook, Director General Paul Dickey is planning a great future.

Ordinarily in studio work Cooper-Hewitt violet ray lights are used overhead and on the sides, the rays being reflected downward on the actors and settings. In the seventh episode of "The Mysteries of Myra" the Wharton brothers have introduced a novelty in a set of Cooper-Hewitt lights shown before and after installation. During the action Howard Estabrook turns the current on and off several times for the benefit of the camera and the effect is novel and startling.

Paul Dickey, author, actor, playwright, producer, is director general of the International. At the University of Michigan he played football and after he left the university for several seasons he played leads in such productions as "Strong Heart" and "Pierre of the Plains." Next he developed into a playwright, and in collaboration with Charles W. Goddard wrote the successes "The Ghost Breaker," "The Misleading Lady," "The Man from the Sea," and "The Last Laugh." For several months Mr. Dickey worked with the Lasky Company on the coast before joining with the International.

"Civilization" a Sweeping Success

"Civilization" has taken New York City by storm, and conclusive proof that Thomas H. Ince's mighty cinema spectacle, is being eagerly awaited by millions throughout the country is evident from the great volume of communications which continues to seek information concerning the production's disposition. Business Manager E. H. Allen has found it necessary to install a special "Civilization" department at the Culver City studios.

The big film is having great runs in New York and Los Angeles. Negotiations are under way for its early showing in Chicago, Atlantic City, Washington, Philadelphia, Boston and other big centers.

Intense interest is being manifested in the transcontinental motorcycle trip which two young disciples of Ince are now making for the purpose of spreading the propaganda of "Civilization." The youths are Leo S. Harding and Andrew C. Edison and they are traveling, via the National Old Trails road, from Los Angeles to Portland, Me. The motorcycle is equipped with a side car and every available inch of its space is elaborately decorated with notices that "Civilization is coming," while a large suitcase is filled with literature and photographs which will aid the youths in the fulfillment of their mission.

Warm praise still is flooding the Ince offices, in the nature of congratulatory telegrams and letters, from all parts of the country. One clergyman—Thomas G. Picton—wrote: "I sincerely believe that you have made a valuable contribution to the propaganda of universal peace."

In addition to having composed a score longer than that of the average opera, embracing more than forty themes, each in keeping with the individual character for which it was written, Victor L. Schertzinger has written both the words and the music of several incidental songs to be sung during some of the more intense emotional scenes and entre acts of "Civilization."

EXHIBITORS HOLD CONTESTS

Much Interest in "Who's Guilty?" Contests—Prizes Offered by Various Exhibitors for Best Letters

Several live exhibitors out west have found in the Pathe series, "Who's Guilty?" produced by Arrow Film Corporation, opportunities for unique and forceful advertising such as do not often exist. J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of Pathe, has recently received three letters, one from an exhibitor in Milwaukee, another from St. Louis, and still another from Seattle, which show that without collusion or any outside suggestion each exhibitor had hit upon the same idea of intensifying public interest in the series.

The first letter came from the Strand Theater in Milwaukee. This enterprising house has offered a six months' admission ticket good for two persons, to the person submitting the best answer as to who is really guilty in each of the weekly episodes. Miss Agnes Thoms received the prize for the best letter on the first episode. Her letter to the theater runs as follows:

I believe that Mrs. Bullard, the wife of Dr. Bullard, is guilty.

My reason why she is guilty. A physician's wife must realize that her husband cannot always be within her beck and call. He may be called out during all hours of the day or night. If, as in this case, the physician is a young man and a splendid opportunity is offered him whereby he can demonstrate his ability and skill, his wife should rather encourage than discourage him. If his position demands that he travel in society his wife must realize that she must also travel in society and do so cheerfully. Thus Dr. Bullard could not find encouragement in his own home and naturally a man will turn to the person that will give him encouragement and take an interest in his work. If Mrs. Bullard had taken a deep interest in her husband's work and been with him hand and hand, he would never have seen the other woman, no matter how hard she had tried to lure him on and have him all herself.

In St. Louis the prize winner labelled "the other woman" as the guilty person, because "she deliberately robbed a loving and faithful wife of her happiness." Also in Seattle was "Dr. Bullard" declared to be the guilty one because the prize winning letter said "a man marries for better or worse, and if Dr. Bullard's wife could not adjust herself to social conditions, materially changed by their prosperity, that fact would certainly not justify him in going to another woman for sympathy."

The prize contest idea has proven itself to be very successful. Everywhere it is being used, popular interest has been aroused, attendance has been large, and the local newspapers have given it considerable mention.

"The Little Girl Next Door"

Probably no photoplay has caused a greater furore than the six-act feature "The Little Girl Next Door," which now is being booked on state rights basis from Room 521 First National Bank building, Chicago.

This picture is based on the report of the Illinois State Vice commission in its investigation to find out why girls went wrong, with the aim of pointing out the pitfalls that lurk in the path of the young womanhood and manhood of the country in an effort to save them from taking the first step that leads to a life of regret.

It shows how the white slavers set their traps for the unwary, how girls were led into evil through innocent flirtations, how many were lured to the gay cafe life through insufficient wage to keep body and soul together.

The cases are all based on actual fact although professional actors and actresses were engaged to portray the evils that befell the girls who testified before the committee. Lieutenant Governor Barratt O'Hara and many other prominent city and state officials, social workers and ministers appear in the production.

Educational Film Combine

An important deal in the educational moving picture world was consummated recently when The Church and School Social Service Bureau, Inc., which was founded two years ago by Rev. William Carter, D. D., late pastor of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church, New York, took over the educational moving picture business of the F. H. Decker Company, of 156 Fifth avenue, and consolidatd it with The Church and School Social Service Bureau.

This has doubled the film stock of The Church and School Social Service Bureau, and also its business operations, as the F. H. Decker Company has been serving churches, schools and social service organizations with moving pictures ever since the invention of the moving picture film. Mr. Decker, the founder of the other business, who has had fifteen years' experience in it, was elected as president of The Church and School Social Service Bureau.

"A Daughter of the Gods"

ROGER W. BABSON DISCUSSES FOX SPECTACLE

THE William Fox feature which for so long has been known only as the Million Dollar Picture, has at last been officially christened, "A Daughter of the Gods." The first showing of this picture will be made in a Broadway theater for a run of months, and as rapidly as possible thereafter it will go to the other larger cities.

Robert Hood Bowers, the noted composer, has been selected to write the musical score for this picture. Mr. Bowers has already completed the introductory number, which is destined to become one of the most popular airs of the year. Not only will the musician write the score, but he will also personally rehearse the large orchestra which will be assembled for the presentation of the picture.

Roger W. Babson, the great financial and economic authority, gives the following story of his impressions of "A Daughter of the Gods":

"Recently on the Island of Jamaica I was with Herbert Brenon while he was preparing a new play at a cost of perhaps $1,000,000. Talk about geometrical progression! Here is a jump in the cost of production from $10,000 to $100,00 in five years and then from $100,000 to $1,000,000 in only one year!

"For the setting of this play an old Spanish fort was necessary, so the seas were searched in order to get one. The most suitable was Fort Augusta, found half under water near Kingston, Jamaica. To pump out the water, drain the land, kill the mosquitoes and fill in cost $100,000, but this was only the beginning.

"The story made it necessary that a Moorish city should be built behind this fort, in which must be a real palace, an actual slave market, stores of all kinds and everything else that one sees in an old Moorish city. Such a city was built at a cost of between $300,000 and $400,000.

"But the building of the city was only part of the expense. It must be populated, the streets must be full of people and they must all be black and in Oriental costumes, and the inhabitants had to be hired at from fifty cents a day upward, and some days the number ran up to 5,000, all of whom must be provided with costumes and many with helmets, spears or bows and armor. For one scene arrangements were made with the manager of a circus in New York for ten camels to be sent at a cost of $200 a day—total cost $7,000. When you see this play on the screen these camels will show for just ten seconds—cost $700 a second for the camels alone!

"And yet this great Moorish city is only one scene of the story. A little gnome city was also constructed at St. Ann's Bay, forty miles away, for another scene in which 500 little children performed as fairies. Other scenes have been taken under water in the harbor of Kingston with twenty famous swimmers from New York dressed as mermaids. Miss Kellermann, the star of the story, was even taken up into the forests of Jamaica and with her hands tied allowed to float down a rapid stream and over a natural precipice. For one scene a hundred boats were wanted and all Jamaica was scoured to secure them. Each boat had to have an oriental sail, so a hundred sails were made, all dyed a dark red to harmonize with the landscape. And these boats appear on the scene for just eight seconds!

"But all this expenditure is based on reason. The only wonder is that more people did not have the sense to anticipate such achievements. Any one who had stopped to think it over could easily have foreseen that the presentation of any big spectacle was sure to be a money-making proposition without the slightest risk. This is a result of the law of averages.

"When a regular theatrical company is formed to stage some great play with a famous star it can appeal each night to only one audience. If the house is full and this one audience is receptive it is a profitable investment, but if not it fails. With moving picture productions it is entirely different.

"When a film company gets a big star to play for it it can prepare a hundred or a thousand of the films almost as cheaply as one, and the play can be shown at a thousand theaters each night instead of at only one.

"In view of this the law of averages makes the picture production a real investment, while the same thing for the old-fashioned Broadway theatrical manager would be a foolish gamble.

"I asked Herbert Brenon to tell me what he thought the motion pictures would be doing ten years hence. Said he:

" 'The first development, which is already in progress, will be toward longer reels, or rather, longer productions. Instead of having half a dozen different plots shown in one evening, or even two or three, the entire evening will be devoted to one production.

" 'Such plays can be produced much better than shorter ones. In other words, the moving picture theaters are bound more and more to take the place of the regular theaters, with one evening devoted exclusively to one cast and one play.

"'These longer plays will inevitably lead to long runs. For instance, instead of the picture houses in New York thinking that they must have a change once or twice a week they will be content to run the same production for several months or an entire season. After a play runs in the leading theaters of five or six big cities the production will be shown in other cities. Gradually it will appear in smaller and smaller places.

"'This gives a long life to a play, a life of at least five to ten years. This has its commercial as well as its sentimental value. Although the price to the theater for the use of the reels will decrease as the size of the city decreases, yet the number of cities in which the production will be shown will rapidly increase as their size diminishes.'

"In these remarks of Mr. Brenon's he touched on the great economic possibilities of the game. The motion picture business bears the same relation to the amusement field that the chain stores bear to the merchandising field.

"When a cast plays in the old way its income is absolutely limited each day to the capacity of the theater. Hence there is almost a physical limit to the amount of money which can be spent profitably in producing a play to be shown along the old lines. When a cast, however, plays to the motion camera its efforts can be shown every night to thousands of audiences. Moreover, these audiences are not confined to any one country, as pictures are a universal language. With this thought in mind it will be seen that there really is not so much risk in spending a million dollars for one production before the camera as in spending a few thousand dollars for one Broadway production to be shown along the old lines."

Motion Pictures in Japan

Few people in America realize how common motion pictures are in Japan. A very interesting description of the motion picture business in the land of the cherry blossom has been printed by the Independent of Emaus, Pennsylvania. It follows:

"Japan was the first eastern country in which motion pictures were shown. The rickishas, which carry one to the theaters, have real Japanese lanterns—they drift along in the darkness like glow-worms. At the theater they will wait for you till the performance is over, and speed you back on tires of American rubber.

"In Yokohama one whole street is given up to motion pictures—theater street. Great banners hung clear across it, with the picturesque Japanese alphabet racing up and down them, advertising the respective performances.

"On the floor the audience sits, with their feet squarely under them, absorbed in the shifting shadows. The subtitles are in English; but so common is English becoming in Japan that the meaning doesn't go over their heads. It is now being taught in the public schools, so that there is always some one to whisper the title's meaning.

"American manufacturers have labored long and hard to find films that will amuse the Japanese, but their success has not been very marked. No foreign mind can fathom a Japanese's sense of humor. Our foremost films over there go flat. Charlie Chaplin bores them. But in the midst of a death scene in some dramatic film they will suddenly rock with merriment. There is a fortune in it for any one who will locate the Japanese bump of humor and manufacture picture plays that will hit it.

"The Japanese are now manufacturing their own films, but they are of little interest to other pople, as nothing ever happens in them. There is no action. Half a reel may be given up to drinking a cup of tea. But this may be exceedingly funny to the Japanese, for there has been more going on than shown on the surface. By the way they lift their cups, by the way they swing their fan, they are passing a message. Two Japanese can talk to each other with their fans while the American standing alongside understands nothing of what they are saying."

Mary Miles Minter, newest of the stars to join the American-Mutual studios, was presented with a beautiful silver loving cup by a group of her intimate friends, just previous to her departure for the coast studios.

John Philip Sousa and Daniel Frohman acted for pictures recently. The occasion was the rehearsal of the presentation of a silver loving cup to Carl Edouarde, leader of the New York Strand's concert orchestra.

American-Mutual Plans Big Things

CHESTER BEECROFT TO GATHER BIG STARS AND AUTHORS

THAT the American Film Company intends to maintain the leadership it recently achieved in the way of extraordinary productions is evidenced by the opening last week of a New York office from which the most brilliant stars of the thespic firmament, together with the big ones among the writers of fiction, drama and scenario, will be gathered to the fold of the Flying A.

John R. Freuler.

Chester Beecroft, whose thorough experience and conspicuous achievements in various branches of the business amply qualify him for the important duties of the position, has been chosen to manage the new office, and has already taken up his duties in rooms 1627 and 1628 of the Masonic building, 71 West Twenty-third street.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American, has for a long time been recognized as a master producer and much of the success of his many productions, such as "The Diamond from the Sky," "The Girl and the Game," and innumerable regular releases, has been attributed to the fact that he has always given his personal attention to the preparation and actual making of every photoplay.

Mr. Hutchinson has wisely determined to continue this policy of personal supervision, so that when he and his associates decided to confine the future activities of the company to the biggest and most desirable attractions that can possibly be procured, the necessity of a metropolitan office became apparent.

James Kirkwood, director, and Mary Miles Minter, star, are already working on American productions, and negotiations are now under way with two of the most famous feminine picture stars in the world, also with three great dramatic stars who will be presented in the play or plays with which they are most closely identified in the mind of every theater-goer in the land.

The guiding idea in this new departure will be the careful study of the real demand of the generality of picture audiences, and the development of the artistic and technical phases of the motion picture along lines most conducive to the permanent success of the industry.

A frequent cause of failure of individual productions which have had the advantage of a great star or a great play has been the weakness of the connecting links. A great star needs equally great directing, and a great play or story is frequently ruined by incompetent "scenarioizing." Granted that these major requirements have been fully met, there is still the peril of improper technical and scenic preparation, hopeless camera men, bad laboratory work, and last, but still important, unskilful advertising.

Chester Beecroft.

To guard against the operation of any such faults in the "ultra" productions of the American Film Co., Mr. Hutchinson has instructed Mr. Beecroft to contract with the greatest actors in the world, with the authors of current works of fiction and drama for their most striking successes, and original stories to be written for special stars, experienced scenario writers who have had literary training to put such creations into "working" form for the studio, master directors of the Kirkwood class, crack cameramen, etc., etc,

S. S. Hutchinson.

When John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, advanced the policy of that distributing organization to its new point of commanding efficiency by limiting its releases to brilliant and pretentious big star or big photoplay productions, each capable of creating its own individual business and profit for the exhibitor without depending at all upon any other Mutual releases, the American was the first company to see the wisdom of the plan and put it in instant operation.

That the American is in earnest in its determination to produce only the "ultra" in motion pictures, and is properly equipped to do so, will be apparent to all when it is recalled that it was Mr. Freuler who conceived the idea and worked out the details of the contract whereby Charley Chaplin is now receiving $10,000 a week, plus $150,000 bonus. Up to date the Chaplin-Mutual Company is the most spectacular monetary success ever executed in the realm of films. Mr. Freuler is one of the principal stockholders in the American and is vitally interested in its progress so that it becomes reasonable to expect that the Chaplin standard will be closely followed.

Mr. Beecroft will also handle the export department, as far as sales and contracts are concerned, of the American, Lone Star (Charlie Chaplin), North American ("Diamond from the Sky," etc.), "Damaged Goods," and some others, and special advertising on the newly acquired stars and the series of pictures in which they will appear. This means a real man's size job but no one doubts Beecroft's ability to handle it.

THE PICTURE MENACE

Liquor Interests and Churchmen Both Call for Censorship, for Opposite Reasons—Pictures Are Really Undeniable Uplift

By E. D. Horkheimer

Secretary and Treasurer Balboa Amusement Producing Company.

And now moving pictures are branded as a menace to the liquor business.

"What are we going to do about the Movie Menace?" asks Mida's Criterion, the official organ of the Wholesale Liquor association. This article is a strong endorsement for the influence exerted by the silent drama for morality and reform. In visualizing the havoc wrought by liquor the screen is making it unpopular. This is tending to decrease the liquor business to such an extent that the liquor dealers are "viewing with alarm" the inroads made upon their business and therefore brand the movies as a menace.

There are other reasons for the liquor dealers to be alarmed because of the growing popularity of the moving pictures. The men who used to spend all their time and money at the corner saloon are now spending it at the moving picture houses and they are taking their families with them, thus promoting domestic unselfishness. That this is pinching the liquor traffic is clearly shown by the protest which has arisen.

The strange thing about all this is the conflict of interests arising. In the demand for censorship there are two forces diametrically opposed to each other advocating the censorship of moving pictures. They are the churches and the saloons. They unite in demanding that the same sort of scenes be eliminated but for entirely opposite reasons.

Mida's Criterion objects to barroom scenes, brothels, cabarets, etc., where "you see liquor in its worst aspects," and regrets that films do not show it in the better light as at the banquet and in the home.

The reformers assert that the use of the sort of scenes the liquor people would have us eschew serves to undermine morality and tends to mislead many who would not otherwise know of such things.

The liquor people have grounds for their apprehension. They have at last found a competitor which competes. I grant you that all pictureplays may not be on the highest plane desirable. Yet at its worst, I do not believe that the entire output of photoplays to date has done as much harm as a single dive where liquor is sold in a big city.

When they claim that "pictures have made a goat of liquor" they hit the nail on the head. The friends of liquor are growing steadily fewer. In my opinion the liquor people made a tactical blunder when they started out to discredit the screen, hoping thereby to reap a benefit. The truth of the matter is that the devil's tail has been twisted and now he's hollering. Pious-like the liquor people are trying to put the picture producers on the defensive; when in truth we are prosecuting a powerful educational and reformative influence.

As it looks to me the issue before the people is, "pictures or liquor." I say this advisedly for the whole contention right now hinges on censorship. As we are making photoplays there is an effort to protray certain phases of life as it is. You can't make a picture of any sort without light and shade. Compelled to cut out the darker side in which liquor figures strongly and you destroy the story—I mean the lesson. I do not believe any producer of consequence introduces liquor or any seamy phase of life just for mere wantonness. It is there because it plays a part in the life we are trying to reflect. But censor our pictures and you hush up the very thing that the powers of darkness want soft-pedalled. In other words, you play into the very hands of the liquor dealers, thus prolonging liquor's sway.

Yankee Films Increase in France

The curtailment in the production of French and Italian motion picture films, owing to conditions created by the war, has caused a considerable increase in the use of American films. Although American motion pictures have always been popular with St. Etienne audiences, their regular appearance on the weekly programs of the local cinemas has developed from the general excellence of the pictures shown. Inquiries among exhibitors and spectators emphasize their satisfaction with the films, which are usually advertised by American lithographic posters.

Four large and several small theaters cater to the admirers of motion pictures in St. Etienne, the reels being supplied by one or the other of the two principal syndicates (Pathe or Gaumont, of Paris) which receive the American films direct or from London agencies. The programs run a week and embody a varied selection of comedy, educational and dramatic pictures. While at present patriotic and war pictures are naturally strong attractions, the standard plays of well known authors adapted to the scren are also great favorites. The cowboy or western drama has more or less had its day, but the comedy and dramatic pictures showing scenes of American cities and resorts are well known and appreciated. The first continued story—an American production—with its daily publication in one of the Parisan journals, is a feature in several of the theaters at present.

Prices for the usual two-hour performance range from 12 to 30 cents. One performance is given each evening with two matinees on Sunday, while on Thursday there is a special educative program for school children. The continuous performance as given in American cities is unknown here. The theaters are comfortable, sanitary, and well conducted; they usually employ an orchestra, and are largely attended by all classes of the population.

It is very likely that Douglas Fairbanks' next Triangle release, "In the Carquinez Woods," to follow "Flirting with Fate," will have its premiere at the New York Rialto Theater, according to a recent telegram from S. L. Rothapfel, the manager of the Fine Arts star. The story of "In the Carquinez Woods" is based on the much talked of California novel, bearing the same name, by Bret Harte.

Mr. John Robertson, a well known actor, who has made an enviable reputation for himself by reason of his artistic work, has been appointed to a directorship by Supervising Director Ralph W. Ince, of the Vitagraph Company, at the Bay Shore, L. I., studios. Mr. Robertson possesses peculiar fitness for this field of the motion picture industry by reason of the fact that in stage work his efforts have always been for the best in the production.

"The Come-Back" and "The Snowbird"

Two Metro Features Present Well Known Stars. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

HAROLD LOCKWOOD and May Allison make their first Metro appearance in a melodramtic comedy written and directed by Fred J. Balshofer. "The Come-Back" tells the story of a wealthy youth who engages himself with "bubble busting," which, the inserts state, is a favorite Broadway pastime, until his father becomes disgusted and tells him that he is not worth his salt and then Burt determines to go to work.

The play has been well produced and directed. The action, aided considerably by subtitles written in a humorous, George Ade sort of style, moves at an even pace and it is rather colorful. When Burt sets out to prove that he is worth his salt he makes immediately for his father's lumber camp. There he is at first laughed at when he asks for a job, but the foreman puts him to work marking logs.

Of course, there is a pretty girl at the camp. She is prettier and more lastingly attractive than any of his former city girl friends; they proved fair-weather friends, for when Burt went broke they deserted him. He learns that muscle and fighting blood play a large part in love making at the lumber camp, and after taking a beating from Patta's admirer he starts tree-chopping to build up.

One day he finds some positive evidence of the foreman's crooked dealing. Ridgeway knew he was being robbed, but he never could locate the guilty party. When Burt forces a confession from the crooks he wires his father about it. Also, he says in the wire that he has found a girl who thinks him worth his salt. This is splendid news to Ridgeway, and he answers with congratulations and the hope that Burt and his wife will come to him soon.

Harold Lockwood was presented with all sorts of opportunities by this story and he made use of all of them. He is in the center of the stage all the time, but he does things so well that this is an advantage. Miss Allison is a pleasing Patta. complete an effective supporting company. Produced by the Quality Pictures Corporation, "The Come-Back" is entertaining in a not common sense of the word.

"THE SNOWBIRD"

Mabel Taliaferro in the role of a most independent American girl lends singular charm and a rarely delicate style of beauty to "The Snowbird," a six-part Metro offering written by Mary Rider and directed by Edwin Carewe. As Lois Wheeler, the vivacious and strong-willed girl, who courageously travels to the hills of the Northwest to prove her father's innocence of any wrong in a certain business deal and to save herself from a distasteful marriage, Miss Taliaferro is fascinating and it is her characterization which stands out as the feature of "The Snowbird."

Edwin Carewe does some fine acting in the character of Jean Corteau and James Cruze is admirable in a heavy role. The company and an interesting production are superior to the story, which seldom grows real or impressive through any force of its own. The best dramatic situation comes when Jean promises to remove the all-important papers from the hiding place and give them to Lois, who has already stolen them. For the rest the play is good simply because it was capitally produced and effectively acted.

Lois is somewhat of a flirt. She amuses herself by making Bruce Mitchell, who is very rich, pay her a great deal of attention. When she emphatically refuses to marry him, Mitchell demands that her father give him the deed to some lumber property he bought from Wheeler when the latter was financially embarrassed. The father is unable to produce the deed and Lois then resolves to go to Canada and procure it from Jean Corteau. Masquerading as a boy, she is taken into Corteau's cabin. The result is that both are attracted to each other and in the end, after Mitchell has been disposed of, they marry.

The action laid in Canada has atmosphere. Effective snow scenes in which several dog sleds are used bring this about. Warren Cook, Arthur Evers, Kitty Stevens, Walter Hitchcock and John Melody appear in the supporting cast.

"The Inner Struggle"

American Mutual Masterpicture Released June 12. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

WHILE the story told is well presented and holds the interest closely, one is tempted to speak first of the excellence of the technical side of this picture. Edward Sloman, the director, has succeeded in getting some very fine lighting effects, both in interior and exterior scenes, while there is a presentation of a storm at night which is beautifully done.

This drama is of high class throughout, in sincerity of effort and in success of attainment. The story, written by Julian La Mothe, is interpreted by a capable cast of actors, chief among them Franklyn Ritchie, well fitted for the part of the unselfish doctor, Roy Stewart, who plays convincingly the heavy role of Harry Elliot, and Winnifred Greenwood, at her best as Mira Hamilton, who marries a man to reform him.

The play begins with an unusual setting, a leper colony on a far-off island. The physician is Dr. Grant. The arrival of a woman who, although free from the disease, refuses to be separated from her husband, who has been sent to the islands, recalls to Dr. Grant's mind another story of devotion. The story is told as Dr. Grant recalls it. It is of his own devotion to Mira and of her loyalty to her worthless husband.

Mira is fascinated by Harry Elliot and in spite of the warning of Dr. Grant, her true friend, she marries him. On the very eve of their wedding, she is disillusioned, but tries to awaken the better nature in Elliot. In this she is aided by Dr. Grant, who loves her is grieved by her unhappiness. It is a difficult struggle, and comes near being a tragedy. Elliot, who has been drinking, is angered at Grant's solicitude for Mira and attacks him. Events leading to this scene, which is the turning point of the play, are well arranged, and the storm which accompanies it heightens the dramatic effect.

After this, Grant gains control of Elliot and reforms him.

The marriage takes place, to Dr. Grant's sorrow.

Then, when his work is done, he accepts the appointment to the leper islands. For he and Mira have discovered their love for each other and believe it best that Grant go away.

This part of the story Dr. Grant reviews in memory. Then comes a letter from Mira telling of her husband's death and Dr. Grant prepares to return home. His love for his patients and his work make him reconsider, however. Then he discovers that he has contracted leprosy and must stay.

Telling so much of story as a cut-back retards the action somewhat, for we wait for events to catch up with the present time, which they do not do until the last few scenes. The story gains by the avoidance of the conventional ending, however, and its strength and sincerity make it a thoroughly satisfying offering.

"The Iron Claw"

Fifteenth Episode of Pathe's Serial. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE IRON CLAW" boasts no more interesting episode than "The Double Resurrection," which is the fifteenth or the first chapter beyond the original length of the serial written by Arthur Stringer and produced under the direction of Edward Jose. Judging from this episode no mistake was made when the number of two reel releases was increased from fourteen to twenty.

The most thrilling incident in this episode is where Margery, bound hand and foot, is thrown upon the railroad track, where she helplessly struggles to save herself from the express train fast approaching her. Fortunately the Laughing Mask is in the neighborhood, so the train is switched and Margery saved. It is only a few feet from where she lays that the train swerves to the clear track. This is strenuous melodrama, but it thrills and it will satisfy.

The noteworthy development of the story occurring in "The Double Resurrection" is the return of Davy, who was supposed to have died some few chapters back, and also the reappearance of the Laughing Mask. As far as this chapter goes, Davy is not the Laughing Mask, for while the latter is saving Margery the former is seen in cut-backs with the party in pursuit of the Iron Claw. This may start some of the serial's followers guessing all over again.

In the opening scene Legar and his henchmen discover that the money and securities they stole have disappeared. A veiled woman, or man it later proves to be, listens to the irate gangsters through a dictaphone. He learns that one of the gang is dissatisfied and will leave the villainous fold. He meets the member and on a promise of giving him half the stolen treasure, receives a confession clearing the Laughing Mask of the crimes charged to him.

The veiled person then asks Mr. Golden to visit a certain house the next day that he may be convinced that the Laughing Mask is not a criminal. At the meeting, made exciting when the Iron Claw makes an attempt upon the veiled one's life, Margery and her father find to their amazement that Davy and no other is the one masquerading in the feminine attire. The Iron Claw strives to recover the treasure. He secures it and Margery too. The latter he leaves on a railroad track to perish and the former he takes with him into the woods nearby.

Pearl White's exhibition of daring in the express train episode is a reminder, hardly gentle by the way, that she has been called the "peerless, fearless girl" for reasons wholly grounded on fact. Margery's change of residence from the town to the country home comes at a good time. The action has the advantage of settings that are seasonable and also the new and handsome interior settings in her home please very much.

"Hypocrisy"

Virginia Pearson in a Five-Reel William Fox Drama. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE story in this offering contains a number of dramatic scenes skillfully put together, but its most unusual and pleasing feature and the thing which one will remember longest is the very clever manner in which humor is interspersed with the emotional scenes. While to Virginia Pearson's acting is due much of the appeal of the story, to Kenean Buel, the director, should go the credit for making an out of the ordinary production from ordinary material. Another point of excellence is that this humorous material, instead of destroying the dramatic atmosphere, is an effective contrast. And it proves very entertaining to the audience.

As suggested in its title, the play is directed against the shams of society. Virginia Pearson plays Virginia Trent, a society girl whose ambition is to marry a rich man. She becomes engaged to Warren Presbry, whom she really loves, but when Presbry loses his wealth, Virginia's mother has the wedding stopped. Virginia takes her first step in her rebellion against society when she elopes with the now penniless Presbry.

The next acts of the play show the semi-tragic attempts of Virginia to play the economical housewife. Though her intentions are good, she soon slips back into her old habits of life, and finds herself in debt. A former suitor, Hutchins, who had been favored by Virginia's mother, offers to aid her and though she refuses his money, she continues to see him and to go further into debt. At last, when Hutchins offers to buy from her stock in a certain corporation, which her husband had given her and which had depreciated in value, she is glad to sell it. But a number of circumstances in this connection arouse her husband's suspicions. There is a quarrel and Virginia leaves her home, but she refuses to go back to her mother or to divorce her husband and marry Hutchins. Instead she lives with an aunt, and sets out to earn her own way.

Then the action of the story quickens until Presbry, who is the district attorney, is accused of aiding an illegal merger by selling his stock in a company, the stock which Virginia had sold. Virginia accidentally learns of the plot against Presbry and daringly sets out to foil it. In doing so she outwits Hutchins, with whom she has a very strenuous struggle, and wins back her husband's love and trust. Presbry is cleared and Hutchins convicted. Virginia regains control of the stock, which advances to its original price, and makes them wealthy.

While many of these situations are theatrical and not very probable, they are interesting and the play as a whole is a good entertainment.

Supporting Miss Pearson are Alfred Swenson as Warren Presby, John Webb Dillon as Hutchins, and Ida Darling as Mrs. Trent, and Henry Leone, Lydia Dickson and Adella Barker.

"The Two Orphans"

Selig Three-Reel Drama Released June 12. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS Selig re-issue of their production of the famous story and stage play by Kate Claxton is interesting both for its own sake and in comparison with present productions. As a costume play, it has a number of good points, in photography and lighting effects and in acting. A notable cast interprets the roles skilfully. Kathlyn Williams and Winnifred Greenwood are Henriette and Louise, the "two orphans." Others in the cast are Charles Clary and Myrtle Stedman as the Count and Countess De Linieres, Adrienne Kroell, Lyllian Leighton, Leighton Stark and James O'Burrell.

The trend of events is not as clearly presented as it would be in a more recent production, but the story is generally well known. The most striking difference is noticed in the settings, which are those of the speaking stage rather than of the present day studio. But the offering in general stands up well under comparison.

A young noblewoman secretly weds a man beneath her in social station. A child is born to them, Louise, who is blind. When the secret marriage is revealed, the girl's father has the husband put to death. The baby is given to a peasant woman, and later the mother marries a man of her own rank.

About eighteen years later, Henriette, daughter of the peasant woman, who has died, takes her blind foster sister to Paris. There they encounter all kinds of trouble and become separated. They have a number of thrilling adventures, and in the end Henrictte marries a nobleman and Louise is reunited with her own mother.

Three-Reel Essanay Drama Released June 10. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

WHILE the story of the young wife who gets into debt at the gambling table and who tries to meet her obligations without her husband knowing of the affair is not new, this Essanay production presents it with sufficient complications and well managed suspense to hold the interest throughout and to make of it a pleasing play. The acting of the cast of players is very good, effective but natural. Nell Craig is the young wife, Helen Rowe, and Darwin Karr is her husband. Patrick Calhoun and Marion Murray are Gilbert Judson, society crook, and Lois Bedford, his accomplice.

Mrs. Rowe is encouraged in her love of cards by Judson, and after early successes, she loses heavily to him. Since her husband has disapproved of playing for money, she does not tell him of her debt. When he gives her a valuable piece of jewelry she sees a way out of her trouble and, intending to give the real jewel to Judson, she purchases a paste imitation. But her maid is a thief (Alice McChesney plays this role well), and she aids a burglar in robbing the safe. They get only the paste jewels, and, since her husband believes the real ones to be stolen, Mrs. Rowe thinks fate is aiding her.

She takes the jewels to Judson at his apartment. A detective who had been called by Rowe to recover the jewelry has learned of Mrs. Rowe's debt and follows her. He arrives just in time to save Mrs. Rowe from Judson's unwelcome attentions and to arrest him as a much-sought criminal. He tears up the I. O. U. slips and takes the jewel, which he later returns to Rowe; but he does not reveal Mrs. Rowe's secret.

The various complications are clearly presented, and while there is much co-incidence in the story, it is handled in a plausible manner. The photography of the picture is good.

"The Dividend"

Triangle-Ince Capital and Labor Melodrama. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

WILLIAM H. THOMPSON carries the lion's share of what impressiveness "The Dividend" contains upon his own generously broad shoulders. This is so not because he is the one and only effective actor in the cast—the fact that Charles Ray, to mention only one, is in the cast disproves any such thought as that, but the character presented him by this rather striking melodrama from the pen of C. Gardner Sullivan is in fact the only really notable one in the play.

A very human moment in "The Dividend."

The story contracts the living conditions of the capitalist and the laborer. While the luxury of the former and the absolute want of the latter may not be overdrawn to an extreme degree for the sake of contrast, we incline to the belief that the power the capitalist exercises over the worker is stretched considerably. In these days it is no easy matter for an employer who depends upon workers actually in possession of a trade to cut wages.

In this story John Steele makes up his mind to pay a record dividend to the stockholders in his corporation and he forthwith announces that there will be a decrease in pay. Nothing happens, except a few grumbles from certain employes. In the end we find that the increase in profits amounts to one and one-half million dollars for the fiscal year, which is a whole lot of money to save in wages alone. We thoroughly dislike to become technical in this sense, but here is a case where definite figures are quoted and everything is done to make the distortion of facts more vivid, and these are facts which are being distorted generally by writers and orators, socialistic and otherwise. We take it that people go to the theater to get away from arguments so boresomely overdrawn, and we complain.

Taking everything into account, though, one can readily see that "The Dividend" will take a firm hold upon audiences in general. The story ends tragically. The capitalist is so absorbed with his business affairs that he utterly neglects his son. The boy is worthy of every encouragement. His natural desires are lofty. He wishes to go to work, but the father writes him one check after another and practically urges him to go out and dissipate. He does finally, and becomes a drug fiend. On the evening Steel receives a silver cup in appreciation from his business associates, his son is brought home, a physical wreck, and he dies, despite the earnest prayers of the father, now racked by bitter remorse and self-condemnation.

Charles Ray is alive to the opportunities given him and he carries the sympathy of the spectator consistently. Ethel Ullman and Margaret Thompson, who play an ungrateful part commendably, are also good. The production of the story in all particulars is entirely satisfactory. The ending is dramatically strong. What may be lacking in realness in this story is certainly made up for in the power of its melodramatic situations.

"The Evil Thereof"

A Famous Player-Paramount Production Released June 5. Reviewed by George W. Graves

"THE EVIL THEREOF" is predestined to meet with popular favor more as an embodiment of good acting and conformity to some of the grim facts of life, than as a production which has as its basis a skilful and entertaining plot. The story is old material, embellished in a degree with novel presentation.

Marie refuses love and poverty for wealth and slavery.

Frank Losee becomes his role to perfection as the tempter, rolling in wealth, who leads the proud and wilful manicurist into his den and forever away from her barber lover, whose warning she scoffs at, saying she is old enough to care for herself. After the poor girl is ruined, her alternative is to marry the wealthy broker, with whom she lives a life of misery and self-reproach. The story comes to quite a daring conclusion when the wife, incensed by the humiliating recital of her unfortunate past at a dinner party, plunges a knife deep into her husband's bosom.

Grace Valentine plays an excellent victim of the tempter's wiles and of her own pique. Her performance is realistic and convincing. Crauford Kent also puts plenty of force into his portrayal of the unfortunate young barber. His manly attraction gives the sympathetic viewer the assurance that he will later find a sweetheart less prone to taste of the evil fruit.

Much good atmosphere and capable handling of important scenes is directly traceable to Robert G. Vignola, the director.

This production will no doubt be very much of an attraction to many but it hardly measures up to the standard set by past Famous Players productions.

"The Moonshiners"

Triangle-Keystone Comedy Featuring Al St. John. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE story of the city detective in search of the hidden still in the mountain who by virtue of his determination and a little courage finds both the outlaws' stronghold and a girl with whom he falls in love, is amusingly burlesqued in the latest Triangle-Keystone offering. This plot which has done such valiant service since the beginning of photoplays, requires not the usual broad comic treatment to be entertaining. And the scenario writer and director apparently realized the fact, for once the mountains are reached the spectator is presented with the old familiar romance with the pursued girl and the rescuing hero and with the occasional lapse into the real Keystone slapstick, "The Moonshiners" has no difficulty in holding attention and keeping the audience diverted.

Al St. John, whose effective clowning in many Keystone comedies has earned him the right to feature position in the cast, is the main figure in this picture. He is the expressman's assistant who reads dime novels and places himself in the role of the famous detective. While out hunting he meets the girl. Her suitor, the young moonshiner, who has not shaved for two days, attempts to embrace her, and rather than have this, the girl jumps over a cliff. Al rescues her and he is captured by the outlaws, but the girl intercedes. The rest of the story follows the course of many moonshine melodramas.

Alice Lake is a pretty and always charming mountain waif. Joe Bordeau is the villain, Bert Frank the revenue officer and Horace J. Haines has the other prominent part—that of the station agent.

"An Innocent Magdalene"

Artistry Is Keynote of Triangle-Fine Arts Drama. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

ARTISTICALLY, "An Innocent Magdalene" is distinctly worth while. This is something which simply cannot be said about the averagely good offerings. "An Innocent Magdalene" is far better than what is accepted as good, and this despite the fact that it contains not a single sensational melodramatic moment in its entire make-up.

The story is laid in the South and its plot is simple, quite so. It is the story of a girl whose love for a stranger to her town, which is in fact the Universe as far as her opportunities to reach out are concerned, is all powerful. She is so dominated by this affection that she leaves her aristocratic father who continually boasts of his ancestry and decries a social standard which holds that men are born equal and deserve equal opportunity.

The man Dorothy marries is worthy of her love. He proves it when he casts aside his former mode of living, which included gambling on a basis which put him outside the law. Sentenced to a year in prison, Forbes leaves his little wife with assurance that happiness will be theirs after he returns. During his absence a woman calls upon Dorothy and emphatically states that she is the legal wife. The stunned Dorothy, who is soon to become a mother, returns to her father's home. He orders her out and she is subject to the insults of the people of the town. Forbes returns to his home and on finding the woman there, tells her that past follies cannot interfere with his happiness now, and advises her to return to her husband. He then travels to Norwalk and is reunited with Dorothy.

The characters, all of them, are deftly drawn. The narrow father, who lives in the past, the gambler and Dorothy in whom the instincts of true womanhood flourish, are strikingly human. It is an appealing story and the treatment is nothing if it is not delicate and artistic. Allan Dwan had a splendidly constructed scenario to work from and an intelligent cast to work with. The director himself rose to the occasion and the result is "An Innocent Magdalene," a picture of rare charm. It is a picture which creates and sustains a real and artistic illusion. Roy Sumerville wrote the scenario from the story by Granville Warwick.

Lillian Gish probably never had better opportunities and probably for that very reason never gave such an impressive characterization, and she along with Sam de Grasse and Spottiswoode Aitken and others in the cast compels admiration. One is tempted to insert words of thanks into the flow of praise her performance in this picture honestly merits. Some day pictures such as this will be the rule more than the exception. That day cannot come too soon.

"The Making of Maddalena"

Edna Goodrich Appears for First Time in Morosco Pictures—Vivid Italian Story

"THE MAKING OF MADDALENA" as a photoplay of appeal is really made by what has been done for the scenario by the director and the cast which Edna Goodrich heads. The scenario is based on the play of the same name. The story whose central character is an Italian beauty is unfolded in an atmosphere of striking reality; a quality to which is attributable the sympathy and attention compelled and centered in a play concerning itself with things more theatrical than life-like.

Miss Goodrich, who as Maddalena appears for the first time in Morosco pictures, is happily cast, and for one possessing comeliness, pleasing personality and an ability to act well there is no more needed to make success a certainty. Her characterization is faithful in the extreme and commendably consistent. Maddalena is the daughter of an Italian peasant. Mistreated and abused by her drink-mad father, Maddalena applies to an artist's studio for employment as a model. She is engaged by George Hale who visits Rome more for the fun of it than a serious desire to study art.

Maddalena and Hale become quite interested in each other. On the evening of July fourth, Hale and his studio partner, Foster, give a celebration. Maddalena is one of the guests at the affair. Hale receives a note from his fiancee in America telling him that she wishes to marry another, and that he is free. Hale, spurred on by such forces as pique, alcoholic excitation and the threats of Maddalena's father, resolves to marry the model immediately.

Of course he repents, but realizing that the girl is not to blame, makes the best of his impulsive act. His father learns the circumstances and refuses to forgive him. Then troublous times come. Maddalena, now a mother, again poses to support her ill husband and the child. Hale's father leaves New York to find his son. He returns with George and the child, having deceived both Maddalena and his son. It is not until a few years have passed that Hale and Maddalena are reunited.

party is over, Dr. Royce warns Freneau to discontinue his attentions to the young heiress, for Dr. Royce alone knows that Freneau first won Gloria's interest by a lie, that he was not her rescuer in the Indian episode. This scene between the two men at the party is a fine piece of acting.

After the party, the balance of the two reels covers a number of events in a rather disconnected manner, advancing the story, however. One of these points to a discreditable phase of Freneau's past life. Another deals with a sleigh ride which Gloria and Freneau take, when, as they stop at a wayside inn, Freneau repeats his proposal of marriage which he first made to Gloria in Florida five years ago. He is accepted.

Shortly after this, Gloria falls ill with pneumonia and Dr. Royce again comes to rescue her, this time from an incompetent physician. So we leave her, being cured of pneumonia by the fresh air method.

"THE DESTROYERS," a Blue Ribbon feature whose story is based on James Oliver Curwood's "Peter God," is an impressive five-reel melodrama, which in the dramatic force of certain of its situations gives evidence of able treatment on the part of the director, Ralph W. Ince. The action of the play is laid in the Northwest and the fashionable circles of New York. This is a contrast which seldom fails to impress, it imparts a certain virility to the play. This quality marks the picture Mr. Ince produced.

The snow scenes, especially the one which shows the dog-drawn sleigh far, very far in the distance, are good in more senses than one. Besides being pretty pictures, they advance the story's dramatic effect. For the most part, the photography is good. The interior settings, in regard to cabins and wealthy New York homes, are as pleasing as the outdoor locations mentioned above. The staging as a whole is good. Some newspaper headings used in the inserts could be greatly more newspaper-like, but as is so of one or two technical errors which we saw, forgot and had pointed out to us after the show, these are things which we will never allow to divert our attention and appreciation from the really good things a picture contains. "The Destroyers" has much to recommend it.

The story opens in the Northwest. Josephine McCloud, a New York woman, arrives after a trying journey at Fort McPherson. She is made welcome in the home of Philip Curtis, of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. While relating an experience which his mother insists Josephine must hear, he mentions the name of a man of strange habits. Josephine is at once interested in this Peter God. It transpires that Peter God is her husband and he left her and all his friends after an enemy had maliciously discredited him. "A Gutter Magdalene"

Lasky-Paramount Melodrama Features Fanny Ward. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

FANNY WARD is wholly pleasing and at times she touches a dramatic note as Maida, a country girl who has been lured to the city by an attractive crook and thereafter she is "A Gutter Magdalene." At least the title and some of the inserts tell us so. As a matter of fact, one must take their word for it, the action fails to show her as anything but a victim of circumstances who protests continually because her not legal husband persists in being crooked.

"A Gutter Magdalene" will appeal, it's that kind of a picture. The finish of its production, the characters' sympathy-winning qualities and the manner in which they are enacted, all combine to make this offering one whose success with picture-goers there is little doubt of. Fanny Ward, besides heading the cast technically does so actually. She is attractive as the beautifully gowned victim of Jack Morgan, and also as the Maida who has become a Salvation Army lass.

The spectator is carried to some quite striking melodramatic situations. Just how these situations are brought about is another matter. Looking back on it all, we fail to recall any one situation that was brought about with any amount of logic or consistence. If one starts to ask questions as to the whys and wherefores of the actions of several characters one realizes that fundamentally the motion picture screen has told us stories greatly superior. But—and now we come to the all important phase of the picture—interest is sustained and the story is so finely produced that the weak spots will vanish in thin air when "A Gutter Magdalene" is shown to its public.

Maida is the central character. Her husband, so to speak, brings a visitor to the city who has a number of thousands of dollars in cash about him, to their apartment for a friendly game of poker. Steve discovers, after losing heavily, that he is being cheated. He pulls a gun but he is tricked again and hit over the head with a bottle. Maida is disgusted with all this and she hurries out of the house, determined to leave Morgan. When Steve awakes he is wearing old clothes. He is arrested as a vagrant.

Maida joins the Salvation Army and while serving food at the barracks she encounters Steve, looking a bit the worse for his evenings in the parks and his old clothes. This is the beginning of a romance between the two. Morgan locates Maida and tries to force her to return. When he sees her with Steve he realizes that if they reach the police with their story he will be sent to jail. He decides to prevent this and does it by notifying Steve's employer, who believes his trusted assistant has stolen the money entrusted to him, and tells him just where Steve can be found. In view of the fact that the employer immediately has Steve arrested, Morgan's act seems very reasonable indeed; provided you accept the theory that all criminals lack mental balance. In the end Morgan is killed, Steve's money returned and his marriage with Maida a foregone conclusion.

George H. Melford produced "A Gutter Magdalene," and he is deserving of credit. The production leaves nothing to be desired and in many cases it leaves a lasting impression. Jack Dean, Charles West, Robert Bradbury, Billy Elmer and Gertrude Kellar all give satisfactory performances.

"Civilization"

Thomas H. Ince Presents Magnificent Spectacle. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

UNKIND things have been said about them but the fact remains that comparisons we always have with us. Thomas H. Ince's huge spectacle "Civilization" will for some short time to come be subject to comparison with the photoplay achievement whose fame is now a matter of film history, but "Civilization" has nothing to fear from the contrast of values, for every really great photographic accomplishment hitherto shown upon the motion picture screen is to be found in this magnificent presentation, and there are effects never attempted in the past which carry the picture to its ambitious goal.

Unquestionably the standards of motion picture production are immeasurably heightened by "Civilization." Countless numbers of its scenes are of such magnitude and power as to amaze a public long since blasé on the subject of pictures. The film confronts the spectator with scenes on the battlefield of a modern day, up-to-date naval warfare, a city entirely devastated by an attack from the air, interiors of a king's palace and views of a peaceful countryside, and all are so massive, so overwhelming as to leave one awed and impressed.

Connecting these quite stupendous scenes is a story by C. Gardner Sullivan. Blending allegory and realism with good effect, the story tells of a king who has expended his efforts and the power invested in him to build up a vast and wonderfully organized military force. In the beginning we see the king's subjects enjoying happiness and building firesides upon the wholesome prosperity of a nation content and at peace with the world. When a question arises between Wredpyrd and a neighbor nation its settlement is left in the hands of the ruler. Proud of his fighting machine, the army and navy whose efficiency reflects his own military genius, the king is helpless in the clutches of his ambition to shine before the world as a truly great general, and he decrees that Wredpyrd take up arms against brother men who march under a different banner.

From a state of true happiness to one of sorrow and appalling anguish, Wredpyrd with the news that war has been declared, is at once plunged into darkness. Count Ferdinand, who is a cousin to the queen, is the inventor of an under-sea boat. This engine of death is the pride of the now brutalized king. Ferdinand is in love with a girl of common birth and the king promises his consent to the marriage to encourage the commander of the mighty submarine to brilliant accomplishment with his murderous invention. Katherine, now a member of a society of women who protest against all this frightful strife, converts Ferdinand to the cause of humanity.

When he receives orders to attack a passenger ship carrying munitions, a vision of the result of obedience to his king comes to him. Ferdinand opens the sea-valves and all aboard the submarine but he are lost. For a long time he is at death's door. In this condition he encounters the Christ. In the body of Ferdinand, the Spirit of the Christ returns to his world of legalized murder and devastation.

This is the beginning of a series of incidents which bring the king to a realization of the horror for which he is responsible, and at the moment when one more vicious attack, certain of success, will bring him victory, he announces that the terms of peace are to be accepted, though he as a soldier is in no way glorified by this procedure.

"Civilization" concerns itself entirely with picturing war in its own horrifying colors. The causes of a war and a solution of their problems are not touched upon, it is enough that the picture shows what war means to the men, the women, and the children of a nation. Compared with its cost any possible gain, regardless of its importance to the nation, is insignificant. Thus "Civilization" brings home the fact that war is futile, and so in addition to being a picture whose wonderful scenes thrill the spectator its message is of importance.

The ship carrying women and children passengers which is torpedoed presents some of the most thrilling scenes ever projected. A whole city whose buildings have all the appearance of permanent structures is wrecked. That Mr. Ince spent a year producing "Civilization," that forty thousand people appeared from time to time in the production of the scenes, and that a complete city was built are all believable. Such statistics as these count for nothing if the finished picture fails but mean much if it is a success. As a photoplay spectacle "Civilization" is an emphatic success.

The players who appear in the leading roles are Herschel Mayall, Howard Hickman and Enid Markey. These three parts are admirably rendered. Prominent also in the cast are Lola May, George Fisher, J. Frank Burke, Charles K. French, Ethel Ullman, J. Barney Sherry and Jerome Storm, all of whom show ability in enacting their roles so adequately.

At the Criterion theater, New York, the picture is preceded by a prologue both appropriate and effective in creating the proper atmosphere. An attractive music score has been prepared by Victor L. Schertzinger.

"The Sheriff of Plumas"

Two-Reel "Mustang" Drama Released June 16. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE human interest forms the strongest appeal in this little drama of the west. The old sheriff who had once been an outlaw but had reformed and who slips back into his old life to aid his son, is a figure which will win sympathy. The events give opportunity for some very fine exterior scenes and the photography is beautiful. Charles Newton plays the sheriff, Jesse Martin; William Stowell is Roy, his son, and Helene Rosson is May, Roy's sweetheart. Madeline Fordyce appears as Mrs. Martin, and Harvey Clark is Homes, the villian of the play. Others in the cast are Harry McCabe, Burr Ritchie and Ashton Dearholt. The acting in the play is good.

now the sheriff of his district, decides to send his son, Roy, to college. But when the boy becomes one of a group of spendthrifts, the father is unable to provide him with enough money. At this time, Homes, who had been a former partner in crime of Martin's, reappears in the country and Martin, instead of arresting him, aids him in a robbery, in order to send the money to Roy. Homes continues his career of lawlessness and Martin does not dare check him.

Later Roy, realizing the evil of his ways, returns home. He becomes a deputy sheriff, his father's aid. Martin and Homes, in a quarrel, are both killed. Roy had learned his father's secret, but Mrs. Martin and Mae and the rest of the world believed that he died in the performance of his duty, a hero.

"The Perils of Divorce"

World-Peerless Five-Reel Release. Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman

EDWIN AUGUST is at his best when directing rapid-fire melodrama. In this production he is limited by the story which does not allow him a generous scope for action. The play is a society drama more or less inclined to be talky. In any other hands than those of Mr. August it would have been a talky play. But Edwin knows the value of action in a picture, and he has let no opportunity slip by to put action into it. The result is a snappy domestic drama which is relieved of any conventionality by the speed with which it is done.

Edna Wallace Hopper and Frank Sheridan are co-stars. They appear as a society couple who are happily married, even though the husband is considerably older than his wife. Their happiness is destroyed, however, by the scheming of a false friend, a woman who had formerly been a chum of the wife and who was bitterly disappointed not to have won her friend's husband for her own.

The loving couple are separated by false evidence. The husband eventually marries the false woman, while his first wife drifts downward until she becomes a dancer in a Chinatown cabaret. Later her husband's second wife elopes with another man and leaves a note explaining that the first wife was innocent. The misguided husband quickly sends to Chinatown for his first wife, and the picture ends with them happy once more.

"The Perils of Divorce" is not the most fitting title that could have been chosen for the picture. The peril materialized some time before the divorce, in the form of a false friend. Therefore it would seem more fitting to have called it "The Perils of Friendship." In some ways divorce is too good an institution to be misrepresented and made to stand the responsibility for the work of a schemer. Divorce may have its evil side, but why defame it unjustly?

There are some very fine effects in this production. The most novel one of all is that of an ice skating scene at night with fireworks. The scene is toned a dark blue and tinted pink, which makes a very beautiful effect, and with the fireworks and side lighting it is one of the prettiest photographic results that has been obtained in pictures in a long while. The interior scenes are extremely rich and tasty. The exterior scenes were taken on a beautiful estate on the Hudson river. Glimpses of the river are had occasionally. In the skating scene Miss Hopper takes her life in her hands when she skates through a hole in the ice and remains submerged in ice water for some few minutes.

Miss Hopper and Frank Sheridan are ideal in their respective parts. As a happy mated couple representing May and December, they are real convincing. Their happiness seems like real happiness, and their sorrow is real sorrow. As a happy married couple they are assisted in their work by little Miss Carroll, who played their half-grown daughter in a charming manner.

Taken as a whole it is a mighty absorbing domestic drama; one without any glaring faults and with many admirable points in its favor. It will be strong enough to hold any well seasoned moving picture audience, and is almost certain to give satisfaction in any kind of a theater.

"Convicted for Murder"

Two-Reel "Flying A" Drama Released June 12. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A WELL presented demonstration of the way in which a net of circumstantial evidence might be woven about an innocent man is contained in this play, which Thomas Ricketts directed from a story by Anthony W. Caldewey. The sequence of events is clear and is worked out in an interesting manner. A capable cast interprets the characters, Edward Coxen playing the lead as Elliott Reynolds, the man falsely convicted for murder. The other players are George Field, Lizette Thorne, Charles Newton, Jack Farrell and Harvey Clark.

Elliott Reynolds, a newspaper reporter, is sent to investigate charges of graft against Gordon Helm. Elliott, who is engaged to marry Helm's daughter, Louise, gives Helm warning of his paper's intentions. Helm does not believe Elliott can or will use the information against him and he is both alarmed and angry when he later learns the extent to which Elliott has gone. He and the reporter have a quarrel and Elliott leaves the house, to return a minute later to telephone, when he finds Helm dead of a bullet wound. The butler tells of the quarrel and Helm's friends try to have Elliott convicted for murder. While he is on trial and when things are going against him, a note is discovered in which Helm explained his reason for suicide.

Although not very convincing when analyzed, the story will prove satisfying to the average audience.

"The Fireman"

Second Mutual-Chaplin Comedy Released June 12. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE FIREMAN" shows Charlie Chaplin at his best. This the second Mutual-Chaplin release is diverting all the time and in several instances its fun is decided enough to justify it being termed an uproarious two-reel comedy. In "The Fireman"

Charlie Chaplin and Edna Purviance in "The Fireman."

the comedian whose distinctive acting has won him such amazing popularity brings to bear all the funny mannerisms and tricks for which he is noted. He includes a little of the "serious" acting he does so well and which never fails to have an effect of pointing the comic business immediately following.

The picture starts well. It is not unusual for a comedy to travel well toward the end of the first reel before the spectator responds naturally to its mirth. But the first few scenes of "The Fireman" mark the beginning of the fun which continues through to the end.

The sliding pole, a fire engine which comes in handy around lunch time, it being only necessary to turn a spigot to have coffee, rich in color and smoking hot, and other aids numerous and varied assist Chaplin in provoking laughter. He is the driver of the engine. Morning practice finds him still asleep and when he does appear the captain takes measures to discipline the delinquent. Discipline consists of a few kicks, some blows, several of which go astray, and threats to be really rough should it happen again. The captain's sweetheart and her father call at the engine house. Charlie is quite romantic and his admiring glances are not discouraged by the smartly dressed young lady. The father plans to collect his insurance, promising to give his daughter in marirage to the captain if he refuses to answer the alarm that night. All is in readiness when a real fire starts. The company, after many delays, arrives at the scene of conflagration. The father's plan fails. He starts the fire and walks from the house, quite ignorant that his pretty daughter is trapped in an upper room. Charlie proves himself a hero, saving the beauty in distress. He pretends prostration, but when the others hurry off for water, he comes to and walks off with the girl.

Edna Purviance, like many of the others in the cast has nothing much to do. In her scenes with Chaplin she is good and altogether she makes a fitting prize for one so courageous as the fireman of Chaplin. The settings and all properties merit special mention. Apparently nothing was spared in staging the picture. It is not necessary to assume the role of prophet to conclude that "The Fireman," wherever it is shown, will be unreeled to the audible delight of screen patrons.

"Who's Guilty?"

Fifth and Sixth Releases in Pathe-Arrow Series. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THERE is a certain grim propriety to the word's "Who's Guilty?" which fade into the closing scenes of the fifth and sixth issues in this series produced by Arrow and released by Pathe. This may be taken to mean that "Sold Out" and "Sowing the Wind," the fifth and sixth releases in the series, are up to the standard set by the first few "Who's Guilty?" plays, and in the event of this being the case the proper impression has been conveyed, for the two dramas in question are admirable from every standpoint.

Though treated from different angles, both "Sold Out" and "Sowing the Wind" involve parents who interfere in the love affairs and marriages of their daughters directly in the fatal question. "Sold Out" is the story of a girl who marries the man of her choice. He is not wealthy and on this account alone the mother is not in sympathy with her daughter. Leila and her husband depart for the West. He owns some mining property out there. Accustomed to every comfort in the home and much society Leila is not thoroughly satisfied with the new order of things. They live in a shack and though the mine gives every promise, no metal has as yet been unearthed.

Tom consents to her paying a visit to her mother and father. Again in New York, Leila frequently meets the wealthy Halsey Brent. She tells him that she is willing to sell her stock in her husband's mine for ten thousand dollars. Brent has the claim investigated and finding that it is good property, buys the stock, presumably out of friendship. Tom, having discovered valuable ore, comes to New York to answer her mother's letter pleading with him to free Leila so she may marry a man who can give her a home such as she has been brought up in. He arrives in time to witness a scene in which Leila denounces Brent, and, angered, he attacks the latter. Their scuffle about the room causes Leila to fall down a flight of stairs. The fall causes her death.

"Sowing the Wind" tells of a girl who is courted by two brothers. Her favor gradually turns toward the younger and less prosperous of the two. Both Hugh and Henry are in the employ of her father. Henry is the more efficient business man, and he is favored by the father. One day Hugh and Marjorie are secretly married. That very day a collection of valuable papers disappear and Hugh is accused by Turnbull. Though he is innocent, his brother and Marjorie advise him to hide until the affair has been settled. To prevent an embarrassing situation, Henry tells the father that he and Marjorie were married.

To elude the detectives, Hugh arranges matters to make it appear as though he committed suicide. This news, generally believed, greatly shocks Henry and Marjorie. Shortly after this the papers are found where they fell and were concealed through carelessness on Hugh's part. Some few months elapse. Marjorie now feels that she really loves Henry and they are married without making their former deception known. On this day Hugh returns. Acting hastily upon the word of one who is honest but misinformed, he gives way to anger and resentment. The result is that the girl's father is accidentally shot and his brother accused of the deed.

In these pictures Anna Nilsson and Tom Moore are seen to good advantage. These two players are splendidly suited to play opposite each other, and individually their performances please greatly. The supporting casts are entirely good.

"The Magazine on the Screen"

The Latest Paramount Pictograph Deals with Timely Subjects. Reviewed by George W. Graves

AMONG the interesting things to be seen in the latest Paramount Pictograph weekly magazine are views of the making of our huge guns, which give a correct idea of the skill and vast energy expended in their construction. A sub-title points out the government's appropriation for the manufacture of these monster weapons of defense as being too scanty and suggests that the maintenance of men in army posts drains too much of the government's funds.

This picture also contains an interesting test for the mind in rearrangement, after which, if the spectator proves efficient, he is told that he is eligible for an executive position. Another interesting section of this offering is that which shows the exercises employed by Madame Montessori in the development of children, mind and body.

The most recent Burton Holmes travelogue brings some of the grotesque peculiarities of distant lands within easy reach of the photoplay enthusiast and shows him many things, which, although serious enough in their execution, prove laughable to us people in the Western Hemisphere. With Mr. Holmes and his party we visit the Sultan of Sulu in his domain near the Philippine Islands and behold some of the customs and people. Seen from the American eye, the dress of these natives is only rivaled in its grotesquesness by their snake-like dance, half Egyptian and half Sulu, which concludes the picture.

The ludicrous expressions that can be delineated upon cartoon characters, especially animals, and the disproportionate antics of these drawn forms, get some of the heartiest laughs in the comedy field. Not an exception to the rule is "Farmer Alfalfa's Tentless Circus," a riot of fun in which an obstinate mule is lord of all he surveys by virtue of his forty horsepower kick. But afterwards we see the downfall of this insurgent beast in a very emphatic manner.

'The Stained Pearl;' 'An Old Man's Folly'

Two Knickerbocker Features Released on General Program. Reviewed by George W. Graves

A THREE-REELER which contains as much action as many a five-reel subject is "The Stained Pearl," a Knickerbocker star feature, produced by Horkheimer Brothers and directed by Fred Huntley. Its release date is June 9. Murderous villainy runs riot over the greed for an enormous pearl which is ultimately lost, as are the lives of four men who struggle in their turn for its possession. Tyranny on the high seas is well depicted in this drama. The story is simple, but effective as a three-reel offering.

Henry King is featured as Captain Ray, into which character he puts all the brutality and intolerance of a sea master of the old school. The rest of the cast includes Katherine Burke, Harry Southard, Charles Dudley, George Theilan, Frank Erlanger and Richard Johnson.

Two men having been killed for the possession of a great pearl, the gem is in the hands of the last murderer, Pietro. The latter ships on Captain Ray's vessel, where his prize is discovered and coveted by the mate. The captain catches the two fighting over the jewel and from then on he schemes to get it himself. Thinking he has killed his mate, Captain Ray hides his body in a huge chest.

In the ship's hold is the lover of the captain's daughter, who has been warned by the captain to keep away from the girl. He succors the mate and takes him to the hold. Captain Ray, now in possession of the pearl, hides it one night during sleep in the barrel of his gun. Later the captain encounters the mate, and, frenzied at what he deems an apparition, fires at and kills him, with the pearl as ammunition. Then Ray goes over the gunwale and sinks below the waves, and—the pearl is lost forever.

"An Old Man's Folly" is a picture of the same brand as the above, also in three reels, featuring Daniel Gilfether. Others in its cast are Marguerite Nichols, Les Willis, Richard Johnson, Phyllis Grey and Frank Erlanger. This picture is released June 16. The story deals in a true-to-life way with the weakness of an old man, who gives his wife's costly necklace to an adventuress and then employs a private detective. The latter proves untrue to his profession and, after discovering the real thief, joins the forces of the adventuress' pals in blackmailing the old man.

The story ends auspiciously for the weak father, however, for his daughter's lover brings to bear some detective work of his own on the detective's methods. The lover enters the detective's office just as the latter is about to extort a blackmail check from the old man, and right then and there the detective is the recipient of the worst drubbing he ever received.

Pietro demands the pearl.

Factory Girls Over-Abused in Films?

And now from another corner of the country's commerce comes a complaint against pictures. The first group of business men to feel the power of the moving dramas was the liquor interests. It was claimed, strange to say, that whenever saloon scenes were shown they turned the people against all thirst institutions. In other words, taxation and misrepresentation was the complaint.

This time it's the garment makers. These manufacturers claim it is an injustice to them for the people to be shown, via film, factory girls worked to the bone, discharged, and generally abused. At their recent convention in Chicago, the National Association of Garment Manufacturers adopted drastic resolutions against "the untruthful presentation in factories." Copies of these protests were ordered sent to each of the film-producing companies.

We now look for the studios to present melodramas showing factory girls working under kind and generous bosses and with such conveniences as a free moving picture show in the luxurious rest room of the factory each noon hour.

Five well-known Triangle exhibitors of San Francisco and its outlying towns were recent visitors at the new quarter million dollar producing plant of Thomas H. Ince at Culver City. They are H. C. of their next production, "One Cylinder Sam." Several of the prominent members of the Lockwood-Allison company with them in the north include Lester Cuneo, the well-known heavy leading man. Beginning with "One Cylinder Sam," and in the future, Henry Otto, a newcomer to the Metro forces, will direct Mr. Lockwood and Miss Allison. He was formerly with the American company, releasing on the Mutual program. Heretofore these stars have appeared on the Metro program under the Quality Pictures Corporation, but hereafter the Lockwood-Allison features will be released by the Yorke Film Corporation, a newly organized producing company. Fred J. Balshofer is president of the Metro-Yorke company.

Upon their return from Thousand Islands the two players will go to California, where they will probably be permanently located. "The Masked Rider," which Mr. Lockwood and Miss Allison have just completed, was released on June 12.

Mabel Taliaferro has signed an engagement with the Metro-Rolfe to appear in at least eleven more five-part productions, the first of which will be "God's Half Acre," to be released early in July. Edwin Carewe will direct all the Taliaferro productions.

Edward Brennan, leading man in many Metro wonderplays, will next be seen on the screen in "The Quitter," the Metro-Rolfe release for July 10, in which Lionel Barrymore also appears. Mr. Brennan will shortly go to Indianapolis to appear in person at the various theaters where Metro wonderplays are presented.

"The Purple Lady," a five-part Metro-Rolfe production in which Ralph Herz is starred and Irene Howley is featured, will be released on the Metro program June 26. This play, which will introduce Mr. Herz to the silent drama, is a picturization of the play of the same name by Sydney Rosenfeld. "The Purple Lady" was produced under the direction of George A. Lossey, who recently joined the Metro directing forces.

Monitor Company Starts Work

The Monitor Film Manufacturing Company, the new Washington, D. C., motion picture company, has started work on five-reel films from the pens of famous American authors. These pictures are to be made in New York City under the supervision of Frank P. Donovan, formerly a film manufacturer of note, and who produced the Manhattan Features, Fad Comedies, Harvard Comedies and the Arrax Western pictures.

To date many popular players of the stage and screen have been signed to play in Monitor films, among them being Devore Palmer, former Triangle and Edison star; Florence Wright, who comes to the Monitor from Essanay; William Sadler, formerly leading juvenile of the Universal; Walter Stohl, scenario editor and author of standing; George Ross, recently a Metro character man, and one of the foremost feature directors.

The New York office of the company is at 231-233 Tenth avenue, from where the pictures will be handled in the East. This company will also establish a studio in Washington and in Pennsylvania, where the comedy films will be made.

Exchange Owners Convene

With a view of increasing the output of Ivan productions, the exchange owners from all over the country are coming to New York, where the executive and production departments of the Ivan company are located.

Among those already in New York are: William Hershberg, president of the General Feature Film Company of Chicago; Mayer Silverman, of the Liberty Film Renting Company of Pittsburgh; Harry A. Samwick, of the Merit Film Corporation of New York; E. W. Lynch, of the E. W. Lynch Enterprises of Boston, and Mr. H. Schwalbe, of the Electric Theater Supply Company of Philadelphia.

Others who will be present are: C. D. Struble of the Monarch Feature Film Company of Kansas City, Missouri; A. T. Lambson, of the Reelplays Feature Service of Seattle, Washington; H. L. Clamas, of the Standard Film Service of Cleveland; J. F. Cubberly, of the Zenith Feature Film Company of Duluth; L. F. Santikos, of the Central Feature Film Company of Waco, Texas, and A. M. Graham, of the Queen City Feature Service of Birmingham, Alabama.

Shaw Grows With Vitagraph

Frank Shaw, pilot of the News Service department of the Greater Vitagraph Company, is the youngest publicity manager in the film business in years. But judging from the point of service, Mr. Shaw is one of the pioneers. He joined the Vitagraph Company of America five years ago. At that time the Flatbush studio boasted of four stages on which one and two-reel pictures were turned out with peace, contentment and profit. The present turmoil of features and programs was then on the other side of the horizon.

Mr. Shaw started with Vitagraph in the publicity department under Sam Spedon, doing general utility work about the office when not running errands. He has remained in this department up to the present, but his duties have changed somewhat. While the Vitagraph monthly bulletin which carried the heading, "Life Portrayals," was being gotten out, Mr. Shaw handled all of the half-tones, arranged some of the copy, assisted in the make-up, and kept track of things generally.

He has contributed in some way or other to all of Vitagraph's outdoor publicity stunts. During John W. Grey's recent reign in the Flatbush studio's service department, he acted as Mr. Grey's assistant. Mr. Shaw is suspected of having carried on certain negotiations with Dan Cupid. If rumor is backed by fact a brand new bridegroom will be in charge of Vitagraph's publicity and advertising about the end of this month.

McGowan of Signal Wins Contest

To J. P. McGowan of the Signal Film Corporation has been awarded the honor of winning the popularity contest conducted through the columns of the Minneapolis Journal.

Although Mr. McGowan's name was not entered until the contest was well under way and the other contestants had a good start still he won out over such worthy rivals as Francis X. Bushman, J Warren Kerrigan, Carlyle Blackwell, Harold Lockwood, William Faversham, Wallace Reid, Henry Walthall and Herbert Rawlinson.

Mr. McGowan is now at work playing the title role as well as directing the production of "Whispering Smith," the novel by Frank H. Spearman which is being filmed as a ten-reel feature with Helen Holmes in the principal feminine role.

One feature of this production, credit for which is due to the director, is the scene of a burning bridge with a train dashing upon it and a most thrilling wreck resulting. When this scene was staged hundreds of spectators gathered to watch it and their enthusiasm bid well for the thrill to be interpolated in the screen play.

Re-enters Producing Field

Leon J. Rubinstein, the Thanhouser publicity director, has resigned.

Rubinstein has been at New Rochelle for almost two years, since Edwin Thanhouser returned from Europe. He engineered Mr. Thanhouser's re-introduction to the industry and then started a series of spectacular publicity stunts. While at the helm in New Rochelle

L. J. Rubinstein.

"Ruby" made a specialty of stunt work and in the past year he gathered in a number of scoops.

Before taking up his work at Thanhouser's, Ruby was in the producing business, as head of the Ruby Twinplex Studio, which he built. When the time came he sold out, which later transpired to be wisdom on his part. Now he will practically resume where he left off, but declines to give any details of his plans except that he will show the trade an entirely new style of production.

Rubinstein leaves New Rochelle with the best wishes of the company and the Board of Directors. Mr. Thanhouser's special token of appreciation is his request that "Ruby" name his successor.

Bluebird Grows in Chicago

I. Van Ronkle, Chicago manager of the Bluebird Film Corporation, has just returned from a flying trip to New York, where he made arrangements for an increase in his standing order. Business has been so good and contracts coming in so fast, that the standing order of April and May almost had to be doubled for June.

While in New York, Mr. Van Ronkle saw the Bluebird releases for June: Tyrone Power and Lois Weber in "The Eye of God," Louise Lovely in "Bobbie of the Ballet," "The Three Godfathers," and "Shoes."

Mr. Van Ronkle, Chicago manager of the Bluebird Film Corporation, has signed contracts with the Ascher Brothers to show a Bluebird release in all their houses. These houses are as follows: The President, Oakland Square, Frolic, Lakeside, Calo, Cosmopolitan, Columbus, and the Terminal.

Cupid Gets Bill Barry

Mr. William L. Barry, formerly Bill Barry, crossed over into the great matrimonial beyond on Thursday, May 25. The bride was Miss Nan Jacobus of Montclair, New Jersey. After the ceremony, which was performed in a church in downtown New York, the party, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Barry, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Powell, Wen Milligan and A. MacArthur, had dinner at the Hotel Astor.

Mr. Barry has for years been a prominent figure in New York film circles. He has held several offices in the Screen Club, and directed the advertising and publicity of the Nicholas Power Company for over two years, leaving that concern but a short time ago to take an executive position with the Monroe Press. Mr. and Mrs. Barry have taken a home in Bayside, L. I.

Summer Lasky Plays

The studios of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company at Hollywood will hum all summer. Fannie Ward has placed her name to a new Lasky contract for two years. Miss Ward is the star in the photoplay, "The Gutter Magdalene," which will be shown for the first time in June. Victor Moore's latest production is entitled "The Clown." Cleo Ridgely and Wallace Reid, who were co-stars in "The Golden Chance," "The Love Mask" and other photoplays, will appear in "The Selfish Woman," and Blanche Sweet will be the star in "The Dupe."

with Metro, has joined the Ivan Film Productions.

Miss Snow is remembered as the one who, among many, was chosen as leading lady to Francis X. Bushman when he became the featured Metro player. Her ability won so much favorable commendation that she was starred alone.

Miss Snow's first role under the Ivan banner will be "The Faded Flower," which was written especially to feature her by Ivan Abramson.

It is believed from a perusal of the synopsis that the dramatic material in this new story will add new laurels to Miss Snow's fame as a delineator of emotional parts. On its completion, the new feature will be released through the Ivan exchanges as the scheduled regular monthly release for July.

The Elite Theater was opened at Lincoln, Nebraska, recently, with L. M. Graham as manager. Feature pictures only will be shown.

The small boys and girls of Bentaville, Arkansas, don't need any jitneys to see the movies at that place. A local theater man has posted a sign over his theater which reads: "Admission 100 dead flies, or 10 cents in cash. Every Friday night one hundred of the swatted pests admits one boy or girl to the theater, and the one bringing in the largest number of dead flies gets five extra admissions for his or her trouble."

Picture films that are exhibited in Oklahoma after the next legislature meets are very likely to contribute to help support the state and municipal governments to extent of about 3 per cent of the gross receipts of such exhibitions. This theory of reaching a source of revenue has been evolved by a high official and is understood to be well thought of by a large number of the members of the legislature. Of course, the proposal to tax films exhibited in Oklahoma to the extent of 3 per cent of the gross receipts will bring a clamor of protest from the film concerns and exhibitors, but in the end the people who attend the movies may have to pay more for the privilege.

New Spectacles to Come From Dixon Studio

Hollywood Plant Where "The Fall of a Nation" Was Made Is to Produce Big Novel Films

SPECULATION as to the future of the Dixon studios and laboratories, Sunset boulevard and Western avenue, Hollywood, California, has been set at rest by Thomas Dixon, who is now presenting—at the Liberty Theater, New York—his mighty preparedness spectacle, "The Fall of a Nation." Mr. Dixon is so well satisfied with the results of his collaboration with Victor Herbert that he has decided to devote the new plant exclusively to the production of big operatic spectacles. He announces that Bartley Cushing, his assistant in the staging of "The Fall of a Nation," and the managing director of the production department at Hollywood, is now preparing plans for a new spectacular feature along entirely novel lines. The making of small features is not contemplated at this studio.

The plot on which the plant is situated was formerly an orange grove. Part of the grove still remains as a screen for the Sunset boulevard side of the studio. Overlooking this grove are the mechanical departments and dressing rooms. Adjoining the latter are the stages, one a glass enclosed affair and the other open but equipped with improved diffusing curtains. The rear of the lot is reserved for exterior scenes. A replica of old Mulberry Bend, New York, was constructed there for "The Fall of a Nation."

Towering above the mechanical departments is the chalet top, in which there is room for four complete paint frames. Along the Western avenue side are the executive offices, leading down to the laboratories. This latter department is said to be one of the most complete in any motion picture studio. In charge is William C. Thompson, chief photographer, a graduate of Columbia University, and a member of the American Chemical Society and other organizations of chemists. Under his direction the capacity of the laboratories is 500,000 feet of film weekly. Here as many prints of "The Fall of a Nation" as may be required can be turned out as rapidly as desired.

Where "The Birth of a Nation" and "The Fall of a Nation" were made.

S. Hart, and a picture recently completed with the same actor.

Nona Thomas is a blue-eyed blonde. The chief trait of her character is sincerity. She is a sister of Ollie Kirkby of the Kalem Company.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long as in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

TEXAS FLICKERS

By S. G. Parker

Special Correspondent for Motography.

PAUL RENO, former vaudeville artist, is opening an airdome at Brownwood, Texas. He will use pictures for a time, then vaudeville with film.

Miss Alatia Marton, of Dallas, one of the beauties in the Old Mill Theater beauty contest last year, was one of the eleven girls in the United States and Canada selected by Photoplay Magazine in its "Beauty and Brains" contest which recently closed. By winning in this contest, Miss Marton will get her expenses paid to New York and a trial before the camera for the World Film Corporation.

Twenty-four representatives of the film industry marched in the big Preparedness Parade in Dallas, May 30. The parade was more than eight miles long.

Ned E. Depinet, manager of the Consolidated Exchange, and John de Stefano of the Queen Theater, Dallas, marched with the Rotary Club section.

In the "Moving Picture Industry" section, Jas. B. Kelly of the Consolidated acted as captain, and the following privates were put through many flag manoeuvers by Captain Kelly: L. B. Remy, manager of the Triangle; E. F. Walker, Harry F. Botto, both of Triangle; C. A. Meade, manager, and Messrs. Murphy, Dugger and Fulgham of the V-L-S-E; Jim Hill and Wm. Lowe, of the Alliance; C. A. Clegg, manager, and Messrs. McIlheran, Clegg, Walker, Giles and Rust, of the Mutual; W. M. Byrd, of the Fox Exchange, and A. W. Plues.

All along the three-mile march, Remy and Plues kept the girls on the sidewalks giggling with their "incorrect imitations of Hart, Chaplin, Mary Pickford and other players."

M. S. White, formerly manager of the Mutual's office in Fort Smith, has succeeded H. A. Bandy as manager of that concern in Oklahoma City. White has been going upward for the past three years, since he started in the film business as "roustabout" in the United Exchange in Dallas.

The Hippodrome Amusement Company of Fort Worth will increase the capital stock to $200,000 and will erect theaters in Wichita Falls, Corsicana, Waxahachie and Austin, Texas. Each of these houses will be modern in every detail. Pierre C. Levy is secretary and treasurer.

THE ACTOR AND SOCIETY

By Thomas Chatterton

The public of today has placed upon every actor a big responsibility for which he will be held to strict accountability. That responsibility is to entertain.

I recall the following as an early society, this latter word used of course in the broad sense. There must be in the formation of a successful actor a combination of natural gifts rather than assumed gifts, for audiences have become English writer's definition of an actor:

Thomas Chatterton—American.

An actor is in the capacity of a steward to every living muse, and of an executor to every departed one; the playwright digs up the ore, he sifts it from the dross, refines and purifies it for the mint; the actor sets the stamp upon it and makes it current in the world.

I believe the motion picture is responsible for the demand that the actor of today be natural, for picture patrons desire to see the actor as he is rather than as he is "made up" to be. In other words, the motion picture permits an intimacy between the screen artist and the audience which does not seem to pertain to the speaking stage.

Thus the actor who wins does so without resorting to the sorry practice of tricks or to the continual striking of preconcerted attitudes.

Of course, the educated must understand that there cannot be any adhesion either of vice or virtue to the real character. It is a certainty that cruelty, wickedness or cowardice will not become part of an actor's nature merely because he professionally portrays such unaimiable types. The vividness with which motion pictures carry the action of a story is liable to afford more opportunity for comparison between the actor personally and professionally than is the case on the speaking stage.

In "The Secret of the Submarine" there is a balance of characters such as is seldom selected in a photoplay. In my part of Lieutenant Hope I am afforded abundant dramatic moments and some stunts that will surely give to the new big picture a fascination to those vast audiences which like to feel a "grip o' the heart."

Triangle Plays

are Marvels of Production

Motion Pictures are successes or failures because the public patronizes them or withholds patronage. If a picture achieves financial success it is either because it is a bad picture depending on crude sensationalism, or because it is a good picture made according to high ethical standards by talented men and women with a definite purpose behind it.

TRIANGLE PLAYS are of this latter class. Their aim has been to portray the big things of life, to bring to the screen the greatest possible quality and quantity of entertainment until now TRIANGLE PLAYS have earned first place where good things are appreciated by merit alone.

TRIANGLE PLAYS are the very latest word in the production of motion pictures. They show you miles upon miles of wonderful natural country; peoples you have read about only in books.

They don't hold you to one set of emotions, either, but rush you swiftly through the gamut of them all. They give comedy, tragedy, laughter, tears, all in rapid succession. Their magic carries you delightfully through space and time.

You spend an hour among the marvels of the beautiful north—its ice and snow and wonderful scenery. Then, whisk! You are on the blazing Mexican battlefields holding your breath as a horde of savage soldiers descends on a defenseless city. Another change and you roar with laughter at the ridiculous complications of some Keystone Comedy.

If you are an exhibitor and are not running TRIANGLE PLAYS why not drop us a line for information regarding their presentation?

Boosters Meeting for National Convention

LEE A. OCHS OF NEW YORK CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENCY OF LEAGUE

CHICAGO and New York, especially the former, are doing their share to make the coming show of the Motion Pictures Exhibitors' League of America a huge success. But there are many cities in the country in which motion picture accessory manufacturers, particularly, are located which have not been heard from as yet.

In order that the show which is to be held at the Coliseum, Chicago, July 12 to 18, inclusive, may be absolutely representative William J. Sweeney, chairman of the convention and show committee, has issued an appeal to the presidents of each of the state organizations requesting that they appoint committees immediately to call upon the manufacturers who have not contracted for space and see that they are signed up immediately.

It also is the opinion of Mr. Sweeney that the larger showmen of the country should be approached and requested to register with the manufacturers and become space purchasers. It has been suggested that a few of the syndicate houses take large enough space to erect a small theater which might be rented to the accessory men for demonstrations during the show and that admission be charged during the demonstrations which would be accompanied by a regular motion picture performance. Half of the proceeds might be presented to the League and the balance go toward defraying the expense of installing and running the model theater.

Lee Ochs, president Exhibitors' League of New York.

The Chicago showmen have obtained the co-operation of all of the daily newspapers of Chicago, each of which will run a contest to advertise the show. The idea of one of the unique contests to be run is so good that one Chicago manufacturer wanted to claim it as his own, but he was informed that it would be his after the show got through with it.

The show Boosters' Committee got busy last week, and answering the call of Chairman H. L. Lieberthal of the Executive Board, met at the Sherman House and appointed Alfred Hamburger, of the Hamburger enterprises, as chairman of the committee.

Aaron Jones, of Jones, Linick & Schaefer, has donated the use of the Colonial theater for a boosters' meeting to be held on June 28, at which all of the middle west motion picture showmen will be asked to attend to learn first hand just what is being done. It is expected that among the men who will address the meeting will be Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, George K. Spoor, William N. Selig, S. S. Hutchinson, David Griffith and several other persons prominent in the manufacturing end of the business.

It is planned to make the June 28 meeting a real get-together gathering where showman will meet manufacturer and where everything will be discussed in a friendly manner. There has been a suggestion that the outcome of this meeting will be the formation of a "Manufacturers' Section" of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America in which the manufacturers and accessory men will be eligible to membership.

If this "Manufacturers' Section" is formed many of the difficulties of a national organization of manufacturers now being experienced in New York will be overcome and the entire business will work in harmony.

One of the men heartily in favor of the formation of the "Manufacturers' Section" is Alfred Hamburger, who has donated his entire office force to assist in making the show a success.

The sheet and half-sheet posters advertising the show were distributed on June 18. They were made by the American Show Printing Company, of Milwaukee, and are works of art. The railroads entering Chicago have distributed hundreds of them.

With the date of the annual convention getting closer the politics of the league are warming up. Three men have announced their candidacy for the office of national president. They are:

Frank J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Indiana.
Lee A. Ochs, New York City.
Fred J. Herrington, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. Rembusch stands on a platform as outlined in an article written by him which appeared in MOTOGRAPHY two weeks ago. In it he pointed with pride to his twelve-year record as showman and manufacturer. He is a believer in curtailing competition and believes that plans to prevent ruinous competition may be formulated. He has worked along scientific methods and knows just what proportion of income is spent on motion picture admissions. He would limit motion picture theaters on this scientific analysis. He believes that efforts to promote the two dollar admission motion picture theater is an error and he is frank in declaring that it is a "five cent business." He declares most of the motion picture theater proprietors are giving the people more than the patrons pay for and he believes in getting back to a sane policy based on careful bookkeeping.

But above all things Mr. Rembusch stands on the plank that showman and manufacturer should work together and in harmony. The showman is in close touch with the show goer and the showman is the man to suggest the kind of films the manufacturer should make.

TO THE PRESIDENTS OF THE STATE BRANCHES OF THE M. P. E. L. OF AMERICA.

The members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America are not working as they should with the Illinois branch to make the July show a success. Please appoint committees in each of your municipalities to call personally upon motion picture and accessory manufactures and persuade them to send in their contracts immediately for show space. Many contracts have been closed by mail but a personal solicitation from men with whom they do business will have much more weight than a letter.—William J. Sweeney, Chairman.

Since writing his article for Motography, Mr. Rembusch has received letters from all parts of the country, of which the following are samples:

June 5, 1916.

F. J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Ind.

My Dear Rembusch: It would give me much pleasure if the National League would elect you its president. I doubt if there is another man in the United States who could fill that office like F. J. Rembusch.

I have read your article in the June number of Motography. Many things you say there in your different lessons are mighty good. I must take exception, however, to your lesson number nine, because I disagree with you that this is a five-cent business; that is the price regulation depends on where and how your theater is situated.

Take, for instance, Philadelphia, with the theaters located, as you know, so close together on Market street. I will take a ten cent program and give you a five cent program and I will do more business than you. I will get the better class and I will make more money and make it easier than you because the manufacturers will not give you my program to run for five cents and I don't want yours.

I agree with you that at present there is very little common sense used in the selection in programs. I will not show a picture in any of our theaters that I have not reviewed. Organization and obedience is what we need in the motion picture industry. The manufacturer, the exhibitor and the exchangeman, who is only a figurehead, must get together for the betterment of this business.

Some time ago I read an article signed by Carl Laemmle, saying that in your theaters you have adopted the policy of showing only program features. If you are running five cent theaters you could do nothing better than to adopt this policy because I believe that the Universal is the best five cent program on the market.

So much for that. I don't mean this letter as a guide post in any way to tell you how to run your business, but it depends largely where you are and who your patrons are. Here in Philadelphia at the Arcadia theater we charge twenty-five cents —fifteen cents in the afternoon and twenty-five at night.

We are in direct opposition to the largest theaters in the city. We get the best people; and the same holds good at the Victoria and Stanley theaters. These are first line houses and their programs are pre-reviewed even to the news subjects. Absolutely nothing is shown in these houses unless it passes our censorship.

My religion regarding the motion picture industry is—fewer theaters, higher prices, longer runs. I know that you and every one else would rather run a theater that ran a program for a week or change every three days than one that changed every day. The motion picture manufacturers are running out of ideas. Now, that is not my own opinion, I am quoting the exact words of William A. Brady, who in a personal interview with me told me that his scenario editors were reading on an average 300 scripts a week and it was absolutely impossible to find anything new. Now, if we are going to use up all their stuff by changing our shows every day, where will we land?

I hope they will nominate and elect you as the national president. I myself am not a member of the league because some years ago I was asked to resign because I agitated newspaper advertising. I became very sore and have not attended a league meeting since. I am not in favor of censorship of any kind, because I believe a manager that will willfully offend any of his patrons is a fool.

If I can be of any good by word of mouth—I know all the exhibitors in this locality and—I am for Rembusch.

Frank Buhler,
Central Market Street Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

Frank J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Ind.

Dear Sir: No truer words were ever penned than those contained in your article in the June 10 Motography. I wish it were possible for every layman with an itching to read it but of course they will not.

I congratulate myself for my success in keeping some friends out of the game in this city but there are others, and I am through before some fool who sees only the heads on a rush night and knows nothing of overhead expense induces someone to build. (We have 4—population, 13,500.)

I congratulate you on your ability to and courage in writing the article.

Frank E. Sharp,
Corning Opera House, Corning, New York.

Frank J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Ind.

Dear Sir: As a brother exhibitor I want to congratulate you on your article in Motography of June 10. You certainly "hit the nail on the head" in every particular. Pound away at the long features as they are a detriment to any picture show in every way. Don't think it will ever be possible to get the exhibitors together but such articles as this written by you ought to make an impression.

C. H. Williams,
Dreamland Electric Theater, Seymour, Indiana.

(Have run this theater for over seven years.)

Lee A. Ochs, another candidate for the presidency, is the president of the New York State Branch of the League and owner of the Costello theater, New York City. The announcement of his candidacy comes from the headquarters of the New York local at 218 West Forty-second street. In bringing the name of Mr. Ochs before the members of the League the announcement, in part, reads:

The high spots in Mr. Ochs' recent successful activities in behalf of the exhibitors and the motion picture industry may be summed up briefly as follows: Forcing full recognition of the exhibitors' organization from the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America, after that body had declined the exhibitors' suggestion that the Madison Square Garden Exposition be held jointly and participated in equally by both bodies.

Heading the big campaign which gave the rival exposition at Grand Central Palace, and carrying it through with complete popular and financial success.

Securing from the Board of Trade an agremeent that 50 per cent of the profits of the Madison Square Garden Show should go to the national exhibitors' organization.

Bringing together at Delmonico's the most representative gathering of all elements of the film industry and securing harmonious co-operation which led to the selection of J. Robert Rubin, counsel for the Exhibitors' League, to lead the united opposition to the Christman-Wheeler Bill, which censorship measure was, as a result, vetoed by Governor Whitman and which victory saved the motion picture industry oppressive annoyance and more than $1,000,000 which would have been collected from it in one year.

Successfully carrying on constructive organization work that has brought the New York organization to a point of prosperous development and united strength never before known in the history of the organization.

Standards have been raised, harmonious co-operation has taken the place of internal strife, and every step taken by the organization under Mr. Ochs' leadership has been a step forward. The exhibitors believe Mr. Ochs because Ochs has made good for them and in leading their battles he has in every instance brought them to uncompromising victory. The business-like quality of his administration is shown by the success of the Grand Central Palace Exposition.

Five prominent exhibitors of Brooklyn, New York, delegates to the Chicago convention. Beginning at the left, they are President Manheimer of the Brooklyn Exhibitors' League; L. L. Levine, president and general manager, Regent Theater Company; H. Clark Mooney, secretary to Big T. and W. H. Kemble Theaters Corporation; William Brandt, executive secretary Brooklyn Exhibitors; and Benjamin Title of the Avon Theater, Brooklyn. Mr. Mooney is not an official delegate but will undoubtedly be on hand when the gong sounds for the big Chicago show.

Mr. Ochs' platform includes:

Equal participation and voice with the manufacturer and distributor in all plans, programs, conferences and movements that affect the industry as a whole.

A campaign of co-operative work that will bring the strength of the national exhibitors' organization up to one hundred per cent of the total number of motion picture exhibitors in the United States.

A local in every motion picture center, great or small, in the United States.

One national convention and one exposition or trade show each year to be held simultaneously in the city chosen by the convention. The exposition should be under the auspices of the exhibitors with the co-operation and participation of the entire industry.

The establishment of a credit system that will insure the increase in membership of the league.

The establishment of a bureau of information for the benefit of the league's members.

The establishment of a grievance committee, whose duty it shall be to adjust all differences between exhibitors and other branches of the industry, which committee shall be permanently located in New York, the headquarters of all the large manufacturing, distributing and accessory concerns.

Such progressive legislation as shall be beneficial to all branches of the industry, whether local, state or national.

Fred J. Herrington, who is a candidate for the presidency to succeed himself, has not announced his platform but he probably stands on the record he has made during the last year. He has not appeared at the Chicago headquarters to assist in making a success of the convention and show.

Both Mr. Ochs and Mr. Herrington are working actively for votes, while Mr. Rembusch has taken the position that the League should seek the man and not the man seek the office. The persons with whom Mr. Rembusch has come into contact have taken the campaign work out of his hands and they declare that they will elect him.

The attitude of numerous of the members of the League is that Mr. Rembusch is the man for the office because he knows when to fight and when to remain passive. Another of the candidates has been criticized for going around continually with the proverbial chip on his shoulder awaiting for some manufacturer to knock it off. This attitude is believed to be wrong because it is feared that it will cause friction almost immediately and friction leads to dissension.

That three men now aspire to the presidency of the League proves better than anything else that the League is gaining in strength and that its importance is appreciated. It has had rank weed growth in the last twelve months. At the San Francisco convention one year ago there was just about a corporal's guard present. The election was purely perfunctory. Men were elected to office because they happened to be on the ground. This year the League membership will have something to say because thousands of the members will attend the convention.

It is the hope of the great majority of the members of the League that the national offices will be proportioned geographically in so far as possible and obtain the right men for the positions. The ticket which seems to be favored by a fair majority of the exhibitors, nearly all of whom desire Chicago as the permanent headquarters, is:

President,
Frank J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Indiana.
Secretary,
Thomas L. Furniss, Duluth, Minn.
Treasurer,
Lee A. Ochs, New York City, or
Sam H. Trigger, New York City.
Chairman of Executive Committee,
Howard S. Clemmer, Spokane, Wash.
Executive Secretary in charge of Headquarters,
William J. Sweney, Chicago.

Sam H. Trigger, in a recent interview with MOTOGRAPHY's New York representative, declared that he is not a candidate for any office but it is believed that if enough pressure is brought to bear he might accept the office of treasurer. Mr. Trigger is almost a popular idol of the men in the industry in New York City and has tremendous weight with both the showmen and the manufacturers.

William J. Sweeney of Chicago is the only legitimate candidate for the office of executive secretary, according to almost every person. He no longer is an active exhibitor but since his retirement as the owner of a motion picture theater he has devoted his entire time toward the betterment of the condition of the motion picture showmen throughout the country. He is at the helm of the Chicago show and it is his directing power that will make the show that huge succes it is bound to be.

Mr. Sweeney is not a candidate for the office of executive secretary but his acquaintances insist that he is the only man for the place, the one man in the business with that organization ability that will make a success of the organization and one of the few men capable of bringing showman and manufacturer together on that happy plane immune to serious difficulties and capable of adjusting problems without a loss of dignity or prestige on either side.

And everybody is whooping her up for Sweeney.

Board of Trade to Be Dissolved

EXHIBITORS TO SHARE IN NEW REPRESENTATIVE ORGANIZATION

EXHIBITORS, producers, supplymen, members of the trade press and exchangemen to the number of more than sixty gathered at Delmonico's in New York on Thursday, June 8, on an invitation suggesting the censorship situation as its main object. On opening the meeting, however, W. W. Irwin soon righted this impression by stating, briefly and frankly, that the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America, Inc., did not fill the berth for which it was organized, and that the officers were perfectly willing to give up their places and aid in remodeling the present body to fill all needs or dissolve the Board of Trade and join heartily in the formation of a comprehensive trade organization to take its place.

Following Mr. Irwin, Commodore J. Stuart Blackton spoke for a few minutes, after which he left to attend the graduation of his son from a military academy up the state. The point which Commodore Blackton led to and emphasized his talk was: "Should we or should we not have a trade organization? If we should, now is the time to decide upon it and lay plans for its foundation. Likewise, if we should not have a concrete association within the trade, now is the time to lay the subject to rest for good."

In spite of the mistakes which it freely admits, the Motion Picture Board of Trade did introduce advantages heretofore unknown in the film business. If it had nothing else to its credit, its existence would be justified by the close business association which it brought about between companies which in the past have been nothing but names and competitors to each other.

A rising vote was taken upon whether or not there should be a trade organization. All but two rose in favor of it. The exceptions were W. W. Hodkinson and J. H. Sherman of Paramount. They, it appeared, did not wish to go on record as favoring any body until they knew its plans and power. When it was explained to them that the vote was merely to decide upon the existence of a board of trade or chamber of commerce and would not obligate them to remain members should the plans and by-laws not appeal to them, they made the vote unanimous.

No industry in commercial history has developed so rapidly to a high degree of commercial success, prominence and stability as the motion picture industry without really knowing itself, those who are engaged in it, or forming an association for the promotion and protection of the industry as a whole.

It was the sense of the meeting that each branch of the industry is an important member of the motion picture family; that family differences and disputes ought to be amicably adjusted within the family circle, so that the industry as a whole could present a solid front, not only in opposition to adverse legislation, but likewise in support of constructive measures, as well as all other matters pertaining to the welfare and further development of the business.

It was also the consensus of opinion that in the formation of such an association, this industry owes a duty not only to itself, but to the public, to see to it that so great a vehicle of entertainment and education should not be handicapped or harassed in its development, but on the contrary should be permitted to advance constantly in those qualities that make for enlightenment, education and entertainment.

It was thereupon resolved that all of those present at the meeting constitute an Organization Committee, and it was further resolved that a sub-committee of twelve be appointed, with the chairman of the meeting, Walter W. Irwin, as chairman of the sub-committee, to formulate plans for such an association, and report back to the whole committee at a meeting to be held three weeks hence at the same time and place.

The committee appointed consisted of the following gentlemen:

Jules E. Brulatour, Nicholas Power, J. H. Hallberg, Lee A. Ochs, John J. Whittman, L. L. Levine, W. Stephen Bush, William A. Johnston, Tracey Lewis, William W. Hodkinson, Jesse L. Lasky, and Walter W. Irwin.

W. W. Irwin, chairman of the executive committee of the Board of Trade, acted as chairman and opened the meeting while the dinner was yet in its early courses. In part he said:

This meeting, gentlemen, was not called by the Motion Picture Board of Trade, it is not a meeting of the Board of Trade, it is a meeting of the entire industry, for the purpose of considering the formation of an association which will be representative of the entire industry, and which will gain the confidence of everyone in it.

Frankly and honestly speaking, the Motion Picture Board of Trade has not been able to fulfill its objects. It was formed with the best of intentions. It was the intention of everyone who had anything to do with it, that it should gain the confidence of the entire industry and that each branch of the industry should come into it with a proper representation. The fear seems to have existed that the Motion Picture Board of Trade is a manufacturers' association.

Now, the officers and directors of the Board of Trade are quite willing to relinquish their positions to others who may be selected by the entire industry. I think I can confidently say to you that they are quite willing to amend the charter in any respect that this meeting may consider that it should be amended. In the first place, it has been suggested that its name ought to be changed. With that suggestion I agree. The name, the Motion Picture Board of Trade, seems to smack too much of manufacturing.

It has also been urged by the exhibitors that the exchange men have two directors and the producers two directors, and that the exchange men and producers are one and the same, because in every instance the exchange is controlled by the producers, or the producers are controlled by the exchange organizations, and that therefore the exhibitors ought to have a representation equal to the representation of exchange men and exhibitors. In this respect I think they are right, and I know the board, at least those whom I have heard express an opinion, agree as to this; and the Board of Trade is perfectly willing to do anything this meeting may think proper to bring about an association that will have the full confidence and co-operation of the whole industry.

Organizations by encouragement and support may arrive at the greatest degree of effectiveness in co-operating upon questions that affect the whole industry. If the whole industry came into new association, we would be able to present all questions at our meeting which affected the entire industry and abide by the rule of the majority, and that the minority in all instances after a full discussion would be willing to abide by the rule of the majority.

It must be self-evident to the exhibitors that their associations cannot be as effective in matters pertaining to the whole industry as they would be if they were working in conjunction with all of the other members of the motion picture family; and it has become perfectly apparent, at least to the Board of Trade, that it cannot produce the desired results in behalf of the whole industry unless it has the co-operation of every important branch of the industry, including the exhibitors with their tremendous influence extending over the entire country. In my judgment, gentlemen, if we can have such an association, wherein the board of directors is thoroughly representative, and wherein that board can get the benefit of the thought of the whole industry, we will be able to accomplish very substantial results. No association that you will be able to form can meet the situation on questions such as censorship, railroad and express rules, insurance, and a host of other questions that must be considered, unless we have the exhibitors with us.

As the Board of Trade was formed with the best intentions, sincere intentions, and as the Board of Trade still possesses those same intentions, it is our purpose, if it be the will of this meeting, either to permit the Board of Trade to be so amended that it will meet with the desires, squarely, of each branch of the industry, or to dissolve it, and form a new association which will obtain the necessary co-operation and confidence of everyone in the industry.

I think we should decide today whether a trade organization is necessary, and if we decide that it is necessary, let us today form that organization, no matter how it may be formed, under what name; and secondly, we should determine how that organization is to be supported. Every trade organization, every successful trade organization, is supported by the entire industry, not by groups or by one or two or a dozen individuals. It must be the support of the entire industry. I think the recent trade shows held in New York were a great success, because I believe that their failure was the cause of this very big meeting here today. I think that those two shows led us all to see that the manufacturers and the exhibitors, and everyone in the business, realized the futility of trying to buck against each other, and trying to run a divided house.

One big show, with everyone pulling for it, would have been a great success, and would have made a lot of money which we would have used to great advantage in fighting adverse legislation, and things of that sort.

I think it is a very good thing that that occurred, because it brought us all to the realization of pulling together in one organization or association. It ought to teach us the lesson, and to unite us, just as the Civil War united this country more closely than before, and I think that this little civil war of our own that we had here in New York is going to be very effective in teaching us to build up our own universal organization in our own industry. I think we should go about forming our organization here today in a practical and businesslike way, because it is something which we all need very seriously at the present time.

J. W. Binder's Statement

J. W. Binder, executive secretary of the Motion Picture Board of Trade of America, after the meeting, said to MOTOGRAPHY's representative:

I am much gratified at the representative attendance at the meeting. I believe the action taken is wise and along constructive lines. The original plan of organization and the budget of the Board of Trade were never considered by me as being permanent. When it became apparent that, from whatever reason, the full strength of the different branches of the industry could not be enrolled, I at once began work upon a broader plan, a larger budget and a more equitable method of raising the same.

Careful study of existing trade organizations in other industries showed that in the majority of cases the money to be raised for trade organization purposes was secured through a self-imposed tax on the unit of production. In the film industry this is the thousand-foot reel of film. The plan evolved, after discussion with the board of directors, has been placed at the disposal of the new committee. If adapted it will raise a budget adequate for the things which must be done by a trade association without being burdensome to anyone in the industry.

I am sure that the committee appointed will work out a plan which will be fair and equitable and which will enlarge upon the beginnings made by the Board of Trade, the result being an efficient trade organization, thoroughly representative of the whole industry.

I do not feel, nor does anyone, I believe, familiar with what the board has accomplished, that it has in any sense been a failure. I have only to point to the splendid fight made against the federal censorship bill in Washington, the achievement of the Wilson dinner and to the fact that in the eleven states in which the legislatures met this year, out of sixty-four bills hostile to the motion picture industry introduced, only eleven became laws, to prove this assertion.

It is a source of keen regret to me that I shall not be here to take an active part in the organization to be built. I am sailing for London on Saturday to execute a private commission of an extremely important nature, which it is a great honor to have been asked to undertake. I shall be absent until July 15. If the committee has not completed its labors at that time, my best efforts and as much time as I can give will be at its disposal.

The Metro Pictures Corporation, whose active support of the cause of the exhibitors in their winning fight against the Board of Trade during the early exposition season proved a blow from which the board was never fully able to recover, issued the following statement regarding the new organization:

"Metro will cordially support any movement which has for its object the betterment of the industry. Metro's attitude on the importance of fully recognizing the exhibitor is a matter of history."

William A. Brady and W. N. Seligsberg had little to say during the meeting, but that much they said with dynamic force and good effect. Several times during the meeting, when it looked as though the affair would resolve itself down into a question of whether light or dark-haired men should predominate on the committee, they reminded the floor of the serious purpose of the gathering and pointed out that an organization could not be gotten under way if they insisted on doubting each other.

When questioned as to his opinion of the value of a trade association, Mr. Brady declared himself emphatically in favor of one. He said that it was the one thing the industry needed very badly, and that it should unite all branches of the industry. Particularly, he says, should the exhibitors be in it.

In order to avoid arousing unjust suspicion and to secure perfect harmony between the exhibitors and producers, Mr. Brady believes that the former should be represented in such an organization in an executive capacity and be allowed in on all of the meetings and kept in touch with all that is going on. He is as important a factor as the manufacturer.

During the meeting the speakers were: W. W. Irwin, Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, Exhibitor Davis, William Brandt, William A. Brady, W. N. Seligsburg, W. W. Hodkinson, Samuel Field, Samuel Goldfish, Mr. Van Deusen, W. Stephen Bush, Albert S. LeVino and John N. Sherman.

We Nominate Teddy!

ONE TOUCH OF DOG ON THE SCREEN MAKES THE WHOLE WORLD KIN

By Arthur E. Curtis

"THE more I see of some men the better I like dogs."

The above immortal words of wisdom fell from the pen of Bill Nye. And in them he presents in capsule form the well-nigh universal feeling of appreciation of certain traits found in that inimitable combination of bark and wag, affection and faith, called the dog.

Everyone envies a dog. And no wonder.

He is absolutely unselfconscious; he's spontaneous; he's frank; he is so faithful to his friends and he scraps so cheerfully with his enemies.

Whether he admits it or not, there's a lot of human nature in a dog; and be it said also that there is some dog nature in humans. That applies both to gastronomy and character.

Be the canines fluffy Fidos or Behemothian Bills they have an affinity for the human race.

Teddy shines on sob stuff. Of course he had good support in Nita Davis and Art Accord. While the fans are oozing tears of sympathy you can imagine him saying "Ho, hum!" over his leading lady's shoulder.

Helen Holmes is holding hands with one of these solemn gentleman actors in "The Girl and the Game" series.

Have you heard the story of the constable of a small Texas town who found it necessary to increase the dog tax? The change in assessment had to be made public through the medium of the press, but the worthy arm of the law felt great delicacy in referring to the sexes of the dogs. Here is his masterly circumlocution as it appeared in the paper: "Notice: Hereafter the yearly town tax on all male dogs will be $1. Vice versa, $3."

We submit this to the censors as the masterpiece of delicacy in all dog literature.

Those classes of society that are well-dogged have expositions every year in their honor. There is a magazine published over in Battle Creek, Michigan, devoted entirely to dogs. Realizing the extent to which human affection for a dog may reach, Kipling wrote a poem with the burden, "Don't give your heart to a dog to tear," meaning that dogs, like humans, die and leave empty hearts sometimes.

A Beauty Mutual canine actor.

No real poet or writer ever neglected the dog. He and humans are companions on an irksome earth. Is it any wonder then, that one touch of dog on the screen makes the whole world kin?

Among the dozens of familiar dogs of the celluloid world are the Pickford collie, the Billie Burke pom, the Vitagraph huskies, the Bara wolfhound, the Mayo fuzz, the Hopper cur, the Charles Ray bull and the Triangular canines. Has anyone forgotten the baby pups in "The Birth of a Nation"? How many chuckles of laughter have been chucked at the sight of the proverbial bull dog volting in the direction of the hip-pocket portion of the comedian's pants?

But as it's convention time, we nominate as the dog-star of all canine actors, Mr. A. M. Teddy, the American-Mutual sob artist.

Teddy is the only dog in history that has had a play written for him. Look at the picture in the circle and see how he shines on the sob stuff. Of course he had good support, in Nita Davis and Art Accord, but he holds the center of the picture. And while the fans are oozing tears of sympathy you can imagine him saying over his leading lady's shoulder, "C'mon pards, let's get this blamed scene finished. I want to get home to lunch."

This fuzzy little actress in the white pajamas shared honors with June Daye in Lubin's "Jenkin's Jinx."

And down below in the same play — American-Mutual's "A Man's Friend"—where Teddy's foot is caught in a trap, note the appealing pose for sympathy. The man who resists it wouldn't make a first-class ribbon clerk. The so-called tricks for dogs Teddy disdains—they're A. B. C. to him—now that he is on the American pay roll as an actor. Princess Olga Celeste, who directs the Selig four-footed actors, says that leopards are easier to train than dogs, but dog gone it, she never saw Teddy.

We are showing glimpses of only a few of the screen-acting dogs at work. None of them can touch Teddy. The convention floor is yours. Bring on all your other candidates.

Knowing the sensitive feelings of people of the profession, we hereby wish to apoligize to other Miss and Mr. Dogs who have had "notable successes on the screen" for failure to represent them here. "Lack of space," etc. We would suggest that you can usually get a page or so of publicity by having your press manager write up your favorite outdoor sport or your unexcelled collection of fleas.

Many Chicago Theaters Robbed

MORE THAN FIFTEEN HOUSES ENTERED IN PAST FEW MONTHS

FOR the past few months Chicago has been suffering from an epidemic of picture theater robberies. It is estimated that yeggmen have gotten away with more than five thousand dollars during the past year. Between 15 and 20 houses have been entered.

The operation of the thieves has been in each case smooth and professional. The "touches" have never resulted in an arrest as never a trace or a clew has been left by the safe blowers.

One of the largest losses sustained in this manner was suffered by the New Dearborn Theater on East Division street. The robbery took place on May 28, which was Monday, and all of Saturday's and Sunday's receipts were in the safe. Manager C. F. C. Cuneo states that nothing was disturbed about the building except the office. No window or door was forced, which leaves the conclusion that the thieves paid their way into the show and concealed themselves somewhere in the dark corners of the house until the building was closed for the night. The blowing of the safe was accomplished with a minimum of disturbance and the cash was cleaned out completely.

The same method of procedure has been followed by several of the theaters robbed. Where the yeggmen realized that chances for hiding in the house were slim they forced their entrance into the building. This was the case at the Crawford theater of 13 South Crawford avenue, which was robbed of more than $400 on February 7. The culprits jimmied a door on the main floor of the house and then had no difficulty in entering the office on the second floor.

The latest picture man to experience the pleasant sensation of coming down to the office in the morning and finding the safe door neatly blown out was Manager J. H. Ferris of the Clark Theater, 4532 North Clark street. This took place on May 31. In this case too, the cracksmen bought tickets, enjoyed the show in anticipation of their fun to come, and then pried off the casing of the office door and walked in with their little dose of nitro-glycerine. Their boodle from the Clark amounted to but $35. The large balcony of the theater aided them in their little disappearing act while the house was being closed.

One exhibitor states that most of the long series of robberies have occurred on nights following holidays or Sundays. In that way the cracksmen got away with the accumulated receipts of two or more days. Another manager scores the Chicago police for what he claims is a lack of thoroughness in attempting to trace and apprehend the robbers whose profitable hobby seems to be attending motion picture theaters.

The following Chicago houses are among those reported to have been robbed within the past few months: The Willard, Star, Empire, Empress, Halsted, Imperial, Princess, Hamlin, Avon, Colonial, Palace and the Chicago Avenue Theater. The latter lost $500 in March and the others have lost from $15 to $400.

Mother's Ideas on Children's Programs

GLEANED FROM INTERVIEWS WITH REPRESENTATIVE MOTHERS

By B. F. Barrett

WHEN the moving picture and the child were mentioned a little worried look came over the faces of the mothers. Here is a problem which they have all had to meet and it is constantly before them demanding consideration as a factor in the education and development of the child, and according to the mothers it is a problem about which they have thought deeply and regarding which they are not yet satisfied.

One little woman—a personification of the word "mother," whose life is devoted to her home and her children, and who feels most keenly the great responsibility which rests upon her in the right guidance of these young lives entrusted to her care—spoke with deep emotion of the influence the pictures can have on the child for good or for evil. She looks at them from the standpoint that everything with which the child comes in contact is either an aid or a hindrance in his development along the lines of right living and proper advancement.

The child is in the process of education and the training given him by paid instructors is only a small part of the knowledge he is gaining which will help him to form his opinions and to take his proper place in the world, and for this reason the parent is constantly on the alert to guard against all undesirable impressions and is just as critical of the amusements furnished the child as of his studies. The mind of the child is very impressionable and the conceptions which he gains now are liable to be lasting. He is just beginning to form his own opinion of life and the world in general and it is the ambition of the parents to guide him to choose right standards and high ideals. Do the pictures help or hinder in this guidance, is the question which this mother is trying to solve. In her opinion "the ideal way would be to have all children barred from the performances which the older people attend and allow them to have shows of their own with programs planned especially for them—but I suppose this is a Utopian idea. The matinee especially for children on Saturday, or twice a week as the manager near our home is giving it, is a godsend to the mother in helping her solve this problem of how she is going to give the child the educational influences of the pictures and yet keep him from seeing the undesirable plays."

The mother of two charming little girls of ten and thirteen spoke most emphatically in favor of the program especially for children and was loud in her praise of any exhibitor who would make such a program a feature of his house.

In discussing the child and the regular program she said that in her opinion a very great many plays from which the young people are not barred are much worse for them to see than those shown under the forbidding sign. Why should a mother try in all ways to shield her growing daughters from all that is coarse and sensual in life and then take them to the picture theater and let them see these things depicted on the screen? What mother wants her daughter to become accustomed to scenes showing the infidelity of man and wife, the girls leaving home on the slightest pretense, the drunkard, the adventuress, the girl betrayed, the frequency and freedom of the love scenes? If a mother unfortunately does get into a theater with a child when such a picture is being shown she is in a dilemma. If she takes the child out she immediately makes a great deal of an incident which might have been beyond the child's comprehension, and if they remain the fear persists that the child will grasp the meaning and a lasting impression be made. It is this element of constant dread of what the screen will show that made this mother give a sigh of relief as she remarked on the growing movement towards programs especially for the younger generation.

Another mother, who as an active club woman is bending all her energies toward a more universal practice of special entertainments for the little folks, spoke of some objectionable features in the films which were shown in these programs. She spoke of some pictures which were splendid for the children to see in most respects and still had one or two scenes which spoiled them entirely—scenes which in her opinion seemed to be dragged in and could just as well have been eliminated entirely. She spoke of "Peggy," with the irresistible Billie Burke, whom the children are growing to love, which has been recommended for children's programs; the scenes of fairyland and its people are most fascinating to even the youngest child, and perhaps for the child up to about ten years old this is a splendid film—but what about the older child from ten to fifteen, when the scenes are introduced showing the tragic story of Colin Cameron and his poor sweetheart Janet? What mother cares to have the child just budding into womanhood see these scenes and ask explanations of them? It is true that the action is veiled, but just because it is and the children cannot understand it they begin to ask more questions. This mother said she made a special effort to take her children to see this film because she thought it would be such a wholesome one, and then she spent a good deal of time trying to get around the questions that were asked about these few scenes. They stood out in the child's mind and they aroused curiosity which was undesirable.

Another film this same clubwoman criticized was "Little Mary Sunshine." This play, about which the children talked for weeks after they had seen it—the charming little leading lady, the fascinating trained bear whose amusing antics were not to be forgotten. And yet what mother wants her child to see the opening scenes of this play—the drunken father abusing the sick mother and finally throwing her to the ground and killing her; and afterwards the scenes of this same drunken brute dying on the park bench? The average child is very sensitive, the pictures are really truly things to them—why should incidents such as this be brought into their lives to cause them to shudder and fear? The manufacturer would probably defend himself by saying that these scenes were introduced for contrast with the happy life into which little Mary was afterward brought. There is no objection to the showing of the proverty stricken room, as it is well for the children of well-to-do parents to know what some other little ones have to endure, of even the dying of the mother, if this is considered essential; but is the coarseness of the drunken brute—the murder—necessary? There were little children in the audience crying when this was shown, not from sorrow for the poor little girl and the mother, but from fear and horror of the drunken father.

And was not this mother right? While these plays may not have been written with the idea of showing them to the children, even from the standpoint of the grown person did these scenes add anything to otherwise most pleasing plays?

In mentioning the kind of plays they would like to have shown to their children the mothers enumerated a variety of subjects which would give the exhibitor a pretty wide range to choose from in planning these performances and still be giving the children what their parents desire them to see.

One play which a number of mothers agreed upon as good for all the boys to see—and the girls, too, for that matter—was a film which was not originally produced with any thought of its special fitness for children, but was manufactured for the entertainment of the grown-ups: "The Bugle Call," in which William Collier, Jr., starred. The small boy taking the leading part would appeal to the children and unconsciously they would be absorbing strong lessons in manhood and bravery taught by the action of the small hero.

Among the other subjects recommended were industrial pictures if they are made simple enough for the young mind to understand. Children are of an inquiring trend and want to know what the inside of a factory looks like, how the garments they wear are made and from whence they come, etc., but most of these films, while they are interesting to the older people, are too complicated to be understood by the child.

Concerning the fairy stories there was a difference of opinion, some believing that the children tire of them after a certain age and feel that they have outgrown them. Special praise was given to the adaptations of books of the better class of literature for children, and the tales of Robin Hood, Ivanhoe, and historical events, as these picturizations stamp the story on the child's mind as nothing else can. The pictures showing the intimate life habits of the birds, fishes and animals are fascinating to the children and instructive at the same time. The current events were in great favor as giving the child a talking knowledge of things which are happening all over the world, so that he can take his part intelligently in a conversation. They make them real to him; they educate and broaden while they amuse.

Many mothers advocated having their girls especially see the plays in which such players as Marguerite Clark and Mary Pickford are appearing, believing that here they get true stories of everyday life with a character of girl which they can idealize and use as a model. Here they are shown sweet, simple love stories which give them the right view of this phase of life.

The cartoon comedies were mentioned as mighty good fun for the kiddies and were especially spoken of for the younger ones.

The slapstick comedy was almost unanimously condemned, as one mother expressed it: "My boy is rough enough now without encouraging him to be more so by seeing this coarse action."

If the manufacturer and exhibitor are waiting for a market to be established for films for children let them rest assured that the demand is already here and it is up to them to supply the material to meet it.

If any exhibitor is undecided whether it would be wise to establish this special matinee let him talk with a number of the parents in his neighborhood and he will no longer be in doubt.

The consensus of opinion of the mothers seems to be that the only way to solve the problem of the child and the motion picture is through the special programs designed to meet the needs of the younger generation, and they are willing to stand behind and support the exhibitor who will co-operate with them in this matter. The manager is always trying to get into closer touch with his patrons. Here is his chance, for the sure path to the hearts of the parents is through their children.

Children's Matinees Sucessful

The United Exchange in Memphis, Tenn., is playing up its pictures suitable for "kid" matinees, and is adding a number of houses to its string of customers for such films.

The following exhibitors have set aside a special children's day and on that day are using strictly pictures which appeal to the youngsters: Grain & Troy, Comus Theater, Tupelo, Miss.; M. E. Rollins, Majestic, Grenada, Miss.; Majestic Amusement Co., Memphis, Tenn.; Dixie Theater, Ripley, Tenn.; Princess Theater, Mayfield, Ky.; Wigwam Theater, Muskogee, Okla.; Busty Theater, McAlester, Okla.; Pastime Theater, Carton Hill, La.; Dixie Theater, Paris, Tenn.

Cain and Troy have just instituted the children's matinee in the Comus Theater, Tupelo, Miss., and this is what the manager said after trying the experiment: "We found that the special matinees are a great deal more successful than we anticipated, and it seems that we are destined to make a big thing out of it, with such pictures as 'Sleeping Beauty,' and 'Golden Locks,' and the 'Three Bears' shown upon the screen." Manager A. Bert Estes of the Busby Theater, at McAlester, Okla., is also giving special attention to all children attending Friday matinees and not only assuring the exhibition of the best pictures appealing to children obtainable, but also assuring the parents of the safety of the children attending the matinees.

Special "Stunt" for the Kiddies

That the children appreciate any effort toward special entertainment in their behalf was demonstrated by a "stunt" planned by the manager of the Columbia Theater, Phoenix, Arizona.

One of the features of the program for the Saturday afternoon matinee was a Mutt and Jeff cartoon. To advertise his theater, the manager placed a small advertisement in the daily paper, stating that "Any boy or girl between the ages of six and fifteen who will draw one of the Gazette's popular comics and present with this advertisement at the Gazette office will receive a free ticket for the Columbia Theater, Saturday afternoon."

The children responded in such numbers that the theater was filled twice, over 1,500 children seeing the cartoon.

The drawings of the children were afterward placed in the window of the newspaper office so that the citizens of the town could see what the younger generation could do with their pencils.

COMBINE OF THEATERS—OTHER LIVE PHOTOPLAY NEWS

Twenty-five Theaters Form Corporation

TWENTY-FIVE Chicago motion picture theaters are represented in the new organization which has just been formed under the title of the Amalgamated Theaters Corporation.

These houses were formerly run by prominent exhibitors in small chains. The combination has been formed with the idea of increasing efficiency of management and closer co-operation with the exchanges. All bookings for the twenty-five houses are now made through the Amalgamated office and all rentals are paid in the same manner. MOTOGRAPHY will later publish a list of the houses represented, with photographs. They are all first-class theaters that are making good money. No small or second-class houses are admitted to the organization.

The officers of the corporation are Barney Bálaban, president, Frank Schaefer, vice-president, and Samuel Katz, the originator of the idea, secretary and treasurer. The offices are in the Mallers building at 5 South Wabash avenue. The organization is planning on a house organ in the near future.

Chicago's Newest House Opens June 12

The opening of Covent Garden, advertised as Chicago's largest and most unique playhouse, has been postponed from June 8 to June 12 on account of unavoidable mechanical delay. The house, which seats 2,600, is equipped with a large and complicated stage whose floor splits and raises like a jack-knife bridge revealing a broad and deep pool for the water acts. The mechanics of this arrangement, said to be more complete than that of the New York Hippodrome, was the cause of the delayed opening. The house will present musical fantasies and novelties and pictures. "The Land of Evermore" is the title given to the opening bill.

Did you ever hear of a lady's handkerchief used for a picture screen? That's what they use at the Covent. The screen is a part of one of the front drops and is painted to imitate a huge lady's handkerchief, or a lady's huge handkerchief. The decorative function of the white area is emphasized by the phrase inscribed below it—"Mi Lady's Lace Kerchief."

During the three-day interval between the scheduled and the actual opening Covent Garden, announces President Henry Meyers, will be the host of the public. Free concerts will be given on the great Wurlitzer Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra, said to be the largest instrument in the world. A good sized crowd attended the first of these.

The officers of the Covent Garden Corporation are Henry Myers, president, and Louis Felix, treasurer. H. L. Davidson is publicity director, Henry Lehman, stage manager, Axel Christensen, musical director, Louis Eisman, "superintendent of comfort and courtesy."

Film Forces Elect Chicago Judge

Arthur Brisbane, the brilliant New York editor, among others, has predicted that in the not-far-distant future the screen will be one of the most powerful political factors in the country.

Chicago has just given the first concrete example of the soundness of that belief. The picture men of the Windy City recently united in support of the candidacy of Judge Fennimore Cooper for re-election to his office, and as a result he was elected by a majority of more than 23,000 votes.

The campaign in support of Cooper was led by D. W. Griffith and the Chicago Triangle forces because it was Judge Cooper who, against a great force of opposing opinion, made possible the presentation of "The Birth of a Nation" in Chicago by granting an injunction favoring what he believed to be the right of the picture. The Griffith forces in the campaign just closed worked with local exhibitors in showing Cooper slides, posting Cooper bills and running other Cooper advertisments. Circulars were also sent to picture patrons. The power of the forces of the film was seen in the result of the election.

A Chicago Example for Operators

If the operator with ambition will take a lesson from the success of G. C. Anders, of the Kenmore theater on Wilson avenue, Chicago, he will "get there." When Anders went into the Kenmore four years ago the booth was small and without conveniences. He labored there from Sunday night till Wednesday without a wink of sleep, rearranging the machines, enlarging the booth and installing a bench and other conveniences which make for efficient work and better projection. He kept up his progressive energy and later on promotion to manager was no more than was due him.

The Kenmore seats 500 people most of the time. It has to, because it makes money and pays a rent of $10,000 a year.

Show this to that bright and ambitious young operator of yours.

Film Heads in Chicago

Among the recent visitors to Chicago prominent in the film world were Carl Laemmle, of Universal, John R. Freuler, Mutual's chief executive, and Thomas H. Ince and A. H. Woods, the latter two to complete the arrangements for the showing of Ince's big anti-war spectacle, "Civilization," at Cohan's Grand opera house beginning the latter part of June.

Nation-Wide Ad Reaches Chicago

With faces sepia colored and khaki suits carrying in solution the grime of many states Leo S. Harding and Andrew C. Edison, Ince's nation-wide advertisement for his big drama "Civilization," reached Chicago on June 6 on their way from Los Angeles to Portland, Maine.

The two mounted their Henderson gasoline steed in the Angel City on May 9 and twenty-eight days later strolled into MOTOGRAPHY's Chicago office with greetings. In the run so far they have worn out five tires and have dug down for gas at the rate of 45 cents a gallon—at Williams, Arizona. Their best time was made between Denver and Omaha, 650 miles. The distance was covered in two days.

"We played with a couple of rattlesnakes, lost our water bottle in the middle of the desert and begged some off a Ford," said Harding. "Those are our most exciting experiences so far—except when Edison fell down the dark stairs in a little hotel—and he was sober, too."

The two gasoline-propelled Ince advertisements taking in the sights around the capitol at Denver. They are spreading "Civilization" from Los Angeles to Portland, Maine.

In New York the two men will confer with Thomas H. Ince, who is there presenting "Civilization" to enthusiastic New Yorkers.

J. E. O'Toole, manager of the Chicago office of the Fox Film Corporation, reports that right at this particular time business is more than ordinarily brisk and that "East Lynne," one of the newest Fox features, starring Theda Bara, appeals to him more than anything he has seen on the screen for some time.

Harry Leonhardt, western manager of the Fox company, has just returned to Chicago from a business trip to Omaha.

William N. Selig has sold his $69,000 residence on Lake View avenue, Chicago, to Henry K. Chapin.

FROHMAN PRODUCES "JAFFERY"

Unusual Roll-Call of Brilliant Stage and Screen Talent to Interpret Play from Locke's Splendid Novel

Interesting personalities will surround C. Aubrey Smith in "Jaffery," which the Frohman Amusement Corporation is filming from the new novel of that name by William J. Locke.

Almost without exception, those who have been chosen for the various parts are known equally well both on the stage and in the realm of the screen.

Eleanor Woodruff went from the stage to photoplay work, first with the Vitagraph company, and later with Pathe, her beauty and wealth of expression soon securing her leads in prominent features.

Eric Blind has been familiar to play-goers, both in England and America for many years, his principal engagements here being with Mrs. Fiske and Margaret Anglin. He has appeared before in Frohman amusement photo productions in "The Woman in 47," and in "Then I'll Come Back to You."

Paul Doucet has just completed his engagement with Elsie Ferguson, playing Fritz Schiller in "Margaret Schiller." He will also be remembered for his work with Henrietta Crossman in "The Tongues of Men." Upon the screen, he has played leads with Theda Bara, and with Martha Hedman in "The Heart of a Thief."

Florence Deshon, after finishing an engagement with "My Lady's Dress," was first called to picture work by the Famous Players Company, because of her striking similarity of feature to an elderly character, whom it was necessary to show in youth as well. In this part Miss Deshon proved so adaptable to the screen, that she followed this with other picture parts, going to the West Indies with the Fox company for a series of spectacular features made there.

Doris Sawyer is an English actress whose last parts before leaving for America were Ruth in "Hindle Wakes," and Agnes in "Jim the Penman." Reaching New York after a stay in South Africa, Miss Sawyer has recently been in the pictures, "Tangled Fates," and "The Hand of Peril."

With such material to portray Mr. Locke's story, as thoroughly known in book form, the Frohman company should produce a picture of unusual interest.

"The Play's the Thing"

By Maurice Tourneur

Vice-President, Paragon Films, Inc.

In this year when the entire world is resounding with praise and reminiscence of the Bard of Avon, whose Tercentenary is being celebrated, we may well remember his opinion of the stage.

"The Play is (indeed!) the thing."

The cleverest stage direction and the most brilliant work of actors can not bring to success a dramatic vehicle which is not worth while. Our best artists have been handicapped and many have lost reputations earned by hard years of endeavor by being forced into work on scenarios which were not worthy the name or the game.

Times have changed in motion picture production. The melodramatic hodge-podges which sufficed to satisfy the nickel audiences a few years ago do not appeal to people who pay twenty-five and fifty cents, or even more, for an evening call on Cinema.

The ancient idea of slap-stick (many exhibitors to the contrary notwithstanding!) is passé. We must have comedy worthy the effort.

Nine times out of ten when a play fails the fault is in the play.

The trouble lies with a slip-shod management which leaves the selection of material for production with unskilled, ignorant relatives, friends or catch-as-catch-can editorial readers.

I am glad to note that the prices paid for good photoplay scripts of multiple reels and even singles, is steadily advancing; that the best writers in the country are gradually entering the lists of competitive contributions. This means that we will have an increasingly better grade of photoplays to offer to the public.

Money will buy office furniture, cameras, scenery and props—it can obtain the best interpretative talent and the best directing ability—but unless it buys the seed, there will be no garden.

As a director and producer, who believes in the supreme artistry of the photoplay, I urge even more attention, even greater reward for the creative genius who writes our plays. The best upward step in the industry has been the recent innovation of paying writers a cash advance and then percentge royalties, as is done with stage plays.

Managers are beginning to realize how important the play is to their financial return; the companies which act most wisely and even most generously on this line are those which will reap the quickest and the most permanent reward.

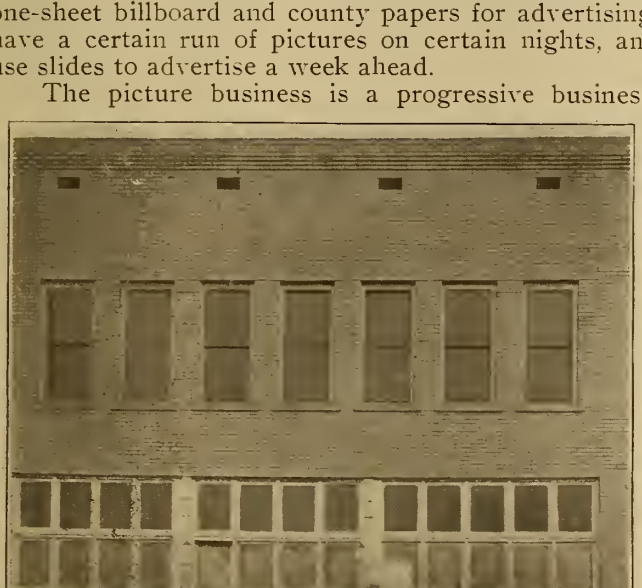
Be Progressive or Quit

By E. C. Snodgrass

Manager, Snodgrass Theater, Scottsboro, Alabama.

I HAVE been in the theater business nearly four years. The first two years was in an old building once used for an opera house and not on a very public street. The seating capacity could not accommodate the people. I could not advertise with billboards to any advantage, as most of the people did not have to pass that way. I used a piano-player for music, and only had one machine. Not satisfied with these cramped quarters I decided to build a house on Main street, one that the town would be proud of. The theater cost me $15,000. The inside is finished up to date and I have two electric pianos and a piano-player. I have a stage with scenery so that I can have vaudeville acts if I desire. I use three-sheet and one-sheet billboard and county papers for advertising, have a certain run of pictures on certain nights, and use slides to advertise a week ahead.

The picture business is a progressive business.



The businesslike front of the Snodgrass Theater.

You have to be progressive or quit. The patrons are becoming better educated in the line of pictures and you have to be a "live wire" to hold your audience. I give my patrons value received. Sometimes I give them advantage of a fine feature for the same price—this may be a mistake, but when you get in you have to continue. However, it means that you have satisfied the public, it is a good advertisement and they will come again.

When I first entered the motion picture business I had a partner for about a year, then I bought out his interest and decided to run the theater to suit myself.

A Pioneer Exhibitor

By Fred Cosman

Manager, Electric Theater, St. Joseph, Missouri.

I was the first exhibitor in St. Joseph to show moving pictures. I started 15 years ago August 1, 1916. I then advertised the pictures after my own name, Cosman's Moving Pictures; owned my own machine, but pictures were supplied by P. L. Waters, New York City (were no Chicago moving picture exchanges at the time that I know of. Moore had just opened an office and sold a few prints now and then). We used one 1,000-foot reel of film for an entire week in conjunction with five vaudeville acts at 10c admission. The theater seated 550 and was called the Crystal. In time as business grew we built a New Crystal, seating 1,135, using same style show with little higher priced acts, and charged 10-20c admission.

Business soon outgrew this theater and we built the Majestic Theater, seating 900, and operated the Crystal as a vaudeville theater, and at the Majestic showed two acts of vaudeville and feature pictures of 3,000 feet, longest at this time, and filled in with single and split reels. Our success was such that soon other straight picture show theaters were built until the Majestic was rather a back number. However, unlike many others we did not get cold feet but made arrangements to wreck the Majestic and build in its place a strictly modern theater seating 1,600, charging adults 10c, children 5c. We offered the best in feature photoplays and two acts of vaudeville (present policy), and this policy has proven very successful, so much so that we gave up our straight vaudeville theater, as we found the public likes the mixture of feature pictures and two acts of vaudeville better than they do straight vaudeville.

Our theater is conducted to suit the public, and the house is kept clean and up-to-date at all times. It is always a pleasure for any exchange to do business with largest, best and most beautiful theater in each city. This we have, as our projection is as near perfect as we know how to make it and as soon as a machine shows wear we sell it and install a new one. We are always careful with films not to tear them or splatter oil all over them. We pay promptly for our service; advertise more in daily papers than any two other theaters of the city, using honest advertising, featuring the leading characters in each picture.

We treat an exchange man as a brother; try to help him as well as always expect help from him. Shipments are always made promptly as directed; slides, photos, cuts, and paper returned in as good shape as received; always try to be pleasant when films do not arrive on time, as nine out of ten times it is not the exchange's fault but the previous shipper who went to sleep and forgot to ship films the night before. If every manager would see to these details a little himself instead of leaving it entirely in the house help's hands, the results would be much more satisfactory to manager as well as exchange office. All these details come natural after years of experience and one feels he is only doing his natural duty.

It will be twenty-three years ago this August that I entered the motion picture business. At that time I was working for Crescent Arc Light Company of New York City. L. N. Howe advertised for an electrician who knew something about arc lamps. I answered his ad, and after much dallying started work for him at $5.00 a week and expenses. Pictures up to this time were used only in Keith's Union Square Theater at $1,500 a week and were called the Biograph. Mr. Howe offered the first traveling exhibition of moving pictures in America.

The only other moving pictures being shown at the time were at Keith's Union Square Theater and Eden Musee on Twenty-third street. And there were only two or three other moving picture operators in America besides myself. I worked with Howe three years and then started out with my own exhibition of moving pictures, calling it Cosman & Barnes Moving Pictures Company. I was too young in business ways in those days and did not know the battle of life. Had I have had five years more business experience I no doubt would have made a success of my own show, but as it was I returned to L. N. Howe's fold for another year and then went to work for William Paley in the F. F. Proctor circuit of vaudeville theaters operating and assembling the 1,000-foot reels for each house. Four years I stayed with Proctor and then came to St. Joseph, Mo., where I have managed theaters and amusement parks for the last 15 years. The springs in the aperture plate, upper reel and sprocket, in place of the kicker, also lower sprocket and take-up device are my own ideas. I also have an attachment which will reverse the film without shutting the light off; the chase pictures were very funny reversed and used to make quite a hit with the public.

We read in different moving picture magazines of the big men of today in the film game and with few exceptions they have all climbed the ladder of fame with a few years in the business and plenty of money as backing. Due credit must be given those who can do this in a few years, whereas I have had 23 years experience and am not half started yet.

Good Posters—Good Business

By Fred L. Locke,
Manager, The Empress Theater, Morrison, Illinois.

When I first started into the motion picture theater business I was very careful to pick out a good reliable film exchange and one that charged for the use of its films according to their actual worth.

This I certainly found in the General Film Exchange of St. Louis, Missouri. These people make a small charge for poster rental but it is a very small item considering the nice, new, clean posters they send out. I think posters are something that every exhibitor should be very particular about as a poster properly displayed is half the battle won. Don't kick if your exchange makes a small charge for its posters if you are getting good ones, because we all know that something for nothing is a thing of the past. As a rule the cost of these posters is very small and they make you many times more than the original cost.

Another great factor in the small town is to find out just what kind of pictures your patrons prefer, and get them. The people are the ones you must please. Do not consider what you like yourself for you do not have to look at the pictures if you don't like them. A pleased patron will boost for you. Please your people by all means.

And last but not least, if your exchange gives you one week on your service be very prompt in the payment for same as you want them to be very prompt in getting their films to you. If they didn't get your service to you on time you surely would be peeved and would call them down proper by the first mail. So be prompt yourself and you will get the best service.

If any Motography exhibitor who wants to make business better will write to me I will tell him how I am making the picture business pay.

A Refined Chicago House

Charles Z. Schaefer, manager of the Bandbox Theater, 127 West Madison street, Chicago, has adopted "Service" as his slogan, and everything about his house and its management radiates service and efficiency. When Mr. Schaefer took over the theater a short time ago he began at once to look over every part of it to see just where improvements could be made. The house itself could not be bettered, as it is one of the cosiest and most artistic in downtown Chicago. There are no garish decorations, everything speaks of refinement and simplicity, which is very pleasing. He then turned his attention to the pictures. These he determined should be the clearest and best to be found in any theater.

Upon investigation he discovered that the screen which was built in the house was not the best for a small theater where the projection was short, as the light reflected and made a glare on the screen which dimmed the pictures in places and was hard on the eyes of the audience. Therefore he had this expensive screen taken out and another put in which was better adapted for the size of the house. To further satisfy himself that the pictures were being made as clear as possible he had the projection machines overhauled and new lenses put in.

The sign which was over the theater when Mr. Schaefer took charge was a flat one and could only be seen to advantage from the opposite side of the street so this was taken down and replaced by a fifteen-foot electric sign which extends out over the sidewalk and attracts attention from all directions.

Girl ushers were employed and instructed in courteous treatment of the patrons. The musicians also are girls and the music is especially adapted to the film being shown and an effort made to have intervals of three or four weeks elapse between the playing of the same airs so the music as well as the pictures always appear new. Triangle, Fox and Metro pictures are shown.

The Source of Original Ideas

SOME time ago an editorial of ours stating that "Making Films is a Publishing Business" brought forth an idea from a writer of scenarios. He took the rather extreme attitude that the studio, director and actors are merely the printing plant—the machinery for publishing the author's story. Having adopted this view, it was an easy step to the assumption that if the director wants only ideas from the writers, the magazine publisher could logically take the same position. This would be as though the Saturday Evening Post should say to Irvin Cobb, "Just send us a brief outline of your idea, or plot, or whatever you have in your mind; we will interpret its meaning and develop it into a story better than you could."

There are magazines whose stories are written by staff writers in their offices—writers who work on salary and produce so much copy a day. It goes without saying that such magazines stand low in the scale of literature. Whether they make money or not is beside the point; probably they do, or they would quit. We are assuming that film producers have aspirations beyond money grubbing. The artistic efforts they are making proves that they do have such ambitions.

Of course our correspondent's argument is defective right at the outset. A free-lance author can prepare a story for any magazine that scarcely needs the touch of a blue pencil before it goes to the public. It is almost impossible for a scenario writer to prepare a scenario that can be directed and filmed as it is written. The film director is a more important link in the chain than the magazine editor, whose chief function is purely selective.

On the other hand, the free-lance writer will have to be offered better co-operation and more consideration than he is getting, or the flow of good stories will go back to the magazines and the pictures will find themselves short of adequate material. So long as books and short stories continue to be printed on paper, the producers will have the best of second-hand material for pictures. So long as the public is content with that kind of production—and perhaps it will always be satisfied with it—the free-lance scenariowright will not attain first place. The best films we have today are made from novels and magazine stories. There are hundreds of exceptions to that rule, of course; but spread over a year it holds good. So much of the original stuff is poor that it pulls the average away down.

The source of plays for the speaking stage is similar to that for the screen. Some are from original material prepared with the stage in view, and others are adaptations of popular stories which have appeared in print.

No one can say decisively which sort appeals most strongly to the public. The one is apparently as well received as the other. People who have read a story enjoy seeing it enacted. People who never read it, of course, get out of it all the value of original material.

But while dramatizations of printed stories are quite desirable, at least an equal amount of original matter is an absolute necessity if the stage and the photoplay are to preserve their virility and value.

The stage has solved the problem, and its original plays are as good as its adaptations. So far that is not true, on a general average basis, of the photoplay.

The public's judgment on present picture quality is indecisive. Question a number of laymen on their observation of current pictures, and you will find opinion divided. Some will tell you that the improvement over previous years is marked, and that progress is clearly defined. Others will insist that the pictures of the day are rotten and growing worse. Without checking up their opinions against the programs they have seen, the information gained by a straw vote seems worthless.

The fact is, as we see it, that a few films produced today are so wonderful we can hardly see any possibility of improvement. The balance, we regret to say, show little, if any advance beyond the productions of 1910. The few excellent examples are doubly welcome in that they serve to establish the standard by which our art is judged. But the majority of the dear people see only the mediocre many. The pictures they see may be longer and graced with the name of "feature," but about the only difference between the average five-reel picture today and five single-reelers six years ago is that the five-reel feature produced now hasn't got so much story in it.

No doubt the free-lance scenario writer must be taught his place and kept in it, or he will think he is the whole thing. But we've got to give him the respect due a human being and encourage him a little with courtesy and square dealing, and send him a check occasionally or go without original material.

"Atmosphere" in the Picture Theater

THEATER men who screen pretentious productions of definite character frequently exercise their ingenuity in making the whole theater, clear out to the sidewalk, carry out the scheme of the play.

An Indian drama, to these clever and enterprising gentlemen, may call for a totem pole outside and beads and moccasins for the ushers. A simple pastoral story (of which, by the way, more might be produced) suggests rustic decorations inside and out, with a sunbonnet for the cashier and a cow-bell as part of the orchestral equipment, and so on; every picture possessing real individuality can be made to project its atmosphere from the screen to the street curb.

Some people call that the psychology of picture presentation. That is the right word, of course, though there is no necessity to inflict it on a humble and hard-working exhibitor. It is just common sense plus the showman's instinct, with maybe the most credit going to the latter—a sort of uncommon sense.

And the showman's instinct is a pretty safe guide to pleasing the public—safer than any amount of studying of psychology.

All theatrical entertainment depends upon illusion of some sort. That is a good principle for the practical business man in the show business to keep constantly before him. People to whom the illusion is perfect; who are able to forget completely for the hour, that they are looking at clever posing, and who can accept the play as a window in real life; those people get the maximum enjoyment. The showman who helps them to this attitude gives them the most enjoyment for their money and hence is the most popular showman. All the decorations and suggestions that help to eliminate the outside world and put the observer right into the life on the screen make the picture more valuable as an entertainer and more beloved by the people.

The oft-noted effect of appropriate music has practically the same explanation; its value lies not merely in the fact that the people enjoy music, but rather in its power to activate the emotions and lull the critical and analytical sense.

The structural details of the theater, the walls, the commonplace garb of the ushers, all tend to appeal to the critical sense and work against the illusion of the play. Anything that either disguises these distractions or provides means for eliminating the consciousness of their existence and concentrating attention on the illusion of the play makes for a higher appreciation and a greater enjoyment.

And enjoyment—not pictures—is what the showman sells. He is successful only as he purveys a good brand of pleasure and, as we said before, the pleasure of theatrical entertainment lies in illusion—in the ability of the audience to forget that it is an audience seated within four walls and looking at a mere picture.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

A MOST valuable suggestion to theater managers was given by Dr. W. A. Evans in his "How to Keep Well" column in a recent issue of the Chicago Tribune.

Probably few managers have ever thought that the successful running of their theater entailed an understanding of medicine, but Dr. Evans has brought out most forcefully how valuable a little first-aid knowledge really is.

A person fainting while in a motion picture theater is quite an ordinary occurrence, but because it is a situation which they have to meet quite often, how many busy managers have taken the time to try to gain information through reading or inquiry as to how a person can be best taken care of when they have swooned? The common impulse is perhaps naturally to think of your theater first rather than the unconscious person. You do not want any unpleasant scenes in your house. You do not want a panic started because the people know that something out of the ordinary has happened and are not sure just what it is. The audience of any theater is nervous—it seems to be always on edge ready to fly off at a tangent at the slightest cause—and the manager wants to avoid all exciting incidents. And in this he is justified to a certain extent, for a panic started might result in great disaster. But in thinking of the theater first and ignorantly hurrying the afflicted person out so no one will know what has happened, no theater manager wants to feel that he has been the cause of risking a human life.

Dr. Evans tells us a very simple method to avoid exciting the audience and at the same time give the most efficient help to the person who has fainted, and it would be well for every manager in the country thoroughly to understand this first-aid treatment and see that every employe also knows just what to do as well as what not to do. I am, therefore, giving you the article herewith in its entirety.

The house was dark. A young girl and her escort were leaving. They had reached the back of the auditorium and were making their way toward the door. The girl stopped and leaned against the wall. She murmured that she was about to faint, and then crumpled up and slid to the floor. A physician entered the theater in time to hear the young lady say that she was about to faint. He helped to ease her to the floor. He straightened out her body so that the vessels of her neck were not pinched. Presently the young lady's pulse began to beat at the wrist. About this time the escort wanted to get a cup of water. But what was the use? The young lady was beginning to become conscious. He then wanted to get a glass of whisky. But what good could that do? The color began to appear in the young lady's face. She opened her eyes and looked around in semi-consciousness.

And at this time things began to happen. Someone had gotten word to the head usher. He came running up. Without stopping to make any inquiries or observations, he grabbed the young lady in his arms and, throwing her head over his shoulder, he carried her out somewhere, presumably to the ladies' retiring room. The position in which the young lady was carried was against the man's right side with her head bent on her chest, hanging over his right shoulder. I judge that his theory was that he would get her out of the auditorium in order to prevent a gathering mob and perhaps a panic. As it was, not over six persons saw the fainting and were aware of what subsequently happened.

And now let us see what harm might have resulted from the foolish act of the foolish man. When the heart fails to pump enough blood to the brain, fainting results. The only treatment needed for fainting is to permit the patient to lie flat in a comfortable position for a few minutes. If someone has some ammonia or smelling salts a whiff helps.

When this man lifted the girl into an upright position and threw her head over his shoulder, he did just exactly the worst thing he could have done. She had a right to faint again. Had she fainted, his act would have been the cause.

Suppose instead of a young girl in her late teens she had been a somewhat older woman with heart disease. The act of the usher could easily have killed her by causing her heart to stop beating. Suppose again, instead of a faint, the case had been one of apoplexy, the act of the usher would probably have caused death. In apoplexy blood is spurting into the brain from a broken artery. Manhandling the patient is likely to increase the outpour of blood.

So far as the usher knew, the young lady might have been suffering from either of these conditions. He rushed up in the dark, said nothing to anybody, grabbed the girl, threw her over his shoulder, and went out with her. Perhaps theater owners might prevent damage suits by having their head ushers join an American Red Cross class in first aid.

Here is a very frank letter from an exhibitor in San Francisco who is connected with the largest chain of theaters on the Pacific coast. He evidently thinks the reviews are all wrong from start to finish, but gives reasons for his convictions and backs them by his own idea of a remedy. I hope this manager has read what we said on this phase of the subject in MOTOGRAPHY of June 3 and 10.

I would like to voice my opinion in this all-around argument for and against the reviews as now written and say that we read the reviews, but do not depend upon them in choosing a program, for the reason that we have found the reviews to be unreliable, and the only way to properly select programs is to personally observe the subject itself.

The reason that the reviews are unreliable is, according to our opinion, that the reviewers either do not know what is a good subject and what is a bad subject or else the reviewers are afraid to say that a subject is a poor one when they review it. The subjects in the reviews are either highly praised, moderately praised or simply commented upon and very, very seldom criticised in any serious manner or condemned.

If you desire a conscientious review and are willing to print a conscientious review, regardless of whom it hits, we would suggest that you arrange with someone who is booking films for a theater, who has the ability to not only justly praise, criticise and condemn, but also the ability to express the reasons why in print, and engage that person or persons to write your reviews and write them under a nom de plume, because we do not think that you will be able to get a straightforward criticism from anyone connected with the business, who knows that he is apt to bring some manufacturer or film exchange down upon his head on account of an adverse criticism, and besides, for the sake of obtaining a fair review, it is advisable to keep the name of the person or persons reviewing from the producers or distributors of the subject, as it means money in the pocket of a distributor or producer to obtain a favorable criticism, and the reviewer and the manufacturer, producer or distributor must be kept apart in order to insure fair, reliable, conscientious criticisms.

This seems to be our week for adverse criticisms. Here is another friend who does not like all we are doing and is kind enough to point out the facts to us. These animadversions are always most welcome, for they show in just what particular we are failing to hit the mark at which we are aiming. Criticisms which praise and do not find fault, while they may encourage, are not really helpful; what we want to know is, where we fall short, and why.

This exhibitor operates in West Lafayette, Indiana, and has very good opinions on what the smaller town manager needs.

In reading the different trade journals from issue to issue, I find them very lacking in information regarding the basic principles upon which the small town theaters should be run. Also the editorials and write-ups are lacking in the practical experiences required for the average small town exhibitor. They are, however, quite handy to keep informed as to the current and future releases and also the helps concerning projection.

As an illustration, the music required for the big city houses is not necessary and again cannot be afforded.

These helps seem to be all in favor of the city houses. And I think if a careful diagnosis of the case be taken it will be found that all the revenue derived from pictures is not obtained from the cities. I am basing my argument on towns of 10,000 to 50,000 inhabitants.

I think I am voicing the sentiment of the largest majority of moving picture exhibitors.

If the authors of the articles on helps to exhibitors would get into the smaller towns and acquaint themselves with the existing conditions, a greater help would be derived.

Being a city exhibitor myself, perhaps I have been prone to state my ideas more from this standpoint, and if so, I stand reproved. It has not been my intention to do so, and perhaps one reason is that more of the larger exhibitors have presented their problems to me for solution than the smaller ones. If this manager, and any others who are working in the smaller towns, will tell me just what subjects they would like treated in this department, and just what problems they are having to solve at the present time, I will be very glad to be of what assistance I can, and will endeavor to keep in mind the fact that it is the smaller town viewpoint that is required.

I do not agree with this theater man entirely, however, in that he thinks the descriptions of the activities of the larger houses are of no benefit to him. Even if you are working in a smaller sphere, do you not aspire to have the best possible, and cannot you work along the same lines as your city brother, but make them conform to your conditions?

For example, take this same musical program which you mention. Of course, you are not engaging a large orchestra, for your house could not support it, but you have at least a pianist, and perhaps one other instrument. But with the piano alone, if your musician has any ideals, she endeavors to make her music fit the picture, and if she can read in the trade journals just the musical program which the big theaters used to accompany a certain film, can she not use a part at least of the same airs when the play is shown in your house? With the first showing of the film she can practice her music with it and make it as interpretative as possible, and she is helped in knowing which airs will be best adapted to this play, because she has read of the musical accompaniment rendered by the large orchestra in the city theater.

This same principle holds true with the other phases of the management. If you hear of worthwhile programs, or special "stunts" which the larger theaters have tried and found successful, does it not inspire you to attempt something of a similar nature in your theater on a scale to meet your conditions? If you get ideas or inspiration from reading of these, is not that alone excuse enough for their being published?

I also do not agree with this writer entirely in his claim that all the write-ups are lacking in practical experience for the average small-town exhibitor. Take, for example, the department, "What Theater Men Are Doing," which appears each week in MOTOGRAPHY, and in which are published the letters of the managers telling what they are doing in their theaters. I believe a count of these would show that a large percentage are from the smaller towns and describe the trials, tribulations and successes of the smaller theater man.

Take also the "Split Reel" department in MOTOGRAPHY, which gives information regarding managers all over the country; here also a large per cent is devoted to news of the towns of 1,000 and 5,000 which the writer mentions.

Vim Comedies

The Vim comedies with their slogan of "slapsticks and stories" have struck the popular keynote. Slapstick is popular to a certain extent but too much of any good thing is distasteful. The moving picture public has been educated to the extent that they do not care to have a series of incidents carrying no plot whatever presented to them. They want the humor but at the same time they demand the reason back of it. In the latest Vim releases "The Brave Ones" and "Home Made Pies," this combination of pie-throwing and plot is well combined and the result is both laughable and pleasing. The champion pie-thrower also has to be able to extricate himself from some good plot situations and the result is comedies of a high character.

Splendid Screen Results

The Picture Theater Equipment Company again proved that it is in a class by itself by its latest installation of projection machines, special screen, and its own special condensing and projection lens system that was installed in the new Rialto theater in New York. This is considered the finest theater in the world, and was erected and is directed by S. L. Rothapfel, the peer of all managers, known to MOTOGRAPHY readers for his "First Aid to Theater Men" department.

The screen results obtained at the new Rialto are the finest in detail we have seen in many a day, and we must compliment the Picture Theater Equipment Company on its progressiveness in showing the moving picture trade that it can produce such fine results in the world's finest photoplay house.

Unicorn Opens Office

The Unicorn Film Service Corporation has opened offices at 414 Belmont Building, Cleveland.

The manager of this new concern is L. C. Gross, who was formerly connected for many years with the General Film Company and whose wide and intensive experience bode well for the success of the young company. Exchange men, exhibitors and the trade in general wish for the Unicorn a rapid and healthy growth.

The executives of the Lubin Company are close readers of current Mexican news. They have a contract with the elusive Mr. Villa to fill the leading role in a five-act photoplay feature, "The Star of Mexico." A company of players enlisted from the California and Philadelphia studios of the Lubin Company, was to be sent to Mexico this month to support Villa, but for obvious reasons the company is still on this side of the border.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

JUST what kind of a speech would you make to your audience if your lights were suddenly cut off some night? It happened the first of June at the Empress, of 6228 South Halsted street, Chicago. The wires were cut by electrical laborers involved in a strike.

The exchange men of New Orleans have organized an anti-censorship association, with headquarters in the V. L. S. E. Exchange.

The Motion Picture Board of Trade of America has already announced that it will hold its 1917 exposition at Madison Square Garden, New York.

The children's morning matinees inaugurated at Montclair, N. J., by the Montclair Better Films Committee have been suspended for the summer but will be resumed in the fall.

Harrish Ingraham, prominent in the film world as an actor and director, has been engaged at the David Horsley studios and will be seen in support of the co-stars, Margaret Gibson and William Clifford, in forthcoming Centaur dramas.

Following "Flames of Vengeance," the Gaumont company will release "The Spatulate Thumb," a melodrama written by Lionel Barrymore and Wright Huntington. The leading roles will be taken by Alexander Gaden and Miss Iva Shepard.

R. J. Ball of Finlay, North Dakota, owns a house there and one at Anita. The former village has 500 inhabitants and the latter 600. He recently ran Universal's "The Black Box" a week at each house and cleared $150 on each theater.

The dearth of moving picture machine operators in Europe, owing to the war, is being taken care of by classes formed for women students. In many theaters lady operators are now being employed and are giving the utmost satisfaction.

The manager of the Broadway Theater, Tuscon, Arizona, advises that he is receiving the best results from a carefully selected mailing list and makes it a point to send out copies to people who have never attended his theater, and in a majority of cases they respond.

Charles L. Sawyer, candidate for congress from the fifth Minnesota district, has inaugurated a novelty in campaign speechmaking which ought to bring him the vote. Mr. Sawyer's scheme is to put on an outdoor motion picture show and between the reels deliver his campaign address.

C. W. Sawin, manager of the V. L. S. E. exchange at Minneapolis, received word from the New York headquarters that all employes of his exchange, according to their length of service, shall take from one to two weeks' vacation this summer with full pay in advance. Needless to say there are some happy people around the exchange office.

James Keough, manager of the Strand Theater, Minneapolis, advertised "Where are my Children" most extensively. One of the schemes put into operation was the running of several pieces of title, short scenes and special announcements about the feature on a DeVrie machine in the window of a downtown store.

The program of Ascher's Lakeside Theater, Chicago, Illinois, has a very artistic cover design, and is printed in blue on white stock. Matinee and evening performances are held every day. A variety is given the patrons as Triangle, Metro, Paramount, Fox and Bluebird subjects are shown. On June 11, Sunday, big houses were attracted by Chaplin's "Police," and the splendid Triangle comedy drama, "Reggie Mixes In," with Douglas Fairbanks.

The Princess, Emerson, Empress, Oak Park, Vesta, New Central and Glenwood Palace theaters, all located in Minneapolis, have booked "Ten Nights in a Bar Room" in human voice talking pictures, which were produced by the Photo Drama Company and assembled especially for Mr. and Mrs. Lee Craig.

Tom Foster, manager of the Star Theater, Stanley, Wisconsin, conceived a very clever idea to advertise "The Girl and the Game," when shown at his theater. He erected a compo board engine in front of the theater which looked as if it would chug right down the sidewalk. Mr. Foster says the novelty brought record-breaking crowds.

Twenty-two ministers, members of the Chicago Church Federation, recently held a meeting and drafted resolutions protesting to the city council against the repeal of the ordinance prohibiting motion picture theaters within 200 feet of a church. The Harper theater, which was closed by the ordinance, has raised the question of a repeal.

The Woman's Political Equity League of Chicago has been making a city-wide campaign to expose exhibitors who persist in showing immoral moving pictures and thereby force manufacturers to produce cleaner and better films. The league has just issued a report giving the V. L. S. E., Inc., first place in the list of producers working toward that end.

At the Philharmonic Hall, London, was recently given a matinee performance of "The Dumb Girl of Portici" to assist Lady Arthur Paget's international scheme to collect a million pounds in order to provide permanent homes in France and England for soldiers blinded in the war. This matinee was one of the greatest society functions of the year and brought out a brilliant audience including the Royalty.

D. Primm and R. E. Doak, owners of the Grand Theater, Springfield, Illinois, have interpolated a novelty in their program in the form of a reel of film from 500 to 1,000 feet in length showing all the interesting local happenings for the week previous. These local pictures are proving great pullers. Messrs. Primm and Doak are also officers of the Box Film Company, which makes this novelty possible.

Mary Grey Peck, formerly an English teacher at the University of Minnesota, was one of the most influential speakers before Governor Whitman when the censorship bill was presented. Miss Peck said it was practically impossible for a government or state board to be able to censor films and do justice. She pointed out that one-fifth of the moving picture audiences were made up of children and stated that the motion pictures were as necessary as books, and told of the national board of revue and the results of two years of investigation into the censorship problem.

The splendid little magazine issued by the J. H. Kunsky Theatrical Enterprizes of Detroit, carries, in the latest number, an editorial invitation to its readers to send in criticisms of the plays shown at the company's houses. This should result in a valuable spirit of co-operation as there are fans enthusiastic enough and with leisure enough to jot down their opinions.

The hole punched in the top of the advance program card of the Metropolitan theater of Iowa Falls, Iowa, is a mighty good idea. The program is about the size of a post card and we can just imagine stenogs, housewives and clerks slipping it on a pin somewhere. It carries a whole month's program, with a line for each day's bill. Ellsworth and Jones, Inc., owns the house.

Literally springing out of the ground comes the new military town of Angus Plains, Ontario. The Canadian Government, acting on orders from Sir Sam Hughes, purchased the land about this town, and 35,000 soldiers will go into training there during the summer months, at least. Two motion picture shows will be opened at Angus Plains to amuse the soldier boys, and they are sure to do a rushing business.

H. M. Berman, manager of the Buckeye Film Company of Cincinnati, has been arrested, charged by the secretary of the Federated Catholic Societies with failing to obey the elimination orders of the Ohio board of censors. He was fined $300 and costs. Berman stated that on account of his recent arrival in the city he did not have a list of rejected films. "Dad's Doings and Dirty Dollars" is the film that caused all the trouble.

The V-L-S-E branch at Kansas City, Missouri, has for some time been getting out a unique little four-page sheet, "for and by" its exhibitors in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Indiana, Tennessee and Kentucky. E. R. Pearson is manager and L. J. Scott editor. The distinctive title of the interesting little paper is The Big Four Clansman. The last issue especially congratulates the DesMoines Screen club on its splendid ball during the recent picture convention.

M. E. Scott, president of the Safety Projector and Film Company of Minneapolis has announced that some time this coming summer he will open a $100,000 factory at Duluth for the manufacture of motion picture projection machines and motion picture films. Mr. Scott has just perfected his machine after two years of experimenting and has a machine which can be operated by connecting it with an ordinary electric light sprocket and in this way it can be used in schools, churches and homes by merely using the projector.

Howard S. Clemmer, of the Clemmer theater, Spokane, Washington, again has lived up to his reputation of being one of the "live wire" showmen by pinning a five dollar check to an application for membership to the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, which was printed in Motography, and sending it to the Chicago headquarters of the league. Mr. Clemmer now is one of the active members and will do everything in his power to boom the League in the northwest.

From Springfield, Vermont, comes to us the concise black and white program issued every week by the Ideal theater. This house charges 15 cents admission on Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays and 10 cents the rest of the time. Children pay five cents at the matinees and regular prices at the other shows. Mutual, Metro, General and Universal are the programs run, and "The Mysteries of Myra," International, has been put on recently.

The Strand Theater of Altoona, Pennsylvania, has set the pace in regard to publicity for a new theater. When the Strand was opened it had a ten-page section called "The Strand Theater Supplement," in the Altoona Times. The front page was taken up with a big line cut of the front of the theater. The other pages were filled with large space ads by the different firms connected with the Strand's construction. Silverman Brothers are proprietors of the new house, which will run Paramount and Triangle features. A Wurlitzer Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra will furnish the musical settings.

From The Bioscope comes information of a most ingenious advertising scheme used by J. Alexander, Trafalgar Cinema, Greenwich, London, whereby he induces his patrons to take care of the monthly card he issues by making it a free accident insurance coupon for £100. The card is a single folder—5 inches by 3 inches. The frontispiece is well displayed and advises the recipient to carry the card with him, as the "holder is entitled to free accident insurance." The two inside leaves are devoted to a list of exclusives for the month, with a few explanatory lines to each title, while the back page carries the insurance coupon. Now, as to the value of the card there cannot possibly be the slightest doubt, and its success is due to the fact that it institutes a mutual arrangement between recipient and advertiser.

L. J. Burkitt, manager of the Lyric Theater, Morrison, Illinois, sends us one of the first issues of his program with an apology at its lack of merit, stating that the printer had only seven hours to set it up, run it and put in the staples. There is positively no apology needed for it is a very good program about three by five and made up of eight pages and cover. Besides the regular weekly program it carries a generous supply of advertising. Some of the slogans on the front cover are worth repeating: "We make this our business—that is why we get the business"; and "It isn't the number of reels you try to see, it is the quality of the reels you see and the way they are projected."

Good Material the Present Neea

BY THOMAS DIXON.

Author "The Birth of a Nation" and "The Fall of a Nation."

MATERIAL—that is the present need of the industry. The managers and producers of films must come to a realization of it, if they have not already done so, and it is only by obtaining authors of creative ability to supply the necessity that they can hope to survive. In the beginning men who made pictures were satisfied to take bits here and there, putting them together to make their screen stories. But that source is exhausted. Henceforth real writers must supply the material. The mechanical end of the business has outgrown the other tremendously. Photography, direction, acting, scenic effects—all these are superior. But the material is lacking.

In the effort to make up for the lack of material the companies have tried to make the big names of stars answer for the shortcomings in the matter of stories. But it won't do; as I said before, "the play's the thing."

I believe the cinema is the most wonderful medium that has ever been found by which to get thought across to the people, to convey an idea or propaganda. Today we have the censorship evil confronting us, and it is a great problem. It can be met in only one way. The people must be brought to realize that the screen is simply another form of publicity. It is as great an advance over Gutenberg as his printing process was over the quill pen. It is limitless. Things can be done with the cinema that the stage could never hope to do. Yet I believe that the dramatic principles involved are precisely the same as those of the spoken play.

The future of the business depends entirely upon the quality of the output—not the quantity. I believe there has been a large overproduction, because the ideas of many producers run to footage. Pictures are being ground out by the millions of feet, and too often the quality is sacrified. It must be so; where is the material coming from? The only successful plan will be to produce pictures on an author's royalty basis.

But, to my mind, the art of the cinema is just dawning. The greatest things are yet to come; no one probably has as yet begun to realize the full potentialities of the screen. A novel is cold; a spoken play is limited—but the screen can portray as nothing else could ever do the emotions of mankind, and in a manner that will get a grip upon the spectator beyond the power of any other form of dramatic presentation. It is, in short, so fascinating, so interesting, that one feels as if he never wished to stop working at it.

But let me repeat, as emphatically as I may, that good material is absolutely the secret of success, and the present crying need of the screen, and I believe that there is today an opportunity for authors such as has never before existed.

The Photoplay Writer

BY MAURICE TOURNEUR.

Vice-President, Paragon Studios.

THE photoplay writer is not only a very essential factor in the art of producing motion pictures, but, in many instances, is the most important. The film producers realize that without him it would be impossible for them to continue. And this importance, of necessity, has created the desire in countless thousands to fill the apparent gap.

The inevitable hope of every writer, when shattered by the return of his script, results in the very familiar cry of "stupidity" or "plagiarism." As a matter of fact, the producer is just as anxious to purchase the script that he feels will be acceptable to the exhibitor and the motion picture playgoer as the author is to sell.

The author should realize that the producer must keep in constant touch with the requirements of the market, for while the vampire and sex-problem photoplays may be ever so popular today, he has to use keen judgment in selecting such stories as will be most acceptable to the trade in his judgment when his current production will be released.

In many instances, therefore, if a careful analysis of the story that has been returned, marked "not suitable for our requirements" is made, the author will undoubtedly realize that the story contains situations that are either too foolish to be considered or impossible to be entertained, because of their exaggerations.

The fear of the inexperienced author that his story will be stolen unless copyrighted is totally unwarranted, for it is only the constant encouragement given by manufacturers to authors that has made the whole thing possible. It can be readily ascertained that the majority of authors devote their efforts to this very lucrative field of endeavor merely as a pastime.

Many of the large producing companies pay enormous salaries to their story writers—in one instance I understand that over twenty thousand dollars per year is paid to an author who has been engaged in this field for not more than two years. Writing for the screen is a legitimate and serious business, and its importance is recognized by the manufacturer.

In only a few instances are stories let out by contract to well-known writers; in the case of serials it takes the master mind of the experienced writer to conceive a story that will hold interest and continuity to such a degree that the audience will eagerly await the screening of the succeeding episodes.

I would take the liberty, therefore, of suggesting to the author who is making honest efforts to succeed with his work that he apply himself particularly to the composition of five-reel photoplays, for which there is an enormous demand. Stories of the artistic type are generally desired. Avoid the gruesome as much as possible. The dramatic story that sparkles with a little touch of humor throughout is in great demand.

The success of the exhibition of motion pictures is primarily due to the lessons that have and can be taught on the screen, and you must always bear in mind that the patrons of the motion picture houses, in the majority, consist of the middle class, whose education in many instances has been scant. It is therefore up to those who have the education and ability to write to devote such time and thought to their endeavors so that those who see the screening of their work will benefit by it in mind and soul, and when this is done the compensation will undoubtedly be ample for both the teacher and the earner.

The Story Makes the Picture

By Cecil B. De Mille.

Director General, Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company.

THE length of the motion picture of the future is a much discussed question, but I do not think there is anyone who can really answer this question at the present time. The fact is, however, that all this question of length, footage, time of presentation, etc., is wholly dependent upon the very foundation of the dramatic side of motion pictures. That foundation rests simply and wholly in the one word—story. You can take the finest cast of actors that was ever assembled, spend money lavishly on an elaborate production, photograph the entire assemblage exquisitely, and unless the story you have to tell is a good one, you have a failure on your hands. On the other hand, you can take bad actors, bad production, bad photography and have a good story and wild horses can't lead your audience away until the picture is finished.

Our great trouble has been to find writers who can produce this kind of photoplays. The dramatist seems to rely too much upon the spoken title, which is the voice of the actor to him. He has a tendency to sacrifice the thrilling scenes for some well-termed phrase to flash on the screen. The novelist seems unable to narrow his actions down to the limitations of the camera. He gives his descriptions and his characters too large a field in which to work. He describes some thrilling incident in such a manner that if it were photographed as written it would mean merely a waving of arms to the photodramatic audience.

The new school of photodramtic writers seems to be coming from a younger generation. Newspaper men and women seem to be especially well qualified for this work. I cannot set my finger on the exact reason why, but such seems to be the case. Our two best photodramatic authors are still in their twenties and they are both graduates from the newspaper college. Their feet, of course, had to be placed in the proper path and their footsteps guided at first by a trained dramatist, but as soon as they grasped the dramatic construction they were able to go ahead and produce excellent results. The perfect photodrama has as yet not been written, for the same reason that as yet the great American drama has not appeared on the stage.

As I said in the start, photodramatic writing is a new field, and I feel confident that in the not distant future it will have its Pinero, Jones, Thomas and perhaps a Shakespeare.

Wants 1,000 Scenarios

In a special letter to Motography, Herbert Blache states:

I am willing to pay $1,000 apiece for good dramatic scenarios. In fact, I would rather pay $1,000 to good feature writers who will give me first choice of their work than a lesser sum. But I must have first choice and the work must be the writer's best. I have no objection to writers who sell $1,000 stories to me writing for as many other producers as they please, but they must first present all their dramatic themes to me if they want $1,000 right along for their plays. With that simple understanding, I am willing to give $1,000 for every dramatic theme I can use, and I accordingly hope to surround myself with the best staff of scenario contributors in the country.

Madame and Herbert Blache will shortly open their Greater Blache Studios adjoining the present Blache-Solax studio on Lemoine avenue, Fort Lee, New Jersey. The Greater Blache Studios will produce dramatic features for World and Pathe, in addition to the programs with whom they have present arrangements. It is due to this additional production work—which starts the moment the new studios are opened—that Mr. Blache needs so many good scenarios of the strictly feature order and is willing to pay $1,000 apiece for them. A spirited effort is being made to interest all the bigger writers of moving picture scenarios, but the figure will be as cheerfully paid to an unknown as if he can write "big" stuff.

Thomas A. Edison, Inc., 2826 Decatur avenue, Bedford Park, N. Y.—The motion picture division wishes exceptional material for five-reel features and two-reel comedies. For five-reel subjects big, human dramatic stories that are plausible and free from morbidity, desired; for comedies, stories preferably of the comedy drama type, with wholesome situations rather than incidents to furnish laughs.

Fox Film Corporation, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York, N. Y.—We are always in the market for good, strong, five-reel, modern dramas, comedy dramas or good western stories, same to be submitted in a five or six-page synopsis form.

Gaumont Company, Congress avenue, Flushing, N. Y.—We are in the market for three-reel feature dramas. Strong subjects with an unusual twist are desired. Comedies, political stories, western stories, newspaper stories and college stories are not wanted.

Kalem Company, 235 West Twenty-third street, New York City.—Always pleased to consider scenarios from capable authors. Our requirements are constantly changing. At the present time our dramatic subjects are in the nature of series especially prepared. We are always pleased to consider one-reel comedies in line with our policies.

National Drama Corporation, Los Angeles, Cal.—We are producers of feature plays only on subjects which the public is interested in, which subjects, if properly treated, can demand standard theatrical prices, and for this reason are not entertaining the common scenarios which are usually produced for the ten-cent movie.

Pallas Pictures, New York, N. Y.—We are not in the market for any original photoplays, our productions being confined to the filmization of well-known books and plays.

Vitagraph Company of America, Fifteenth street and Chestnut avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.—At the present time we are interested in dramas of three reels and upwards of a modern trend and one-reel comedies. We like the stories to be interesting and up-to-date, something to keep the audience from the time it is first put on the screen until the story ends. Be assured anything submitted to us, filling the above requirements, will be gladly considered, and I promise you quick decision. Kindly enclose stamped, addressed envelope for return of your manuscript in case it does not suit our requirements.

Mutual Program Dotted with Stars

AUDREY MUNSON, KOLB AND DILL AND OTHERS SOON TO APPEAR

ANNOUNCEMENT has been made by the Mutual Company that the title of the Mutual Masterpicture, "A Man's Soul," has been changed to "The Inner Struggle"; and the American Mutual release "Circumstantial Evidence," to "Convicted of Murder."

Mary Miles Minter's first appearance in her new connection will be in a picturization of "Youth's Endearing Charm," by Maybelle Heickes Justice. In this play the young star plays the role of a pathetic little orphan which is very well suited to her talent.

"Purity," the seven-act allegorical feature starring Audrey Munson, is now ready for the cutting room and the director and players at the American-Mutual studios have begun work on a number of features running from one to five reels in length.

Chief among the five-reel productions is "The Sign of the Spade," featuring Helene Rosson. Alan Forrest will make his initial appearance in this play, appearing opposite Miss Rosson in a juvenile role.

"A Million for Mary," is another five-reel subject, and is the first of the comedy-drama features starring Kolb and Dill, the noted character men of vaudeville. The story was prepared especially for the introduction of this pair of mirth-makers to Mutual followers.

William Russell essays a double role in "The Man Who Would Not Die," another five-reel feature. The story was written by Mabel Condon and is being directed by Mr. Russell, assisted by Jack Prescott. Charlotte Burton takes the chief supporting role.

Still another five-part production, "Dust," will present Winnifred Greenwood and Franklin Ritchie in the chief roles, supported by Harry Von Meter and Louise Lester.

Among the two-reel subjects are "Pastures Green," in which Alfred Vosburg, Vivian Rich and George Periolat are the principal players; "Sandy—Reformer," a Mustang contribution in which Art Acord and Nita Davis essay the leading roles; "Castles in Spain," featuring Edward Coxen, Lizette Thorne and George Field; "The Good for Nothing Kid," in which Frank Borzage appears as the kid; "Fear," presenting Frank Borzage, Anna Little and Jack Richardson; "Love's Bitter Strength" and "Like a Knight of Old," Edward Coxen, Lizette Thorne and George Field having the chief parts in the former and Art Acord and Nita Davis in the latter.

Starting June 19 the Mutual Film Corporation will release a series of six productions featuring Florence Turner which will be known as the Florence Turner series of Mutual star productions. The first of this series will be "Far from the Maddening Crowd," to be followed on July 20 by "Doorsteps;" "The Welsh Singer" to be released August 17; "The First Settler's Story," Stepmber 14; "Shop Girls," October 12; and "Redeemed," on November 9. In the supporting cast will be seen Henry Edwards, Campbell Gullan and Malcolm Cherry of the Royalty Theater, London.

Above are the noted German vaudeville comedians Kolb and Dill, who will be seen in a series of American Mutual comedies. The Grecian dancer is Iva Shepard, Gaumont-Mutual vampire.

Iva Shepard will appear in "The Criminal's Thumb," a three-part Gaumont feature for release June 22. Miss Shepard is very versatile, having appeared in many productions on the legitimate stage as well as many screen plays, is a classic dancer, and as clever at comedy as in the vampire roles which she has been depicting. Alexander Gaden is playing the other principal role.

Miss Shepard has isued a denial of the rumors that she is to desert the screen during June and July to dance in outdoor Shakesperian pageants, for although she is a beautiful classic and interpretative dancer, her contract with the Gaumont-Mutual company calls for her acting in photoplays released during the period when she has been invited to dance in these open air entertainments.

A variety of subjects are ready for release during the week of June 19. The two-part features are lead by the American production, "A Gentle Conspiracy," in which Vivian Rich and Alfred Vosburgh have the chief roles; Mustang contributes "A Modern Knight," with Art Acord and Nita Davis; and Centaur stars Margaret Gibson and William Clifford with the Bostock animals in "The Siren of the Jungle."

Comedy releases for the week comprise "Ruffhouse," with Rube Miller and "The Iron Mitt," with Ben Turpin from the Vogue studios; "The House on Hokum Hill," presenting Carol Halloway and John Sheehan, and "The Day's Work," starring Oral Humphrey, Beauty offerings; and Cub contributes "Jerry's Elopement" with George Ovey in the title role.

Mutual Weekly No. 77 and See America First will be released June 21, while Reel Life will go to the public on June 25.

Juanita Hansen, the star of "The Secret of the Submarine," owes her fame wholly to her own personality and her own work. She may well be proud of the celebrity that has come to her for she never sought it otherwise than by earnest, conscientious endeavor in her profession. Miss Hansen is always in search of thrilling adventures. She is an enthusiastic motorist and delights in driving her car at breakneck speed, and also is very fond of dancing, riding and tennis.

Mary Miles Minter Feted

Mary Miles Minter, the American-Mutual child star, was given a most enthusiastic reception on her arrival in Los Angeles. Led by the mayor, a crowd of residents and motion picture people met her at the station, and after an address of welcome delivered by the mayor Miss Minter and her mother, Mrs. Charlotte Shelby, were taken to the bungalow which was built and furnished especially for them by the American company. A parade of 162 automobiles acted as escort.

Mary Miles Minter, New American Star.

A monster banquet was given in honor of the small star by the studio people, followed by a reception at which motion picture players from all around Los Angeles assembled to meet the new member of the American family. After the reception a tour of the studios was made, and as a token of comradeship her fellow players insisted that Miss Minter be delegated to open the new concrete dressing quarters at the plant. This the new star did, with a brief speech and the crash of a bottle of Mum's against the door of the chief entrance.

Miss Minter has already begun work on her first American-Mutual production which will be released shortly under the title of "Youth's Endearing Charm." This is a picturization of Maibelle Heickes Justice's story, and in it Miss Minter plays the role of a little orphan bound out to a cruel family of farmers.

Auto Accident in "Gloria's Romance"

When George Kleine's publicity department announced that the new motion picture novel "Gloria's Romance," in which Billie Burke is the featured star, was going to be free from sensationalism and "stunts," it must have been ignorant of the happenings in chapter five of the Rupert Hughes story, for that installment of the novel contains one of the most realistic and convincing automobile accidents that has ever been screened.

The supposed "accident" is so absolutely realistic that "oh's" and "ah's" of amazement are sure to go up from whatever audience beholds it. A new character in the story—one Gideon Trask—is seen running down the street in pursuit of the disappearing automobile, in which is seated Richard Freneau, the villain of the production.

Trask's eyes are fixed so intently on the car ahead that he fails entirely to note the big touring car which is rushing toward him from a side street. The big car swerves out into the avenue, the driver catches sight of Trask and seeks to avoid him, but the touring car is hitting up such a pace and Trask is rushing along at such headlong speed that neither can turn aside for the other. A moment later and we see Trask hurled forty feet away, to roll over limp on the pavement.

Director William P. S. Earle of the Vitagraph Company of America is working on "The Battle Cry of War," under the personal supervision of Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, who wrote the picture with Cyrus Townsend Brady. In the cast are such notable players as Harry T. Morey, Alice Joyce, Joseph Kilgour, James Morrison, Dorothy Kelly, Naomi Childers, Templer Saxe, Walter McGrail, Edward Elkas and Bobby Connelly.

MARY GARDEN IN PICTURES

William Fox Arranges for Her Appearance Next Spring in "Thais" Under Direction of Herbert Brenon

Mary Garden, the internationally famous prima donna, has at last surrendered to the lure of the screen, according to reports. A few days ago her manager, R. E. Johnston, took her to the William Fox offices to see Brenon's production, "The Daughter of the Gods," and so great was her admiration for the spectacle and the talent of the director that her capitulation was complete. Miss Garden stated that she had at last found a director who was an artist, and the man she would like to have direct her appearance on the screen.

Arrangements have practically been completed whereby the prima donna will start in February on the production of "Thais" in the Fox studios under the direction of Mr. Brenon.

Before sailing for France Miss Garden completed contracts to appear here next season in a series of from twelve to twenty concerts for which she will receive $2,500 a performance. In motion pictures it is said that she has been offered a sum more than twice as large as that received by any other artist of her class.

V. L. S. E. Plans for Big Summer

CLEVER SCHEME OF CO-OPERATION OF NEWSPAPER AND EXHIBITOR

WALTER W. IRWIN, general manager of the V. L. S. E., claims that the old theory that business in the film industry must necessarily fall off in the summer is a fallacy, and says that the members of the Big Four force are going to prove this even more conclusively this summer than they did last.

In Mr. Irwin's opinion it would be foolish to try to discount the fact that hot weather does tend to keep people away from the theaters. But on the other hand it is equally apparent that strong attractions and intelligent service may be used to counterbalance the influence of such weather. This is best proved by the fact that the legitimate theaters during the summer months turn their houses into moving picture shows and secure the best possible attractions they can obtain.

It is working along this theory that the V. L. S. E. means to show that summer months can be made just as profitable as any others. With such attractions already on hand as "Sherlock Holmes," "The Ne'er-Do-Well," "The Suspect," "Salvation Joan," "God's Country and the Woman," "The Law Decides," "Love's Toll," "Dollars and the Woman," and such features almost completed as Rex Beach's stories, "The Barrier," "The Silver Horde," and "The Iron Trail," from the Lubin company; Winston Churchill's novel, "The Crisis," from the Selig company; Ralph Ince's super-picture, "The Combat," from the Vitagraph company, and William Gillette in his other success, "Secret Service," as well as other forthcoming productions, including Lillian Walker in a Vitagraph Blue Ribbon feature, "The Man Behind the Curtain"; Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno in "The Shop Girl," by C. N. and A. M. Williamson, another Vitagraph offering; Kathlyn Williams, Edith Johnson and Guy Oliver in a Selig Red Seal play, "The Valiants of Virginia"; Orrin Johnson in a Lubin play called "The Light at Dusk," and Lewis S. Stone and Marguerite Clayton in an Essanay production entitled "According to the Code," there is no reason why the contention should not be proven to the satisfaction of all.

As a result of their recent campaign in Chicago to expose exhibitors who show immoral pictures and force manufacturers to produce this class of plays, the Women's Political League reported that the Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay, Inc., held first place in the list of producers working toward cleaner and better plays.

A. W. Goff, assistant general manager of the V. L. S. E., has just returned from a tour of the middle-western cities and declares his opinion that the public will ultimately select the photoplays. He says the patrons are the ones who pay to see the films and they should have the say as to what they shall see. He believes that that choice of the public will make itself felt upon the producer and he will be forced to stage the sort of plays the majority demands.

Big Four Invades Milwaukee

Frank Redfield headed an army of representatives of the Big Four who descended upon Milwaukee for a three days' invasion. The Strand Theater was taken over for a series of private showings of the newest and latest films and the Wisconsin hotel was made headquarters for the social functions. Besides paving the way for future business relations with the exhibitors the campaign was unusually successful from the point of view of the signed orders received. A special campaign was handled for "God's Country and the Woman" and the department stores will co-operate with window displays of the book while the film is running. Mr. Troupe, Mr. Gallas and Mr. Lawrence shared with Mr. Redfield the honors for the success of the invasion.

In the preparedness parade recently held in New Orleans the showing of the moving picture industry was most notable. Over 200 managers and their forces were in line and each exchange represented turned out a full complement of men and women.

A striking example of the co-operation of newspapers and moving picture exhibitors is shown in the plan now being carried out by the manager of the Grand Opera House of Cincinnati and the Cincinnati Post. This is called a Sherlock Holmes "Hunt," and a prize of $100 will be given to the person capturing the famous detective. For several days before the advent of "Sherlock Holmes" advertisements and news items announced the coming of the film and then a character representing the famous person was set at large. The prize will be awarded to the first person who positively identifies him, providing he has with him at the time an issue of the Post. Daily stories of the "Hunt" with stills are being run in the Post and pictures are nightly being displayed at the Grand Opera House.

New Helene Rosson Play

Helene Rosson, peeress of histrions, is again seen to splendid advantage on the motion picture screen through the medium of a five-part masterpicture entitled, "The Abandonment," with E. Forrest Taylor in the principal masculine role.

Always charming and refreshing, Helene has steadfastly maintained her pleasing screen presence in every scene of this photoplay, as will be proven when released by the Mutual on June 22.

Leah Baird and two Japs in "Would You Forgive Her?" Vitagraph three-part feature scheduled for June 24.

A Round-the-World Serial?

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS TELLS ABOUT THE TRIANGLE PLAN

By Genevieve Harris.

"LOVE makes the world go round." Why not make love go round the world? Douglas Fairbanks wants to try it. If the Triangle plan to feature him in a serial is carried out, he wants it a serial which will encircle the globe. Nothing less! And in war time, too! A love story, or rather a series of love stories and adventures, of a young American throughout all countries, this, thinks Mr. Fairbanks, would be an undertaking sufficiently energetic to be interesting.

"You want the newest news?" said the popular comedian, when he stopped off in Chicago for a few hours, in the midst of a storm and the Republican convention, on his way from Los Angeles to New York. "Well, the latest about us is that we are going to produce a serial picture which will reach around the world. We are going to adventure straight through every country. This is the idea." With characteristic vigor and enthusiasm Mr. Fairbanks outlined the plot. "I'm to play the role of a young American who has a love affair in this country, gets 'turned down' and goes to Europe. First he goes to Holland. There he meets a girl who reminds him of the American girl (the same girl will play the parts, you see), and he falls in love with her. Then he goes to France and meets a French girl, also just like the American; and so on. That's the general idea. We haven't decided on the girl yet. We wanted Norma Talmadge, but the company had other plans for her. We may take Jewell Carmen, but this hasn't been decided. John Emerson and Alan Dwan will be the directors and they are already negotiating for studios abroad. And in each country the chap will have some adventures characteristic of the place. The whole thing will be in light comedy drama style."

Mr. Fairbanks did not seem worried about the effect of war time conditions on these plans. "We took a little trip into Mexico to finish up our last picture. We got a little taste of war there.

"How do I like work in pictures, generally? Say, it's great! Immense! I never found anything like it before," said the former Broadway idol who is now in the first rank of picture favorites. "I haven't been indoors for a year. Those western pictures are the finest to work in, the ones with a lot of hard riding and bucking bronchos and all that. I had played polo in the east, but it's not to be compared to the thrill of staying on a 'bad' broncho. We had lots of accidents taking the pictures, though the company took every precaution. When we found a horse with a bad reputation, we used to pick out a soft place to fall on, then try to ride the creature. We did this away from the studio. They don't like to have us take chances, you know. When they have us on a long contract, they rather hate to lose us," he explained.

In the five months which Douglas Fairbanks has been on the coast, he has played in five feature pictures. Finishing scenes for some of the later ones are to be made at the eastern studios. Mr. Fairbanks was accompanied on his trip by Mrs. Fairbanks and their young son. Director Alan Dwan has also gone to the eastern studio, where the Norma Talmadge company, under Director John Emerson, is working.

MOROSCO FAMILY ENLARGED

Courtney Foote and Elliot Dexter Added to Acting Forces—Dustin Farnum Begins Work on New Feature

To the large list of legitimate stars already appearing on the screen in the Oliver Morosco productions, have been added Courtney Foote and Elliot Dexter. Both of these players are well known to the moving picture public. Their first appearance under the Morosco brand will be made in "An International Marriage," now being produced with Rita Jolivet in the stellar role, which will be released early in July.

Vivian Martin, who but recently joined the Morosco force, has already started upon her first vehicle under this management to be released on the Paramount program. "Nell of Thunder Mountain" is the name of the play in which Miss Martin takes the title role. The company, under the direction of Frank Lloyd, is now in the San Bernardino mountains working on the outdoor scenes. The cast includes Edward Poil, William Jefferson, Jack Livingston, Louise A. Emmons, Alice Knowland, Herbert Standing and John McKinnon.

Edna Goodrich, Myrtle Stedman and Helen Jerome Eddy, Morosco-Paramount players, participated in the Actors' Fund Day at Ascot Speedway.

Dustin Farnum, after a short vacation, has commenced work on "The Parson of Panamint," an adaptation of the story by Peter B. Kyne. William D. Taylor is directing this play which is being produced in the Pallas Pictures studios. Winifred Kingston plays opposite Mr. Farnum and other principal parts are entrusted to Howard Davies, Herbert Standing, Colin Chase, Doc Cannon, Ogden Crane and Jane Keckley.

One of the outgrowths of the recent meeting of the delegates of the Federated Women's Clubs held in New York City, was the formation of the Photoplay League with an advisory committee of such prominent New Yorkers as Cornelius Vanderbilt, Adolph Lewisohn, Isaac N. Soligman, Mrs. J. Borden Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson and Mrs. James Speyer. At the first official meeting of this league the forthcoming Pallas release, "Davy Crockett," was shown as an example of the modern high grade pictures and received much favorable comment from Frank Lascolles, the lecturer of the evening.

Another Pallas picture shown to the women attending the convention was "David Garrick." A short address was given by Jane Stannard Johnson upon the subject of "Better, Cleaner Pictures," in connection with the showing of this film. In speaking of the play Miss Johnson said:

"The thing we look for first in a picture is the story, then the perfection of production. We have both in 'David Garrick' and we wish that all film subjects might so readily commend themselves to the consideration of women's clubs."

Looking Into July with Fox

NEW KALICH, BARA, FARNUM AND PEARSON PICTURES COMING

BERTHA KALICH, Virginia Pearson and June Caprice will be featured in three new William Fox releases for the month of July.

"Ambition" will be Bertha Kalich's vehicle for release on July 3. In this picture she will be supported by Kenneth Hunter, William H. Tooker and little Kittens Reichert.

"A Tortured Heart," to be released July 10, features Virginia Pearson, and in this film also will appear Stuart Holmes and Fuller Mellish.

"Caprice of the Mountains" will introduce the little new actress, June Caprice, with Harry Hilliard as her leading man. This will go to the public on July 17.

Other releases promised for the near future include Theda Bara, William Farnum, George Walsh and Anna Luther, carrying out the policy of this company to release one picture each month featuring these artists.

Valeska Suratt read recently in a Sunday newspaper that one of the ways of courting beauty was to always sing in your bath, and ever since she has practiced this beauty secret. While at the Savoy Hotel in London Miss Suratt occupied the suite next to an English peeress whose castle was noted for its leather-lunged ghosts. The noblewoman had confided that she rather missed her ghosts but the next morning when Miss Suratt started her bath and her usual song there was a great commotion in the next room the peeress had fainted, thinking her familiar ghosts had followed her to London.

"Fishin' time fellers!" It's safe to say Miss June Caprice, the Fox twinkler, will catch SOMETHING.

Bertha Kalich, the William Fox tragedienne, has had a course of training in a hard school and has fought her own way from the depths of poverty to affluence and reputation, and gives as the secret of her success the power to observe.

Noticing that the average actress looks her worst when she arrives at the end of a long journey, at which time she is often met by the populace and should be looking her best, Miss Kalich has tried to observe just why this condition exists. She believes she had discovered the fundamental reasons and gives a set of rules to be followed if one would always look beautiful. In these beauty hints she advocates a shampoo three days before starting on a journey, so that the hair is clean but manageable; wearing a hair net to keep in loose ends, which can be removed just before arriving at destination; having small squares of soft linen rags and a generous jar of cold cream to be used three times a day instead of soap and water for removing the grime; using powder in quantities as it is cooling and takes away the shiny, greasy look that is the most damaging blemish of all; having all toilet articles in one convenient receptacle so they will be easy to carry to the washroom; wearing dark colored silks made simply without high collars or much trimming instead of cloth suits; and making it a point to close your eyes for a part of the day even if it is impossible for you to sleep, as this relieves eye strain and prevents headaches.

Virginia Pearson will portray a character new to the screen in the dramatic picture on which she is now working—a western bandit-woman who is also a siren. In this part Miss Pearson has to be an expert dice thrower to give the impression of being an inveterate gambler. The correct manipulation of the dice has been a task for the star to accomplish and she practiced valiantly in her room with some beautiful little carved ivory dice which were brought her from Italy until she thought herself an adept. But woe awaited her in the studio where she went full of confidence in her dice-throwing ability, for the dice used in the scene were big yellowish lumps, not carved, dainty or anything they should have been and Miss Pearson's confidence was shattered; and she had to learn all over how to throw these clumsy cubes.

That Theda Bara can be as successful in other characters as in the vampire role was ably demonstrated when a delegation of the women attending the convention of women's clubs called at the Fox offices and asked if they might see Miss Bara. Expecting to see the vampirish vampire approach they could not believe their eyes when a gay little figure in the scarlet and gold costume of a vivandiere darted forward and presented herself as the renowned Theda. The actress instantly saw that the visitors were very much disappointed in her so she ran from the room and appeared shortly in the sable drapes of the screen siren. The club women could hardly be persuaded it was the same girl, but it was the one they had come to see. They were still further mystified when about fifteen minutes later a demure figure in the dove gray of a Quakeress came down the steps of the studio and proved to be Miss Bara as she appears when not in professional garb, for all of the actress' gowns this summer have a gray note.

One of the amusing experiences of June Caprice, the little Boston school girl whom William Fox is to make a noted photoplay star, is her recent fit of "blues." Observing the fad for hand painted hats in New York, she set about to hand paint her own pretty head decoration. All went well till she was caught in the rain and when she reached the studio the blue of the watercolor had descended in little wriggly trickles all over her face.

FILMING "WHO'S GUILTY?"

Octavia Handworth Creates New Adventuress Type—Director Howell Hansel Encounters Difficulties in Obtaining Western Atmosphere

Variety is always most welcome and one reason why Octavia Handworth has pleased the audience so greatly in Pathe's "Who's Guilty?" series has been through her original interpretation of an adventuress. The public has been satiated with the stereotyped adventuress—dark with solemn, sullen brooding eyes, a wicked woman of fixed and daring purpose. But Miss Handworth assumes none of these characteristics. She is a blond and gives rather the impression of subtle cunning and masterful design. So pleased has President Shallenberger of the Arrow Company been with Miss Handworth's characterization in "Sowing the Wind" that at the conclusion of the "Who's Guilty?" series he will present her in the stellar role of a feature drama now being written for her.

Many difficulties have to be surmounted in the production of every film and the director is called upon to exercise ingenuity in overcoming them. Howell Hansel and his company of Arrow players, led by Tom Moore and Anna Nilsson were recently in Ogdensburg, N. J., attempting to make some western scenes for "Sold Out," one of the "Who's Guilty?" photo-novels, but it rained all the time while they were trying to take exterior scenes around a typical mining shack. Despairing of ever having clear weather, and working on schedule time, Director Hansel was getting desperate. Then he solved his problem. He sought the owner of the shack and became owner himself, ordered the crew to take the hut apart, keep every piece, transport it to the studios at Yonkers and set it up in an empty lot nearby. Here the scenes were completed with the true "western" atmosphere. When interior scenes were required the shack was again knocked down and two walls assembled on the studio floor.

While taking scenes for this same picture Director Hansel had some very interesting experiences with the natives at Ogdensburg. They had never seen a moving picture in the making before and their work as "extras" was not very satisfactory. The general store proprietor kicked up the biggest row, however, when Eugene Cugnet, the French cameraman of the Arrow forces, went into the store to ask a favor. When the director demanded why the store keeper had raised such a riot he replied "Well, boss, what would you do if a French guy came into your store and asked whether he could take a moving picture of your cheese?"

In almost every one of the fourteen photo-novels in the Pathe series Tom Moore has had a real fight. Fighting comes easy to Mr. Moore but in "Sold Out," his opponent is Alan Hale who is about twice his size. After a hard tussle Hale got Moore down and lit in in earnest. Director Hansel interferred and expostulated that it was wrong to hit a man while he was down.

"Well, if you knew all the trouble I've been to to get him down," retorted Hale, "you wouldn't be talking like that. The next fight we have see that the script calls for him to lick me. It's a whole lot easier for both of us."

Floral Display in "Woman Who Dared"

The floral display which was awarded highest honors at the recent Marin County Flower Pageant held in California, has found its way into motion pictures.

This prize exhibit was arranged by Lohrmann, the San Rafael flower wizard from whom it was later secured by the California Motion Picture Corporation for use in the elaborate reception room set prepared for Beatriz Michelena in "The Woman Who Dared." These flowers are banked in the conservatory and are said to add decidedly to the lavished wealth of furnishings provided for the scene.

The set itself, according to advance reports, is one of the very largest and most pretentious ever built for the screen. After the other scenes had been finished for the picture, the stage was cleared and the full force of carpenters and helpers gave two whole weeks to this one set alone. It occupies every foot of the extensive stage room at the "California" plant.

The first of the Selig athletic series under the direction of J. H. Herman was shown in McVicker's Theater, Chicago, last week, and was continued as a headliner during the week. The Selig athletic series are released through V. L. S. E. and are something new. The series exploit the world's leading athletes in action.

Barney Bernard of "Potash and Perlmutter" fame is working on a five-part Blue Ribbon feature for the Vitagraph Company under the direction of Paul Scardon. Anita Stewart will be seen in the title role. Other prominent players in the cast are Marion Henry, James Morrison, Thomas R. Mills, Edward Elkas, Adele DeGarde and Mary Maurice.

International Releases News Pictorial

FOUR NEW STARS AND A CARTOONIST ADDED TO FORCE

ACTIVITIES are increasing every day at the International studios and the company is branching out in numerous ways. Four new stars have recently been added to the acting force. Mrs. Vernon Castle, the noted dancer, will soon begin work, and a cartoonist will hereafter create international animated cartoons.

Among the principal new branches is the Hearst's International News Pictorial, a new current events release, the first edition of which was released June 12, and which will be issued twice a week hereafter. The International will scour all parts of the world to gather the material for these current events. Representing the company with the Allies at Salonica is Aerial Varges; Nelson G. Edwards is now at Constantinople with the Turks and Germans and will contribute some unique battle engagments; Tracy Mathewson is with the United States punitive forces in Mexico, and is the only cameraman with General Pershing at present.

Mrs. Vernon Castle, undoubtedly America's most popular dancer, who is soon to appear in International productions.

Others who are helping to make this news release a success are E. B. Hatrick, who has personal charge of these films and has arranged for the automatic shipment of film from all parts of the world and has the new system so clearly defined that the releases will go out on time without a hitch; and J. K. Burger, manager of branch exchanges for the International, who will be enabled to infuse some radical and revolutionary ideas into the new pictorial with the assistance of the telegraph on account of affiliations and wire service with the various Hearst publications.

Director-General Paul Dickey is keeping everyone busy around the International studios; Harry Fox has been engaged to play comedies; and Betty Howe, popular star, formerly with the Vitagraph, will help him put the fun into the films.

Howard Estabrook, as the psychic detective in "The Mysteries of Myra," is doing his part to add to the growing popularity of this serial; and Jean Sothern, in the title role, is showing herself to be an accomplished actress in a difficult part.

Irene Castle is all ready to act for the International and is keeping Directory Dickey and his assistants working eighteen hours a day getting ready for her new picture.

Two other new faces soon to be seen in this program are Nigel Brown of "You're Here and I'm Here," fame; and Olive Thomas, who will soon appear in a drama.

J. K. Burger, manager of branch exchanges, has just returned from an extended western business trip and reports that "The Mysteries of Myra" is showing to an unprecedented business. Mr. Burger left immediately for Philadelphia, Washington and Atlanta, to compare the eastern business with the western.

The New York solicitors of the International Film Service, Inc., were recently entertained at luncheon at Rectors, by J. K. Burger. The luncheon was in honor of the inauguration of the new Hearst International News Pictorial. Fifteen film salesmen sat at the table.

Howard Estabrook can do other things besides act. A few of these accomplishments are playing golf, driving an automobile, sailing a boat, setting a broken arm, writing a story, playing a ukulele and staging a musical comedy. At a recent play at Cornell University Mr. Estabrook rewrote and staged an entire production and also played the leading part.

Another notable name to be added to the International list is Walter C. Hoban, cartoonist, and originator of the "Jerry on the Job" series seen on the funny page of the New York Journal, who will furnish animated cartoons for the International films. After Mr. Hoban finished his education he accepted a position on the Philadelphia North American where, as he expresses it, he "made borders for photographs of the 'murdered man' and chairs for the Wanamaker ad." After a while he was made sporting cartoonist and in 1913 joined the staff of the Hearst paper where he has been until his very recent engagement with the International.

Hereward Carrington, author of "The Mysteries of Myra," feature series, has had a most unusual and eventful life. To his father, an Anglo-Englishman, who served many years among the Yogi in India, he credits his leaning toward things psychic. At any rate at a very early age Mr. Carrington manifested a profound interest in mental philosophy and when only nineteen became a member of the Society for Psychical Research. At the age of twenty he went through a two-year course of study and training, during which time he spoke to no one and did not see five people, so that he might concentrate upon his studies and not allow his thoughts to wander. During another period of three years he lived entirely on fruits and nuts, reading in this time a thousand books a year on the subject of psychics, etc. Mr. Carrington has attended seances in almost every country and has also conferred with the most eminent psychics of the United States, France, Italy and England. He owns one of the most unique libraries in existence. It contains four thousand volumes of psychic lore.

Chicago's Selig studio will soon resume operations with the production of "The Prince Chap," under the direction of Marshall Neilan.

Fox's "A Daughter of the Gods," the Annette Kellerman spectacle filmed by Herbert Brenon in Jamaica.

"Fall of a Nation" Premier Praised

A great deal of interest has been manifested in the premier of "The Fall of a Nation," at the Liberty theater, New York City, and many surmises as to the success of combining an operatic score with a moving picture production. The first showing of this feature thoroughly convinced the audience of the greatness of the spectacle, the merit of the work, and the success of the pretentious musical score. The consensus of opinion was that the sequel was quite as wonderful as the twin, "The Birth of a Nation," and Victor Herbert's score was not only admirably adapted to the play but also a master composition in itself.

The picture is an example of the highest in photographic art, direction and acting, and contains many novel features which brought forth spontaneous applause from the audience. To Bartley Cushing belongs much of the honor for the superb directing but Thomas Dixon, himself, had a hand in many of the scenes and the touch of the master-mind is evident.

Although Mr. Dixon sought no stars, saying that he wanted to choose people who looked the parts to play them, still the acting is excellent, and the ensemble scenes were some of the most striking ever seen in a film drama.

The criticism was made by S. Stanwood Menken that the picture is manifestly anti-German. But Mr. Dixon repudiates this remark and says that no such idea was in his mind and the large number of German faces seen in the hosts of the invading army was due to the fact that five hundred Germans who were out of work applied to him for a job and he used them in the picture as they represented fairly well the varying types on Northern Europe which he imagined attacking America.

Coming World Productions

William A. Brady of the World Film Corporation has formed a happy blending of players of stellar magnitude, noted artists and casting of more than one star to each production, so that the casts balance in every instance.

Beginning with the first June release of the World Film, Ethel Clayton and Carlyle Blackwell characterize the program in "His Brother's Wife."

This is followed on June 12 by another two-star production, "The Perils of Divorce," with Frank Sheridan and Edna Wallace Hopper playing opposite each other.

June 19 will be an extreme event on the World program when "La Boheme," with Alice Brady as "Mimi," will be released as the regular unit.

June 26 another two-star production, "What Happened at 22," will be the regular release, featuring Frances Nelson, last seen in "Human Driftwood."

Following the June 26 release will come Kitty Gordon in her third World Film production and by far the most vital one, entitled "The Crucial Test," and this feature will be followed by Clara Kimball Young on July 10 in an unusual dramatic document, "The Story of Susan," in which the beautiful Miss Young finds herself admirably fitted and capably surrounded by a production of special splendor.

Another unique event in the career of World Film will occur on July 17, when Robert Warwick, the illustrious stage and screen player, will make his next appearance and by far the most important, in "Friday the 13th," after which will come Holbrook Blinn in another novel visualization of a powerful story, "The Weakness of Man," and then another two-star feature with House Peters and Gail Kane in "The Velvet Paw," a Tourneur picture.

Sir Herbert Speaks at Rialto

At the close of the first act of the premier presentation of "Macbeth" at the Rialto theater, New York City, the big audience spied Sir Herbert Tree with his leading lady, Constance Collier, and Daniel Frohman in a loge and at once started a demonstration. After bowing acknowledgement to the ovation without being able to quell the clamor, Sir Herbert accompanied Managing Director Rothapfel to the concert platform and in a brief speech thanked his admirers and spoke of the educational value behind the attempt to depict the classics in the motion picture. He said in part:

"Much has been said in a slighting way of Shakespeare on the screen but did not Charles Lamb write his 'Tales of Shakespeare'? and, I may add, not without purpose.

"If we, too, may through this medium contribute our small mite to the great cause of education we shall not have labored without purpose. In viewing a picture such as this the children, and perchance others, get the underlying idea of the work and go to the study of it with greater understanding and a greater incentive to acquire its intellectual riches. This is primarily an undertaking of education and I regard it as wonderful that we have at our command a medium through which we may teach through pleasure instead of through distasteful cramming. I deem it a wonderful privilege to be able to contribute, even in a limited way, to this modern marvel, teaching through pleasure."

Crane Wilbur is the author of as well as the star of "The Wasted Years," Horsley-Mutual Masterpicture, De Luxe edition, in which he essays a dual role.

Director Eugene V. Mullin of the Vitagraph Company is hard at work upon a three-reel melodrama with Evart Overton, Deaton Vane, Miss Mayfield, Logan Paul and Adele Kelly in the cast. This production will be released under the Broadway Star trade mark.

Greater Vitagraph's Aspirations

AN ARRAY OF NOTABLES START WORK

A GREATER VITAGRAPH COMPANY is the slogan recently adopted at this studio and Albert E. Smith and J. Stuart Blackton are doing all in their power to accomplish this aspired result.

The first step toward this greater company will be shown in the noted actors and actresses who have recently been added to the cast. Heading this list of new players is E. H. Sothern, famous on the legitimate stage, who has at last beeen persuaded to lend his art to the screen. Mr. Sothern has already begun work and is fortunate in having for his director Fred "Bing" Thomson, who has long been a friend of Mr. Sothern.

Peggy Hyland is the most important feminine addition. Although Miss Hyland is new to American audiences she is very well known in England where she worked with Cyril Maude and the late George Edwardes, and has also been seen on the screen. Her work with the Vitagraph Company will be as leading lady for Mr. Sothern.

Alice Joyce needs no introduction to American audiences, who already hold her in high favor both for her work on the screen and the stage. She is now working in "The Battle Cry of War" a sequel to "The Battle Cry of Peace."

Another new player is Barney Bernard, a comedian who impersonates Jewish characters. Mr. Bernard's first screen appearance will be made in a character similar to Potash in "Potash and Perlmutter," in which the humour and pathos of the Jewish race is exemplified.

Virginia Hammond, who has been leading lady for Sothern, Sir Henry Irving and William Courtenay, is the latest legitimate star to become a member of the Vitagraph family. Miss Hammond's first appearance on this program will be in a feature written especially for her by Cecile B. Pettersen. Miss Hammond will be directed by Thomas Mills who has risen from the ranks of stock player to the position of director, to which he has just been appointed. Mr. Mills joined the Vitagraph Company two years ago and has appeared in characters covering every conceivable kind of impersonation.

Two comedies and a drama will be released to the public on June 19. The three-part drama "Would You Forgive Her?" is featuring Leah Baird. Van Dyke Brooke, Arthur Cozine and Jack Ellis are also seen in this picture. "Stung," a one-reel comedy written by Stanley Dark, who also takes the leading part. Lillian Burns and Templer Saxe assist Mr. Dark. In another thousand foot comedy "The Curfew at Simpton Center," Otto Lederer, George Kunkel, Webster Campbell, Jack Mower and Florence Vidor are seen.

A five part feature scheduled for this same date is "The Man Behind the Curtain," featuring Lillian Walker with Evart Overton and William Dunn.

Frank Daniels' latest addition to the Kernell Nutt series is "Kernel Nutt Flirts with Wifie," in which Alice Washburn assists in making the laughs.

E. H. Sothern says that while he has retired from the legitimate stage for good he feels that his new work on the screen will serve as a connecting link between his efforts of the past thirty odd years and his final retirement from public view. In speaking of his new work before the camera Mr. Sothern says he is as apprehensive of his first entrance "back of the nine foot line" as he was during his lyceum stock days, "when a new play was rushed to production with the popularity hanging in the balance and the scales to our minds, having a tendency to weigh heaviest on the negative side." But nevertheless he is quoted as saying "I am entering the new field with the determination to give to the screen the best at my command, and I am as optimistic of the results as it is possible for a person to be who has been behind the footlights all his working life."

The members of the Vitagraph company no longer will be harrassed trying to find the time and opportunity to slip away and be beautified as it has been decided to have a beauty emporium established in their own studios. A building inside the enclosure is being converted into this new department and will contain a ladies' hair dressing and manicuring parlor, barber shop, boot black stand, tailoring establishment and first aid department, for the exclusive use of the company.

Earle Williams has received hundreds of letters asking why he has not appeared in any of the late Vitagraph productions. The reason is not because Mr. Williams has been idle for he has been working in a serial which was originally intended for release during the latter part of May, but the weather conditions interferred with the production so radically that it will now be about September before the serial will be ready for release. But it is one of the most pretentious productions ever undertaken by the Vitagraph company and is well worth waiting for.

PATHE DISTRIBUTES BONUS

Seventy-two Checks Sent out on Profit-Sharing Plan—Ruth Roland in "A Matrimonial Martyr" Pathe Colored

If you want to see some happy and gratified people just look into the Pathe Exchanges. And well that may be, for on June 1, J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of the company, signed seventy-two bonus checks drawn to the order of that number of hustlers in the Pathe Branch offices who earned this money over and above their salary. These were the first checks to be sent out under Mr. Berst's new profit-sharing plan. Members of the staffs of thirty offices will receive these checks. This bonus system has kept everyone digging early and late in the Pathe offices "A Matrimonial Martyr," the five-part Pathecolored comedy-drama, will be released on the Pathe Gold Rooster Program June 19. Ruth Roland and Andrew Arbuckle have the leading roles in this film, which is an adaptation of the stage success, "A Message from Reno." There are many outdoor scenes in the play taken in California in the full bloom of summer and with the Pathecolor the effect is very beautiful.

An original scene has been secured by General Director Gasnier for the new Pathe series being produced by the Astra Film Corporation. The script calls for a fire at sea and a number of blazing figures leaping into the ocean. The director had asbestos suits made, facsimiles of the clothes worn by the actors. Gasoline was poured on the suits and the actors set afire. The clothes were rather warm but by running swiftly the blaze was kept going until the water was reached.

George Brackett Seitz, author of the "Iron Claw," has a new position. He is a graduate earthquake engineer. In the fourth episode of this series there is a tremendous earthquake. A careful miniature was built of a northwestern Canadian town and the ground was made to quake by the manipulation of a number of levers underneath. Mr. Sietz undertook to work the earthquake himself and got under the toy to create the desired effect. The earth quaked all right but the bottom of a river directly over the young author gave way. Item—one new suit to the tailor's and an unnecessary bath.

R. L. Goldberg's cartoons, the "Boob Weekly," are drawing large audiences all over the country and Mr. Goldberg is receiving many congratulatory letters. One man describing his experience at the theater told how he had tried twice to get in but was turned away, but finally succeed. He wrote:

"I wish you would have heard the laughs and the comments. As a pauper to a prince I want to tell you that it pleased me as much as it could you."

Chicago Firm Signs Big Contract

Lewis J. Selznick has signed with Jones, Linick and Schaefer of Chicago a five-year franchise for all Clara Kimball Young productions embracing Illinois, Indiana, Southern Wisconsin, and Western Kentucky. This gives Jones, Linick and Schaefer exclusive control of all Clara Kimball Young features in that territory. One million dollars is said to be the sum involvel. Jones, Linick and Schaefer have always been our biggest theater owners and most important motion picture exhibitors but this deal places them in the first rank of distributors.

"I am extremely pleased with every one concerned in this deal," said Mr. Selznick. "The Clara Kimball Young pictures will strike a new gait which will be difficult for others to follow. It might also be added that Miss Young will appear in person at the exposition to be held in Chicago in July."

Oscar A. Morgan Gives Hints to Exhibitors, First Aid Demonstrated, and Kid Casey Makes His Bow

Oscar A. Morgan, publicity manager of the Paramount's Philadelphia exchange, in an article published in Paramount Progress, entitled "Magic Words in the House Organ," gives the exhibitor some original ideas to be used in advertising different Paramount pictures. In these hints he calls attention to the fact that an original idea will always attract attention but the manager must be careful to make the name of the theater, the address, time of performance and prices stand out clearly. Mr. Morgan adds that he does not believe in giving away the story of the photoplay but thinks that some little striking thing in the play should be brought out. Another good idea is to run interesting matter on the back page of the program, not simply catchy stories about the players but items about the theater itself and features that are to come.

In the latest release of the Paramount Pictographs first aid to the injured has been picturized most interestingly and instructively. The pictures were posed by a boy and a nurse and they show what emergency aids are and how they may be applied in various cases.

"Kid Casey, the Champion," will make his debut on the screen on June 15. He is not a real live star, but the brain child of Fred Moser, and will appear only in animated cartoons. His initial adventure will take the place of "Colonel Heeza Liar and the Bandits," the release date of which has been advanced one week. Subsequent animated cartoons already announced, will appear in their original order but with the release dates advanced one week in each case.

In a recent issue of Paramount Progress appears a letter from John A. McNear, Jr., manager of the Mystic Theater, Petaluma, California, in which he advocates the use of a program only large enough to be accommodated in every man's and woman's pocket or pocketbook. He has been trying this out for about sixteen months and finds the small-sized program most satisfactory.

The Fenway Theater, Boston, Mass., has been using a most effective bit of poster advertising for Paramount pictures. The management is getting out a quarter-sheet poster in two colors bearing an eight-inch Paramount trademark which at once arrests the attention.

$1,000,000 FILM THRILLS

Annette Kellermann Performs Almost Superhuman Feats, Braves Alligators, Fire and Water to Make Picture Realistic and Unusual

Literally scores of thrills are found in the Annette Kellermann film, "A Daughter of the Gods," directed by Herbert Brenon. In this spectacle the star undergoes some hardships almost beyond human endurance.

In one scene with arms bound and absolutely helpless she is beaten against a ragged coral headland, pulled away from the rock by the undertow and hurled back again until her back from shoulders to waist was cut as if she had been beaten by a cat-o-nine-tails. In another scene she swims almost with the speed of a train ahead of a shark whose fin races along the surface not ten feet behind her. She is tossed into a pool filled with savage alligators—and yet she escapes. In another instance she leaps from a tower to the sea, a distance of 103 feet, and not even stopped momentarily by her impact with the water, outswims a hundred pursuing Jamaica negroes.

In one of the Gnome City scenes she is rescued from the water and while almost unclad is stoned and beaten with sticks by several hundred dwarfs who imagine her their enemy.

Mounted on horseback and clad in a coat of mail Miss Kellermann fights a sword battle with the leader of the opposing army on the sea wall and topples over into the sea. With the horse struggling near her and weighted by the heavy mail death seems imminent, she leaves the world of mortals and divesting herself of the armor swims away as a mermaid.

In the harem scene with her clothes almost entirely torn off she rushes through the house while fire, lava and sparks fall around her.

The most thrilling episode of all is where the flood gates are opened, and with arms bound the heroine is swept into a roaring rapid down which she plunges for two and a half miles to the edge of a precipitous waterfall and over which she goes on a fifty-foot drop into a Niagara-like whirlpool at the bottom.

W. K. One Armed Paper Hanger Filmed

C. Lang Cobb, Jr., manager, sales and publicity of the Reserve Photo-Plays Company, producers of Ray Comedies, has just returned from the Cleveland studio and reports big prospects for the future. In conjunction with the single-reel comedy releases beginning June 21 The Reserve Photo-Plays Company will release through Mr. Cobb a series of comedy cartoons by the noted cartoonist, "Ahearn," head of the Newspaper Enterprise Association which controls over 900 papers in the middle west.

Mr. Cobb has so arranged the future releases, commencing June 21, as to allow for a serial of six episodes of Johnny Ray in "Jerry, the Janitor," which will be followed by the "One Armed Paperhanger with the Hives," a one-reel subject.

George Melford, Lasky director, is starting a five-reel feature with Cleo Ridgeley and Wallace Reid as his stars. He is putting on "The House of the Golden Windows."

The next purchaser is Fitzmaurice, a lighthouse keeper. Cleo and Lieutenant Hope charter a launch and set out for the lighthouse. The conspirators, Olga, Morton and Sextus, follow them. "Hook" Barnacle hides in the launch of the conspirators. This launch strikes a floating mine in the channel and is blown up, but Olga, Morton and "Hook" escape death. Sextus is drowned. "Bath Tub Perils"

Triangle-Keystone Comedy Has Stirring Finish. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

WELL toward the end of the film "Bathtub Perils" presents the spectator with its novel features. Previous to the flood caused by a broken pipe in the hotel there is plenty of strenuous knockabout comedy, most of it amusing, but none of it new. But the closing scenes are among the funniest ever seen in a Keystone comedy.

The sight of a bathtub with its pretty occupant being borne along at a swift pace on a torrent of water flowing down staircases, through the streets and so on down to the river where it continues to sail along, is every bit as laughable as it is unusual, and one must confess to being highly diverted by it. Really the ending of "Bathtub Perils" is well worth seeing. It more than compensates for the sometimes dull portions of the picture which precede it.

One wonders at the craft of the producer who can secure such effects. The water rushing down the entrance steps of a hotel is accomplished as only such things can be accomplished at the Keystone studios. From a standpoint of production it is quite remarkable. The story told by the picture does not amount to much as far as its being a story is concerned. The flirtatious hotel proprietor by mistake walks into the room of a newly married young woman. He is discovered there by the husband, and then there is a lot of chasing around with pistols, until the water pipe bursts. Fred Mace, Claire Anderson, Dale Fuller and Hugh Fay are included in the cast, and they all do well. E. A. Frazee directed the production.

"The Redemption of Dave Darcey"

Blue Ribbon Feature Released June 12 on V. L. S. E. Program. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

JAMES MORRISON gives a commendable characterization of a crook whose reformation follows fast on the heels of his first real opportunity to give freedom to the instinct of true manhood within him. Morrison's performance wins sympathy for the role; also it earns the player admiration and praise. The play centers about this character and Mr. Morrison realizes its best possibilities.

The scenario is by Charles T. Dazey. It is a story containing many very human touches and a picture which, considered in general, will prove popular, has been made of it. The story, contenting itself with situations and characters not uncommon to the photoplay, would have been trite melodrama when it reached the screen had the responsibility of producing it been placed in hands of a director lacking the good judgment and skill of Paul Scardon. As it stands "The Redemption of Dave Darcey" is agreeable melodrama enhanced by a realistic production and good acting.

The picture begins by showing Dave Darcey returning from a job and carrying with him a goodly loot. Out of the collection of silver and other articles he stole, Dave keeps a loving cup. This he offers as a prize to the best dancers at a party given by the club of which he is the head. The leader of a rival gang declares war on the Darcey clique. In self-defense Darcey shoots Burns and he escapes via the well known sky-light, over the roofs of adjoining buildings to the home of Phillip Benton. Benton hears and is moved by Dave's promises to be good hereafter, and he shields the boy from the police.

Benton is engaged to a girl named Grace Herrington. She takes a great interest in Darcey and she urges Benton to give him a position. From this point on the story tells of Dave's devotion to both Grace, who helps him with his studies of arithmetic, and Benton. The latter becomes infatuated with an adventuress. Baroness von Ehrenstein is a member of some secret society which is determined to blow up Benton's factory. Dave presents this and at first suspicion falls on him, but in the end his innocence is proven and to make things still brighter for Dave it becomes known that Burns did not die as a result of the shooting.

Belle Bruce is a pretty and a pleasant Grace and Emanuel A. Turner a good Phillip Benton. The adventuress is a very mean and not admirable woman as presented by the story, but when such a character is seen in the person of one so striking and attractive as is Billie Billings there is little to do but feel sorry when the police take the Baroness into charge. Mary Maurice, Robert Gaillard, Gerald Gordon, John Costello, Logan Paul and Dan Hayes are included in the cast. There is still another member of the cast to be mentioned. Charles J. Giegerich, Jr., is seen as Dave when a child.

"The Wild Girl of the Sierras"

Triangle-Fine Arts Romance Gives Mae Marsh Novel Role. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A LEGEND of the Sierras, according to which there was once discovered in the mountains a girl who, as far as she could remember, had never come in contact with other humans, is the basis for this offering from the Fine Arts studio. "The Wild Girl of the Sierras" is by F. M. Pierson and Anita Loos. Beginning in the mountains and ending there, the story cannot be considered notable on any of its own merits. With a plot that could be adequately treated in much less than five reels and no character development to speak of, the story, one feels, claims no share of the praise due a picture that pleases but does not impress.

Paul Powell, the director, has given his subject many rarely beautiful scenes. Numbers of charming pictures there are. These lend charm to the characterizations of Mae Marsh, whose skin is singularly fair for one who has been living out of doors for a period of fifteen years, Robert Herron and Wilfred Lucas. These three players form a cast of remarkable ability, and if they are hampered by a story that is wholly agreeable but quite thin, they are aided by an artistic production, whose pretty atmosphere is enhanced by exceptional photography.

In the beginning we see the girl, playing about with wild animals and delighting in her friendship with the bears, the rabbits and the birds. She wears a tunic made of feathers and takes her afternoon nap gracefully stretched on the limb of a tree. Into this fairyland of the girl there comes one day a stranger. The stranger loves to shoot, and he mistakes the girl for some sort of animal and loses no time in firing at her.

The result of this incident is that the girl becomes the companion of humans. She is unable to talk their language, but by making signs she and the other three get along pretty well. The boy is rich and his companions are anxious to sell him a mine whose value is nil. He refuses to buy, even after the woman who loves the gambler makes love to him. The girl, one learns, is the daughter of this gambler, but he never becomes aware of the fact. The visualized memories which come to her make this known to the spectator. The boy's money belt is saved by the girl and in the closing scene the boy and the girl walk off toward the distant town, presumably, for each has a deep affection for the other.

Mae Marsh does some excellent acting as the girl. When she first sees the strange beings who take her captive, she is for all the world like a frightened bird. Her performane throughout is noteworthy for the finish of her expression. Robert Harron is good as the boy and the same may be said of Wilfred Lucas as the gambler. Olga Grey is also pleasingly prominent in the picture.

WE left Gloria seriously ill with pneumonia, at the close of chapter five. At the beginning of chapter six, there is a prologue in which Billie Burke herself, in fancy costume, introduces the characters and explains their relation to the story.

Gloria recovers from her illness.

This is amusing and is a clever way of interesting those in the audience who may not have seen the former chapters. But, just at this time, before a chapter whose first scene proper shows Gloria still in danger of death, as the subtitles state, it is disconcerting and spoils the realism.

The whole installment is light in tone, however, and contains a number of comedy touches. The two reels are very enjoyable. The story is not advanced very much, but the events presented are sufficiently entertaining that one does not feel that the narrative lags. There is one especially pretty episode. Gloria's dream of her marriage to Freneau, in which a number of good effects have been obtained by means of double exposure.

As for the story, Gloria convalesces in quite the same playful, mischievous manner in which she does everything else. David, her brother, receives an anonymous letter warning him of his wife's fondness for Freneau and decides to test her. Freneau, afraid to break with Lois, David's wife, sets out to deceive Gloria, and in a novel manner. The installment leaves one with a curiosity to see where these various threads of plot will lead. Freneau, it is apparent, is playing a dangerous game and in the near future will probably be detected. And Gloria, although still infatuated with Freneau, is beginning to notice the apparent unhappiness of the young Dr. Royce.

The acting, settings and photography of this installment are up to the standard of previous releases. The leading characters supporting Miss Burke as Gloria are played by Henry Kolker, Jule Power, David Powell, William Roselle, and William T. Carleton.

"Willie's Wobbly Way"

Two-Reel Triangle-Kay Bee Comedy With William Collier. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

WILLIAM COLLIER in "Willie's Wobbly Way," a two-part Kay Bee comedy, shows to about as good advantage as he did in "The No-Good Guy," which is to say that this picture is plentifully amusing. In fact, the picture might be named the Further Adventures of Jimmy Coghlan (the no-good guy), for Collier continues to be wild and very intemperate when it comes to quenching his chronic thirst.

"Willie's Wobbly Way" has a lot of slapstick in its two reels—good slapstick comedy. A battered flivver which Willie calls Henry figures in much of the strenuous action. There is one incident in this picture which really takes one's breath away, at least we found it that way. This is where the street car appropriated by Willie rushes toward a similar vehicle traveling to a point apparently near the starting place of Willie's. The spectator for the moment is one of Willie's passengers and the ride is surely thrilling while it lasts. The two cars come within a few inches of each other, then the scene changes to a point from which one sees them do a leapfrog stunt. This incident will thrill and bring a laugh from each of its audiences.

"Willie's Wobbly Way" is the account of a "morning after" and an evening such as Willie delights in. It would be a difficult matter to write a synopsis of what happens. Things move quickly and the picture from the beginning will interest and amuse.

"Silks and Satins"

Famous Players-Paramount Offering With Marguerite Clark. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IT IS some time since we have seen Marguerite Clark to such good advantage as she appears in the latest Famous Players offering, "Silks and Satins." In all her screen impersonations she is a true delight and in this picture she has the support of a story that is both suitable and satisfactory. A romance laid in France, "Silks and Satins" is a well-constructed and colorful story. It contains a pretty love tale to which the gallantry and swashbuckling glory of a bygone day lend an air of fascination.

Miss Clark portrays two characters, for "Silks and Satins" presents a play of the story-within-a-story type. The modern portion has the dainty star as an American girl whose approaching marriage with a man of her father's choice promises her little happiness since she is not really in love with him, and the story with the French locale is the visualization of her thoughts and the lines she reads in a curious diary which was written by an ancestress. The words she reads influence the modern Felicite and in the end the spectator has a feeling of certainty that she makes no mistake when she elopes with the younger man, the one she prefers.

With a role that is ideally suited to her, the support of a play which holds the interest consistently and a uniformly effective cast, it goes without saying that Marguerite Clark in her latest picture will fill screen patrons with profound delight.

Briefly, the story tells of a girl who on the eve of her marriage reads the events written by one whose love affairs resemble her own strikingly. The Felicite of some generations back was betrothed to a wealthy Frenchman. A distant relative of hers desired to marry her and upon the death of her father she was taken to the home of an uncle with whom Henri lived. Her fiance engages the services of a brilliant swordsman, a soldier of fortune, to rescue her. This Desmond is the one man she really loved, though having met him only once. He carried her safely from her prison and with him she escaped to the colonies where her life with Desmond, according to the last words of the diary, was one of absolute happiness. Upon finishing the tale, the Felicite of today slips from the house and leaves on the five-thirty train with her young suitor.

J. Searle Dawley has given the story an effective and artistic treatment. The settings, both interior and exterior, are charming. It is an elaborate production. Vernon Steel plays opposite Miss Clark. He is an excellent Jacques Desmond. Thomas Holding is a haughty and convincing Felix Breton and W. A. Williams is good as Henri. Annette, Felicite's maid, is in capable hands. Fayette Perry makes the part quite prominent and Clarence Handysides leaves nothing to be desired as the Marquis. The players have well-drawn characters to interpret, and each of those mentioned above makes an impression. The photography is of an unusually good brand and a credit to Cameraman H. Lyman Broening.

Thomas Dixon's Preparedness Film Is Thrilling. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IN THE skillful blending of thrills, laughter and some touches of pathos, though the latter element is small in proportion to the other two, "The Fall of a Nation" manifests the ingenuity of its author and producer, Thomas Dixon. Thursday night at the Liberty Theater was not the opening night of this spectacle photoplay, yet did the audience respond remarkably to the picture's varying moods—or should we say spirit of the picture?

"The Fall of a Nation" shows us America invaded by a vast and efficient foreign army. Its propaganda is preparedness and its great mission, we believe, is to entertain, to thrill. If he deserves praise for nothing else, and surely he does, the author and producer of "The Fall of a Nation" should be highly commended for giving us a film of the propaganda type that is entertaining. "The Fall of a Nation" holds one's attention all the time.

Judging by the amount of preparedness talk—the poor old weather has received an awful jolt as first aid for drooping conversation since preparedness came into its own—heard in the lobby and smoking room at the theater last Thursday, "The Fall of a Nation" is entirely worthy of being classed with the greatest contributions of all classes to preparedness program. This it does by showing just what we of the United States could expect were these shores invaded when the military affairs of the country are in their present condition.

The mother whose son and husband are killed by the mighty and brutal enemy finds small consolation in the high-minded utterances from the peace-at-any-price advocate and so, too, do all the characters in the story who oppose preparedness before the play comes to an end. But of much more strength than the story is the production. That is if the story is to be considered in all its serious phases. If at times one senses a lack of sincerity that fact cannot detract from the power of the thrilling moments and the humorous ones. In relieving the tension the battle scenes create with these humorous incidents Mr. Dixon used expert judgment.

Mr. Dixon knows how to play up to the emotions of his audience. "The Fall of a Nation" takes hold of the spectator's interest and not once in the course of its prologue showing the beginning of the Nation, and its two acts of the fall and rescue respectively, does the picture relax its grip.

The story is built about a girl who disagrees with a certain congressman who urges preparedness; a treacherous banker who while professing to be a citizen of the United States plans the invasion and works to defeat the congressman's bill, and an Italian family. When the enemy lands in New York the congressman assumes command of a division of the small army, the banker is appointed governor by the emperor and the Italian enlists and dies serving the Stars and Stripes. The girl is the real head of an organization of American women. It is the women who rise to the occasion and make the reclamation of the Nation possible. While pretending friendship for the invaders and their emperor they secure the enemy's guns and ammunition and deliver them into the hands of the army formed in the far West.

The battle scenes, in fact all the big scenes are excellently produced, and there are many big scenes. The acting is good. Percy Standing, Lorraine Huling, Arthur Shirley, Paul Willis, Flora MacDonald, Leila Frost and Phillip Gastrock have the important parts and they acquit themselves well. In addition to those mentioned there are many players who appear throughout the picture. The Daughters of Jael, the pretty girls who wear white uniforms and whose charms turn the heads of the foreign soldiers, are several and well drilled. The extra people all show careful drilling, in fact.

The action of the play is laid in New York and Long Island. On Long Island all the battle scenes are enacted. "The Fall of a Nation" depicts destruction and rapine impressively and realistically. It thrills when the Nation is falling and thrills again when the brave men and determined women of a devastated America fight a victorious battle with the enemy in possession of New York and Long Island. Chicago, Philadelphia and Boston are heard from by means of the telegraph. The American traitor reads telegrams telling how Chicago was taken by a "gang of Amazons in breeches," the Philadelphia garrison went down before a "band of hell-cats" and Boston suffered the same fate at the hands of some equally terrible females. As to Long Island, the men fought that battle but they fought with guns taken from the enemy by the local branch of the Daughters of Jael.

Victor Herbert's musical score is good. It has a national air about it. Frequently introducing strains of the various National anthems, the music comes to a clash when the battle scenes are reached and into pretty melodies for the romantic scenes. Upon occasions, too, one is reminded that the score is by the composer of "Natoma," particularly the "Dagger Dance" from that American opera.

relief offered by a divorce court, thus righting the effects of an error in judgment by releasing the wife and leaving the English Lord free to marry a girl well versed in the narrow conventionalism of society.

The scenery, both mountain and that of the English estate sets, is of exceptional photographic beauty. Virginia Norden is endowed with just the qualities she needs for a convincing portrayal of her role—that of a dauntless, resolute mountain girl, who makes her views as much respected as those of any of her masculine neighbors. Neil Hardin is also an excellent type for the character of Cedric Ralston. Other names to be found on the cast are Myrtle Reeves, Philo McCollough and Robyn Adair. The picture was produced by H. M. and E. D. Horkheimer and directed by Charles Bartlett.

Margaret Williamson, daughter of a noble, but apparently poor family, is persuaded by her mother that there is more advantage in marrying Lord Ralston than his younger brother, Cedric, to whom she is engaged. Thereupon, Lucy breaks her engagement with Cedric. The latter leaves the home of his fathers and comes to the Canadian Northwest. Here he meets a girl the like of whom was never produced on quiet English soil, and he is attracted by her bravery and wild mountain charm. The girl, too, becomes deeply interested in him, and forgets her lover, Jacques.

Some time later, gratitude magnifies the loving regard Cedric already has for the half-breed, Nor, and they become married. News arrives of his brother's death and Cedric takes his wife to England. Against whatever preconceived notions Cedric may have had, his wife makes a very inelegant Lady Ralston and she is most miserable. Her boorishness cools Cedric's affections. One night Nor discovers her husband renewing his love to Lucy. Instead of being heart-broken, the poor girl, taken out of her native element, agrees to allow Lord Ralston to divorce her, saying that she will return to Jacques, whom she loves. The picture closes with the reunion of Nor and her faithful lover, Jacques, under the great trees of a mountain forest.

"A Matrimonial Martyr"

Pathe Gold Rooster Play in Color Features Ruth Roland. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

WITH all its pretty settings enhanced by the Pathecolor process, the latest Gold Rooster Play presents two Ruths, one differing from the other in disposition and even in appearance, yet both are attractive. Ruth Roland, the star of many notable offerings on the Pathe Program, is given a double role to enact in "A Matrimonial Martyr," a comedy produced by Balboa. She is both Erma Desmond, a young girl filled with the enthusiasm of youth and wholesome desires, and Mrs. Hugo Stanley, not so young as Erma, nor is she fond of such simple and wholesome pleasures, though goodness knows she has plenty of energy.

"A Matrimonial Martyr" is a comedy of situations. The complications arising from a discontented wife's determination to leave for Reno and the divorce courts and her newly engaged companion's ability to masquerade as the wife because she is her exact double, are in some instances good, but in most cases they are not; that is to say, they fail to produce a really good comedy effect. If anything, the story is over-plotted, and in this respect it reminds one of the play the high-school graduating class performs at the commencement exercises. But if there is an air of amateurishness about the story, there certainly is not anything like that to be found in the acting or production.

One of the screen's advantages over the speaking stage lies in the ability of the players and the producer to make a play that is a bit lacking into a picture that is all of good, also entertaining. Here is an example of where an actress of talent and personality gives a listless play some vitality. Of course, Miss Roland is not alone responsible for the appeal of "A Matrimonial Martyr." The supporting company, which includes Andrew Arbuckle, Marguerite Nichols, Daniel Gilfether and R. Henry Gray, and the excellent production supplied by Balboa contribute a great deal. And players, production and story are all wonderfully aided by the beauty and novelty which the natural colors lend. It surely was no mistake to send this film all the way to Paris to be colored.

To give a synopsis of "A Matrimonial Martyr" is somewhat of a task. Erma, who decided to elope but changed her mind at the last minute, is told by her uncle to go through with her plans. She visits a friend in the city and after a time is employed as companion by Mrs. Stanley, to whom she bears a striking resemblance.

Mr. Stanley is in Europe, not being able to stand his pretty wife's fits of temper any longer and Bertie Stanley, the daughter, is away at boarding school. Mrs. Stanley develops an affection for a youthful society chap and she leaves for Reno. For some reason of her own, Mrs. Stanley urges Erma to masquerade as the mistress of the luxurious home in her absence. The return of the husband and his daughter as well as a legacy from her aunt make all sorts of trouble for Erma. In the end, however, she marries Mr. Stanley, her friend marries the chap Erma was going to elope with and Bertie Stanley marries the young man of her choice.

"La Vie de Boheme"

World-Paragon Five-Reel Feature. Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman

IT IS fortunate that this production was directed by a Frenchman, Albert Capellani. No one but a Frenchman could ever give a production of "La Boheme" the subtleties and little touches of nature characteristic of the Latin Quarter in Paris. No matter how long an American or other foreigner lives in Paris it is impossible for him to get the real French flavor in any picture he may do, whether he is a painter on canvas or a maker of pictures on celluloid.

The distinctive charm of this entire production is its genuine French flavor. Nothing more truly French in its atmosphere has ever been done in an American studio. There may have been others just as good, but none better. Considerable expense was gone to in the building of typical and picturesque street scenes and studio scenes representing the Latin Quarter. They were extremely life-like, and the same applies to the cafes where Bohemians resort. The period of the story is of course considerably before the time of modern improvements and before the Latin Quarter became a show place for sight-seeing tours as it recently has been.

The charm of Bohemia in Paris in those days was really an allurement that had power over riches. Once its spell was fairly fastened upon its devotees it became a habit quite as strong as the habit of the poppy. It is not generally known in America that the cabaret, which is more or less of a novelty in this country, has been a French institution for many, many years. The touches of cabaret life in this picture are genuine. It is customary in French cafes for the diners to spend the evening there after the dinner is over, playing their games of backgammon and vociferously applauding the entertainers.

These and many other touches of French life make the picture a very charming thing as a whole. Then added to that is the lovable personality of Alice Brady who appears as Mimi, the grisette. The play is more of a faithful adaptation from Henri Murgur's book than it is from the opera. In many respects, however, it adheres to the operatic version and with the music of La Boheme running through the exhibition this picture ought to be a signal and lasting success. Having the advantage of being a classic it will be largely welcomed by all of the various elements that make up the cosmopolitan population of America. It is a picture that will be just as welcome in a Bowery theater as it will be in a Broadway house.

That Miss Brady is a delightful grisette would almost go without saying. Paul Capellani, a remarkably fine interpreter of Latin roles, is of course strictly in his element in the part of Rudolph, and his acting is superb. The actor who really carried away the honors in the picture was Leslie Stowe as the uncle of Rudolph. It would be difficult to imagine anything more convincing than his portrayal of the part of Durandin.

The story is almost too well known to bear relating. It concerns a poor grisette who sacrifices her love and life in order not to interfere with the prospects of her well born lover.

Photographically the picture is excellent, and its continuity is entirely smooth and interesting. There is no terrific punch in the picture, but there is enough art in it and in the music of La Boheme to make it more than desirable on any program.

Just as the detectives are about to arrest Davy as the Laughing Mask a voice from another room is heard and the astonished detectives turn to look into the eyes of the Mask itself.

"The Unmasking of Davy" further tells of the efforts of Legar to secure some of his ill-gotten gains which have been carefully buried near a cliff. The two detectives, Margery and Mr. Golden set out for the hiding place of Legar's pilfered goods. They arrive there in time to capture the man sent to recover the bag by the Iron Claw, and the latter villainous person arrives in time to start a boulder rolling which threatens to kill all the others. "Macbeth"

Reliance Film Corporation's Production of Shakespeare Tragedy. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE measure of success which meets the first real attempt to transfer Shakespeare to the screen is flattering not only to John Emerson, who prepared the scenario and directed the production of "Macbeth," but to the screen itself. This film from the Reliance Film Corporation's studios is really Shakespeare as the Bard is seen in one of his greatest works. Consequently one more road is closed to those individuals whose prejudice to the photoplay has found solace in the thought that Shakespeare could never be successfully done before the camera.

"Macbeth" is not only one of this season's most important film productions, but it is, in fact, one of the most important contributions since the screen's inception. What should be of greatest moment to the exhibitor is that the picture has an appeal of great breadth. Not only the student of Shakespeare, whose sensibilities on the subject are appallingly sensitive, will be interested and not in the least offended, but those whose interest in the plays of Shakespeare is but superficial and those not even in possession of a passing acquaintance with his works, may for certain be counted on to unite in praise for a picture so unusually dramatic and pictorially beautiful. The film creates a real illusion, and "Macbeth" here, is, first, and most important of all, interesting from the beginning to its tragic end.

Sir Herbert Tree gives an excellent performance as Macbeth, and so, too, is Constance Collier excellent as Lady Macbeth. Tree's mastery of the actor's make-up, like his own ideas on Shakespeare and the theater, stood him in good stead while acting before the camera. His "Macbeth" has nothing of the stage star's want of effect when appearing for the first time in the films. He conveys the emotions of his character with acting that registers on the screen and at no time does he seem to hang effect on diction, which, of course, is of no avail in the pictures.

Miss Collier emphasizes the cold and calculating in the Scottish Lady who proves the evil genius of the husband whose ambitions utterly and completely master him. In the death scene Miss Collier touches a powerfully tragic note, thereby completing a performance of marked impressiveness. Wilfred Lucas as MacDuff, and Ralph Lewis, the Banquo, do much to further the high quality of the acting, which is in every particular splendid.

Mr. Emerson lost no opportunity to make the picture impressive from a standpoint of pageantry. The coronation scene, views of the encamped soldiers and the interior settings are certain of the points in which Shakespeare gains in coming to the films. The opening scene of the witches has beauty and besides it has a strangely ominous note. The entire play contains this suggestion of tragedy. The powerful tone of horror which has won the admiration of all of the critics of "Macbeth" has been instilled into this picture which, with realistic production and the addition of scenes not possible on the stage, compensates for what effect is lost in the absence of the wonderful diction.

Shakespeare's lines are used for the subtitles with but few exceptions. Great skill was shown in the placement of the inserts. As a matter of fact, there is no part or portion of the picture deserving of anything but praise. In reality this film represents Shakespeare for the million, so to speak, which is a fine, even a noble thing.

"The Gentle Conspiracy"

Two-Reel "Flying A" Drama Released June 19. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS little story holds the interest, and while not very plausible, is entertaining. Carl M. Le Viness has directed the play, from a scenario by Charles M. Peck, and a capable cast of players, led by Vivian Rich, Alfred Vosburgh, George E. Periolat and Louise Lester, enact the roles. The photography is good and the settings interesting, especially those showing Molly's life in the slums. Miss Rich has a dual role, and during the two reels of the play, appears as a dancer, a girl of the slums, a spoiled daughter, and a thief disguised in boy's attire.

Louise Lester appears as Mrs. Ridgley, Jessie's blind mother, and George Periolat is John Ridgley, her father. Jessie (Vivian Rich) is of a roving disposition. She dreams of being a great dancer and longs to go away to the city. The devotion of Bob Fillmore (Alfred Vosburgh) does not satisfy her, and she rebels against the restraints her father places on her. Her mother is worried about her especially, because she resembles her aunt, who disappeared after a runaway marriage.

In the meantime, Molly, the motherless daughter of "Society Red," a thief, is growing up in the slums. The only training she receives is in her father's profession. Disguised as a boy, she aids the gang in their burglaries. One night, with her father and his confederates, she enters the Ridgley home. It is just after Jessie has run away from home and been killed in an automobile accident. As yet the news has been kept from the blind mother, lest the shock prove fatal. On the night of the robbery, the thieves are all captured except Mollie, who is in hiding and is discovered by Ridgley. He is startled by her resemblance to his dead daughter, and instead of arresting her, installs her in Jessie's place, never telling the mother of the real Jessie's death. Later, through the confession of "Society Red," he learns that the thief was the husband of his sister, who disappeared, and that Mollie is the niece of the Ridgley's, which explained her resemblance to Jessie.

"A Woman's Honor"

William Fox Five-Reel Drama Featuring Jose Collins. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS tragedy is unusually well presented, even for a William Fox production. The beauty of the settings, especially interior pictures, the artistic photography, the skillful building up of the play by means of the well selected, well arranged scenes entitle this play to high rank as a work of art. For this Roland West, the director, is to be credited.

But the main appeal in a photoplay to the majority of spectators lies in the featured player, and Jose Collins as Helena, the heroine of this drama, is easily capable of dominating all situations. The magnetism of her personality is felt from the first scene to the last. One follows her career with close attention, because she is always interesting.

An excellent point in the story is its simplicity of outline. There is no overloading of tragedy. The one terrible tragedy of Helena's life and her method of getting revenge forms the theme. There is no comedy relief in this picture, but the story is arranged climactically; the opening scenes showing Helena's life in the country near Naples are delightful, and at the end of the play, the love story between Maria, Helena's sister, and the young soldier relieves the tragic atmosphere. And in the gruesome scenes which form part of the play, the spirit with which Miss Collins plays Helena lifts the situations above a morbid plane. The "big scene" of the play, in which Helena poisons the wine in the glass of Tochetti, her enemy, is very dramatically presented, and the acting of Miss Collins and of Arthur Donaldson, as Tochetti, is most effective. This scene is excellently done.

The story, in brief, is that of Helena, an Italian peasant girl whose lover leaves for America. Later she follows him, but in Naples falls a victim to Tochetti and his confederate, La Terribula. They hold her a prisoner for a long time, then, tiring of her, send her on to America. Soon after her arrival, her lover, who has been injured in the steel mills, dies, and Helena is left with one desire in life, that of revenge for the injury she has suffered. Later, as an artist's model, she meets a young Italian lawyer who wishes to marry her. They leave for Naples in order to gain the permission of the young man's uncle. There Helena discovers that the uncle is Tochetti.

The man does not remember Helena, but when she is ready for revenge, she reveals her identity. She places poison in the wine he is to drink. Tochetti sees her do this, but does not see her shift the glasses. He forces her to drink the wine he believes to be poisoned, but in reality drinks the poison himself. After his death, Helena settles scores with La Terribula and in doing so saves her sister, Maria, from a fate like hers. Maria's soldier lover, arriving on the scene of the murder of Tochetti, by a quick witted act, saves Helena from suspicion. Maria and her lover are married. What becomes of Helena is not clear, though one may guess that she marries the lawyer.

The supporting cast of players includes Devore Palmer, Ruby Hoffman, Mrs. Cecil Raleigh, Bradley Barker, Anna Reedor and Armand Cortez.

Five years later, after her husband has died, Alma again meets Louis. She has changed from a ragged country girl to a charming woman of the world, and he does not recognize her. She sees her chance for revenge and sets out to win his love. She is successful, and the two are married. After the ceremony, Alma reveals her identity, declares that she won his love for revenge and intends to leave him at once. Louis goes away and a few moments later Alma hears the report of a revolver. Believing that he has committed suicide, Alma is terror stricken. She rushes into the room and is overjoyed to find that the discharge of the gun was accidental and that her husband is unharmed. Then she realizes that she has really fallen in love with the man she thought she hated.

Miss Brunette's acting is very good, both in the early scenes, as the grief-stricken, ragged country girl, and in the latter scenes as the frivolous coquette. Guy Oliver is also good and makes Louis a very definite character. In fact, the acting of these two is the best feature of the drama.

"That Sort"

Essanay Five-Reel V. L. S. E. Release of June 12. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

WARDA HOWARD'S presentation of Diana Laska, "that sort" of a woman, in this drama is its most appealing feature. The play, which begins "in the midst of things," captures the interest at once and does not let it go until the last scene is flashed. This is not because of anything unusual in the plot of the story. The theme, the longing of a mother for her child, even when the mother has overstepped the bounds of conventional virtue, has been used many times. And the final situation, in which a former lover of the mother becomes an accepted suitor of the daughter, is not at all new. This is not adverse criticism, for more credit is due the players and the director who can make old material live.

The first scene of the play occurs after Diana Laska has made an unsuccessful attempt at suicide. To the doctor who revives her she tells the story of her life and her reason for wishing to end it. She tells of her childhood, spent behind the scenes of a theater, of her early career as a dancer, of her unhappy marriage, the birth of her daughter, and her separation from her husband. After leaving her husband, who had tired of her, she was befriended by Philip Goodier (John Lorenz). After breaking with him, she went to Europe, where she became notorious for her dances and her personal life. But after a time, her longing to see her little daughter brought her back home, where she found that her former husband had married again. He refused to allow her to see her daughter, and for this reason she had tried to kill herself.

Through the recital, we get a very vivid picture of Diana, illogical, impulsive, unhappy. It is a portrayal which holds the sympathy. The story catches up with itself when Diana tells the name of her husband, John Heppell, who proves to be a good friend of the doctor. The doctor promises to aid Diana to see her daughter, and Heppell is finally forced to agree to their plans. Diana is permitted to be with her daughter, who does not know her identity, and she soon learns of the girl's engagement. When she finds that Philip Goodier is the future husband, she reveals her former relations with him to Heppell, and to Goodier the fact that she is the girl's mother. Goodier, as his price for keeping her secret and giving the girl up, demands her promise also to give up her daughter, a promise which she gives. The end of the play promises future happiness for Diana, however, with the doctor, who has admired her sacrifices.

The acting of the entire cast of players is good. Ernest Maupin shows his usual skill as the doctor. Duncan McRae appears as John Heppell. Betty Brown is especially good as the daughter. Marion Skinner and Peggy Sweeney complete the cast. Charles J. Brabin directed the play, written by Basil McDonald Hastings.

"A Modern Knight"

Two-Reel Mustang Drama Released June 23. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

FOR its setting, this story in which Art Acord is featured combines many features of the western "Happy Family" and the "Buck Parvin and the Movies" stories. The events are new, however, and the play in general has the good qualities which made the releases mentioned so entertaining. Art Acord again has a bashful role, that of "Pink," a cowboy who rescues a fair lady from a villain and unexpectedly finds that he has figured in a motion picture scene. When the impromptu scene is successful, the manager offers "Pink" a position with the company.

"Pink" is a member of the "Happy Family," the cowboys at the "Flying U" ranch. He proves to be a good motion picture player for the western dramas the company is filming. He falls in love with the leading lady, who encourages him because his affection for her leads him to play the love scenes in the picture more realistically. Soon she really falls in love with him, but cannot marry him because she is already married and has left her husband because of his cruelty.

One day the picture company makes arrangements with a stage coach for the filming of a hold-up scene. A couple of real bandits anticipate the players and rob the occupants of the coach, who make no resistance. When the hold-up is found to be real, the bandits are pursued and one of them is killed. He proves to be the missing husband of the leading lady, who is now free to marry "Pink."

As a western play, with the requisite rough riding and ranch life scenes, this is unusually good. The story has a touch of novelty, is clear and interesting. The roles are well acted. The photography and settings are beautiful.

The supporting cast includes Nita Davis, Ashton Dearholt, Clarence Burton, Al W. Fordyce, Bessie Banks, George Gebhardt, Harry McCabe and Carl Morrison.

"The Promise Land"

Three-Reel Essanay Drama Released June 17. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

ANOTHER small town romance is presented in this drama, which is one of the best of the recent Essanay three-reelers. In its careful, finished production, this picture can compare very favorably with many longer and more pretentious offerings. It contains a number of praiseworthy features, not the least being the brief prologue and epilogue which enclose the story itself. Someone with an eye for pictorial composition selected the background of these two effective little scenes. A well worded subtitle at the beginning sums up the theme of the play, that the "promise land" of happiness is to be discovered near at hand, not at the far-off end of the rainbow.

The small town atmosphere is pleasingly maintained in most of the scenes. The story deals with the love affair of Margaret Jamison and David Hunter, the latter a clerk in a drug store, but with an ambition to be a surgeon. Bryant Washburn and Marguerite Clayton have these leading roles, and as Margaret, Miss Clayton does a sincere piece of acting throughout. Margaret and David go to parties together and the course of their love runs smoothly until a traveling salesman from the city, Charles Griswold (Edmund F. Cobb) enters the story. Margaret is influenced by his tales of romantic city life, and elopes with him. But city life proves more enjoyable seen from afar than in real life, and Margaret is very unhappy. Then her husband deserts her, and she is cast on her own resources. When she nurses a neighbor's child through a dangerous illness, the doctor urges her to become a trained nurse. This she does and at the hospital meets David, now a surgeon. She realizes that she loves him, but she is still bound to her husband. Then in a wreck her husband is injured. But just at this point, Margaret awakes, to discover that the elopement was a dream and that she is safe at home. And the next day the stranger goes away and Margaret promises to marry David.

There is danger of a dream ending proving an anticlimax, but in this case it does not give that effect. Instead, it brightens a play which would not be strong enough to sustain a more emotional finish.

In this play Marguerite Clayton gets paid for sipping a soda.

The photography of the play is good, the dissolve effects being handled in an unusually skillful manner. The scenes of city streets, cut in to illustrate the salesman's story, are particularly good. The play in general will prove pleasing to any audience.

NATIONAL BOARD MEETS

Problems of Local Censorship Discussed—Reports on Work with Children's Programs—One Hundred Fifty Members Present

One hundred and fifty members of the review, general and executive committees of the board were present at the annual meeting of the National Board of Review of Motion Pictures held in New York June 5.

John M. Casey, mayor's license clerk of Boston, discussed the co-operation between the Board of Review and the local authorities in Boston. Mr. Casey, in explaining his work, said that he was in receipt of the weekly bulletins of the National Board and that on order of Mayor Curley no pictures could be shown except those which were approved by the National Board. In his opinion, this method of local control of motion pictures was best, and far superior to any official censorship body which makes a practice of viewing films.

Mrs. Dexter Thurber of Providence interestingly described her work in arranging for and carrying out children's programs in that city. Mrs. Thurber said that she had formed a committee which represented public officials and various organizations and stood sponsor for the first performance which was given at the expense of the Strand Theater. At the performances, programs selected by the committee were shown and in a very short time the venture became financially profitable. The Providence committee found that the children cared less for purely educational pictures than for comedies or the shorter dramas. Following the experience in Providence Mrs. Thurber and her committee arranged for children's performances in a nearby mill town and success was obtained there as well. A slightly different program was used for this purpose, some western pictures being included. Mrs. Thurber has prepared a special pamphlet with reference to her work, and she emphasized the desirability of co-operating with the National Board of Review in its children's work.

Mrs. C. W. Cartwright of Minneapolis, chairman of the education committee of the National Federation of Women's Clubs, described the work of the local committee which receives the bulletins of the National Board, basing its activities upon it rather than attempting independent action except where some peculiar situation warrants it. The committee is unofficial and reports its conclusions to the mayor. Plans were outlined for furthering the children's performances throughout the country and emphasizing the "Better Films" movement as an answer to censorship agitation. The members of the general committee of the National Board, many of whom were present, are:

Mrs. Frederick Lee Ackerman, Elbridge Adams, Mr. Cranston Brenton, Dr. Edmund Burton, William P. Capes, Miss Martha Draper, Ralph Folks, Mrs. Howard Gans, Edwin Trowbridge Hall, James Shelley Hamilton, Lee F. Hanmer, P. F. Jerome, Raymond P. Kaighn, Dr. Orlando Lewis, Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, E. A. Moree, William J. Morris, Dr. Henry S. Oppenheimer, J. K. Paulding, T. N. Pfeiffer, W. Frank Persons, R. S. Pigott, Mrs. Miriam Sutro Price, Jonathan Rawson, Louis Rouillion, Lester F. Scott, Dr. Albert Shiels, Clarence A. Perry and E. A. Jenkins.

ESSANAY'S SUMMER CAMPS

Five Short Reel Features Ready for July. Antionette Walker to Make Her Debut in Support of Walthall

In accordance with the system inaugurated last year by George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Company, three summer camps have been established where outdoor scenes will be taken.

The camp at Chattanooga, Tennessee, was utilized by Director E. H. Calvert for the scenes in "According to the Code," a five-act feature to be released in July through the V. L. S. E.

At Starved Rock, Illinois, Director Fred E. Wright took many of the scenes for the three-act photoplay "Power."

The third camp is at Camp Logan, the artillery and rifle range of the Illinois National Guard, and here Director J. Charles Hayden with Henry Walthall and a supporting cast, are taking scenes in "The Little Musketeer."

These camps and the additional floor space afforded by the new studio has greatly facilitated the production of the Essanay company and now practically all the photoplays for the month of August are completed, and work is going on for still further advanced dates.

President Spoor is a firm believer in the one, two and three-reel features, and this is demonstrated in the three-act releases for July which will include "The Regeneration of Margaret," in which Warda Howard, Ernest Naupain and John Junior take the leading roles; "Power," featuring Sydney Ainsworth and Nell Craig; "The Secret of the Night," played by Lillian Drew, Sydney Ainsworth and John Lorenz; "The Grouch," with Harry Beaumont and Harry Dunkinson; and "Repentance," in which John Lorenz and Ann Leigh are starred.

Antionette Walker, well known to theatergoers everywhere, and especially remembered because of her performance with David Warfield in "The Music Master," will make her picture debut in support of Henry B. Walthall in "The Little Musketeer."

Celebration at Horsley Studios

Fifty Cub Comedies Completed—"The Wasted Years" and Other Promising Features Announced—Four New Players

THE CUB COMEDY COMPANY held a big clebration at the David Horsley studios, Los Angeles, in honor of the "fiftieth anniversary"—the completion of half a hundred pictures in as many weeks. Director Milton H. Fahrney was the guest of honor, and shared the glory of the occasion with five members of the company who made up the cast of the first picture a year ago. This honor fell to George Ovey, star of the company; Louis FitzRoy, assistant to Mr. Fahrney; Janet Sully, Jefferson Osborne and Ross Fisher, the cameraman, who turned the crank throughout the entire five thousand scenes or more used in making the fifty productions.

In the absence of David Horsley, Mrs. Horsley acted as hostess of the evening, which was spent in dancing and a program made up of talent from the company.

A play within a play is the novelty in the production of "The Wasted Years," written by Crane Wilbur and enacted by him. This is a five-reel subject and will be released June 24.

"Jerry's Elopement," a one-reel Cub Comedy starring George Ovey in the character of Jerry, will be the second Horsley-Mutual release of the week.

The third release for the same week is a Centaur feature "A Siren of the Jungle," starring Margaret Gibson and William Clifford, and showing the Bostock animals.

Four new members have recently been added to the acting force of the David Horsley studios. Myra Davis Dowling, an actress of the legitimate stage, will be a member of the company supporting the co-stars Margaret Gibson and William Clifford. Marguerite Foss has also been added to this company.

Lloyd Holton will be a member of the cast supporting Crane Wilbur, and Corine Bradford, known as "The girl on the cover," will make her debut as a motion picture actress in a forthcoming Centaur feature, also in the Crane Wilbur company.

A unique romantic comedy drama, in which a motion picture star portrays the part of a motion picture star, is among the Horsley-Mutual offerings for the week of July 1, the novel characterization falling to Crane Wilbur in the two-reel Centaur feature "The King O' Make Believe." The play was also written by Mr. Wilbur.

Looking in at the Emerald Studios

Well Equipped Chicago Company Completing Tom and Jerry Comedies to Be Distributed Under American Standard

By B. F. Barrett

Frederick J. Ireland.

CLEAN comedy and nothing but the best, is the slogan of the Emerald Motion Picture Company. The aspirations of the heads of the company for only the highest standard of work and productions are echoed by the members of the all star stock company. The impression on going into the studio is of one great family with high ideals all working for a common cause—and the expression is always "we want to accomplish big things," not "I want to become famous." This very spirit of working, not for personal aggrandizement but for the accomplishments of the company as well as the actors, is going to be a decided factor in the success of this organization which is now completing its first series of pictures.

The major general around whom the activities revolve is Frederick J. Ireland, president, director general and author. Having been "born on the stage," as he expresses it, he has spent his whole life as an actor, producer and stage director and is qualified to handle all phases of the business. Mr. Ireland is also a musician, having composed many songs and musical selections, and is the author of a number of dramatic plays and musical comedies. He not only can tell the actors what he wants done but if they do not readily catch the idea can enact the part and show them how it should be done. As a director he is possessed of unlimited patience and is tireless in his efforts for just the right effect as his intention is to produce nothing but the best. He is assisted by Mr. M. Edmonds, who is also very versatile.

Although the Emerald is a young company and its studios are small, consideration has been given to every detail which will result in perfect pictures. Special attention has been paid to the lighting effect, overhead, side and the new floor lights being used, so that all ground shadows are eliminated.

The work of the company has been devoted entirely to the production of the Tom and Jerry comedies. Mr. Ireland is the author of these plays and is directing the work. There will be a series of ten comedies with all except one in two reels. These will be released one each week starting June 26. Six of the films are now completed and work on the seventh is progressing. Each one of the series is complete in itself although the same characters run through all, and they are full of life and humorous action—with no padding allowed.

Director Ireland believes the way to make a successful picture is to engage nothing but the best dramatic stars, and the Tom and Jerry series is put on with an all star cast, with special attention paid to suiting the character to the player. The title roles are enacted by Charles E. Huntington as Jerry Simpson and Tom Keesey as Tom Bradford. While both of these men are clever comedians they are of an entirely different type. Mr. Huntington, who plays the bald headed character comedian, is also well known as a comedian on the legitimate stage. Mr. Keesey, contrastingly tall and slim, takes the part of the young funny man; it really isn't a case of "taking a part" for by simply acting natural he will bring a laugh every time.

Dolores Cassinelli appears in the leading feminine role, and needs no introduction to the motion picture public. Of charming personality and very accomplished, is this star, and mighty good to look at, being a perfect type of Italian beauty. As soon as the present series is completed the Emerald Company will start on a number of five reel features in which Miss Cassinelli will be the sole star.

Byrdine Zuber, for a number of years in musical comedy, and whose first screen work was with the original Lasky Company, takes the adventurous parts.

Rhea Catto Laughlin gained her experience on the vaudeville stage, and is seen in a "clinging, weepy" role in these comedies; while Lillian de Turk appears as a soubrette.

Patrick Miles, an actor all his life, who also bears the distinction of being the father of Director Ireland, and Tony West and John Cavaleir, who depict character roles most ably, round out the cast.

The Emerald releases through the American Standard Motion Picture Company. Samuel Quinn, the president, and M. G. Watkins, the general manager, are handling their output in an original and unique manner. They started out to perfect their market before releasing and created the demand for the productions before they were started; so that now before the Tom and Jerry comedies are ready for release they have thousands of dollars of bookings. They have established 31 branches in the United States and Canada and have arranged for showings in Australia. They were quick to grasp the significance of the demand for clean comedies and to meet that market with their series.

The American Standard also distributes for other companies and was organized originally with the idea of giving the smaller producer a medium through which his films could be distributed.

Victor B. Johnson with Vitagraph

After an absence of over a year and a half, Victor B. Johnson has returned to the motion picture field, this time allying himself with the Vitagraph Company, where he occupies a desk in the news service department. Mr. Johnson's first motion picture connection was with the original Warner's Features Company. He remained in charge of their advertising and publicity through their reorganization, after which the concern was known as Warner's Features, Inc., with P. A. Powers as president.

He terminated his two-year-old connection with Warner's to enter the advertising department of the New York Morning Telegraph. Ditmar's pictures next claimed his attention. He assisted in the cutting and assembling of Curator Ditmar's six-reel animal feature, got over considerable newspaper publicity on it, and sent a number of companies out on the road, making arrangements for them to exhibit in big houses.

A good opportunity to enter the national advertising field presented itself, and Mr. Johnson was soon a member of the Street Railways Advertising Company's organization. Here he remained for seventeen months, which in experience is the equivalent of years in an ordinary advertising man's chair, for at the Street Railways Company the men are in the copy trenches all the time. He left here to go with the Medley Scovil Advertising Company. Then he joined the New Service Department of the Vitagraph Company, where he finds himself in a thoroughly familiar atmosphere, having had the best of training in its two lines of endeavor, advertising and publicity.

Morey in Massive New Production

Harry T. Morey, one of Vitagraph's well-known artists, has had a wide and varied experience in the theatrical profession. Before his entrance into the field of motion pictures, Morey played in vaudeville, musical comedy and drama. He has appeared with many prominent stars of the legitimate stage, including Anna Held, in "The Little Duchess," Weber and Fields, and with Louise Gunning in "Marcella." With Cohan and Harris he played in "The Honeymooners," and with Montgomery and Stone in "The Wizard of Oz."

Seven years ago he became interested in the photoplays and joined the Vitagraph Stock Company. Since that time he has appeared in hundreds of screen productions and has made an enviable record, playing all kinds of parts, from the village "boob" to the prominent statesman.

Some of the most popular of Morey's efforts include "For a Woman's Fair Name," "The Law Decides," "A Price for Folly," and "Salvation Joan," the special Blue Ribbon feature in which he played opposite Edna May.

Morey at present is working in "The Battle Cry of War," a sequel to "The Battle Cry of Peace," now in course of production by William P. S. Earle, under the personal supervision of Commodore J. Stuart Blackton. Commodore Blackton collaborated with Cyrus Townsend Brady in the writing of the story, which, when completed, will be in ten parts.

Ilean Hume, charming Metro ingenue.

The impression on going into the Emerald studio is of one great family with high ideals all working for a common cause, and the expression is always "we want to accomplish big things," not "I want to become famous." The scene above is from one of the Tom and Jerry series of comedies, one of which is to be released each week beginning June 26. At the right is Dolores Cassinelli, the accomplished star in Emerald productions. (See story on preceding page.)

Ilean Hume to Play Classic

Ilean Hume, the Metro ingenue, is very much delighted over the important part that has been assigned to her in the Metro-Quality production of Romeo and Juliet, in which Francis Bushman and Beverly Bayne are starring. Miss Hume has long been an enthusiastic admirer of the great poet and at the Wadleigh High School, from which she graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, she appeared in several Shakespearian productions. Miss Hume has had some experience on the legitimate stage prior to her appearance on the screen. Her first engagement in motion pictures was under the direction of D. W. Griffiths. The young actress has become popular through her beauty and clever delineation of ingenue roles. On the Metro program she has been seen in "The Kiss of Hate," with Ethel Barrymore and "The Turmoil" and "Her Debt of Honor," with Valli Valli in the stellar role.

Geraldine Farrar Returns to Lasky

There will be no vacation around the Lasky studios this summer, as many plays are planned for production. Elaborate features in which Victor Moore, Cleo Ridgely, Wallace Reid and Blanche Sweet will appear as stars, will be presented during the summer months.

Victor Moore's production is entitled "The Clown"; Miss Ridgely and Mr. Reid are co-stars in "The Selfish Woman," and Blanche Sweet will star in "The Dupe."

Geraldine Farrar and Lou-Tellegen have started on their long deferred honeymoon, which they will spend at Hollywood, California, at the studios of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company. Miss Farrar was reticent concerning her plans for the summer but said that several things were being contemplated, any one of which she promised would be interesting. A magnificent country estate with a mansion completely furnished after her own taste is awaiting Miss Farrar at Hollywood.

There is a note of real sentiment in Mr. and Mrs. Lou-Tellegen passing their honeymon at the Lasky studios for it was there they met for the first time last summer when they were both appearing in motion pictures.

Edmondson Secures Blue Bird

Congenial "Dick" Edmondson has captured the Blue Bird program for the United Kingdom. This brand is meeting with favor in the trade across the pond, and with his unexcelled generalship will shortly rank with the best in the field.

Edmondson began his career in California as an exhibitor.

The Woman's City Club of Chicago issued invitations to a private review of their Child Welfare Film, "Uncle Sam's Babies," to be held at the Strand Theater, June 12. The play was written and produced by George L. Cox and photographed by George Barker. C. E. Divine, president of the Strand Company, gave the use of his full orchestra and soloist to add to the program. The film will be run all next week as a part of the regular Strand program, and a certain percent of the proceeds will be donated to the Welfare League to assist in their work of helping the babies.

States Film Company: This corporation is the producer of "The Girl and the Game." It is current gossip on LaSalle street today that 50% of the preferred stock will be retired at 110 and dividends July 1st, the balance September 1st. Fifty dollars per share is now bid for the common stock.

Mutual Film Corporation: Revenue has been reported at record figures during the past three weeks, a considerable amount of this probably due to the extraordinary receipts from the Charlie Chaplin series. The original intention was to only put out 200 of these prints; this was increased to 226 and they now have over 240. In a number of theaters where they expected to receive on the basis of $50 per print for one night, they have, in a number of instances, billed these theaters for five consecutive nights.

New York Motion Picture Corporation: Sold during the past week at a range of from 42 to 38.

Vogue Films, Incorporated: Good news comes from the Coast to the effect that the original plan, including the purchase of studio grounds in California and possibly a factory site in Chicago, will be carried through. The demand for the Vogue product is increasing each week, due largely to Ben Turpin, who is now conceded in the trade to be one of the best slapstick comedians in the U. S. Two-reel comedies are now being tried out and the demand has been instantaneous.

Thanhouser Film Corporation: We have just been advised, unofficially, of an event of some importance in connection with two companies. It is reliably stated that Thanhouser has withdrawn from the Mutual organization. The cause for this is probably due to the new percentage plan based on actual earning capacity of releases, which the Mutual is applying to all of its subsidiary manufacturing companies. It probably takes some courage to put into execution a radical move of this kind, but, if the product of this particular company is not earning according to requirements, the Mutual management is to be commended upon its action. There has been no particular change in the markets of either Mutual or Thanhouser.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

The Easterner learns that Moll is his mother and because he refuses to disown his mother, Doris Wendell, daughter of a wealthy landowner, breaks her engagement with him. His passion to gambling proves too strong and he bets his claim. As he loses Oby, a half-wit who haunts the camp, snatches away the table, jumbling the cards. Dying, Gardner admits that Kate is Oby's daughter and, reunited with her father, Kate marries the Easterner.

A Misunderstood Boy—Biograph Reissue—June 19.—Featuring Lillian Gish, Robert Harron, Lionel Barrymore and Kate Bruse. Everything he did seemed to be misconstrued, except by the little lady he loved. The town roisterers made fun of her and his love. That made trouble and the chief vigilante believed him the cause of it all. So he was "in wrong" all around. The girl's father also sided with the opinion of the world and sent both the boy and girl away. Mother was on a visit at the time, and therein the need of such a one at home was proved, for once back she sent the father out to bring them home again. The boy in the gold hills had been misunderstood again. Marauding merchants had left their victim on the mountain pass and the boy, coming on the scene, was again accused, but the lie in the end destroyed itself.

Otto's Legacy—Lubin—June 19.—Featuring Davy Don. Otto Finnegan, a bricklayer, receives a legacy of gold coins and as the bank is closed he conceals the gold in a hollowed brick, which he buries in a vacant lot. Two sons of a policeman dig up the brick and hold Otto at bay while they make their getaway. A mason loading bricks from a pile in the same yard throws the gold brick in with the rest and before Finnegan can have the boys arrested the brick is built into the walls of a chicken house. He hires an automobile and drives it through the wall of the chicken house and the owner, enraged, knocks him out with one of the bricks. He is taken home and when seized with a chill his wife warms his feet with a hot brick, which happens to be the gold one, and when he awakens and finds it he clasps his wife to his breast and tells her for the first time of his sudden riches.

The Reformers—(Two Reels)—Biograph Reissue—June 20.—Featuring Mae Marsh and Robert Harron. Behold in this film the uplifter, a peculiarity of the human species, quite convinced that all that is, is wrong. Forth to the uplift he minds everybody's business but his own, until that business is as clean, pure and spotless as himself. Verily in these later days is there no school of art named "minding one's business?"

The Girl at the Curtain—(Two Reel)—Essanay Reissue—June 20.—Featuring Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne. To Warren Bradley, a young attorney, half of an immense fortune is left, provided he marry a distant relative, a girl he has never seen. He is content, but, it seems, the girl is not. Mary Burns, a pretty country school teacher, refuses even to see him. Reverses, however, make her agree. She insists that they be married with a curtain between them, so that neither shall see the other. They separate immediately. Later she decides to get first hand experience as a business woman and goes to work as a stenographer for Warren Bradley under an assumed name. After a few months Bradley deplores his marriage, having fallen in love with his stenographer.

The cheap man was trench broke and could be kept busy changing the records on the phonograph. The provider was a financial featherweight. The brunette was up a stump when it came to making a choice. She could not bring herself to lean against a stingy old thing who never unbuckled. If she married the provider he would giver her everything he owned, but what he owned you could put in a steamer trunk. Auntie's advice was for girlie to center her affections on some tractable person who was neither a prospective pauper nor a close-fisted clam. At the Penal Colony of Palawan—Paramount—June.—The nineteenth release in the Burton Holmes Travel series is a notable addition to this valuable series. A trip up the underground river which penetrates the Island of Palawan, the Philippines. The trip up stream offers some particularly beautiful pictures and once arrived at the Penal Colony there is much of singular interest to Americans. On this island criminals are really being "cured." The prisoners are not held by force at the colony, which is the graduating class of the prison system instituted by the United States. Each convict has it within his own power to win privileges which amount to freedom, and, indeed, freedom itself when he has proven his fitness to once more become a member of society. These scenes make this release one of the most interesting travel pictures ever offered to the public and the scenes taken during the novel trip to the Island of Palawan make it one of the most pleasing to the eye. T. C. K.

Pictographs—PARAMOUNT—JUNE. — Diagrams, animated, prepared by Henry Reuterdahl showing how our fleet might be destroyed, have first position on this release of Pictographs. Mr. Reuterdahl shows how a fleet more mighty than ours could utterly destroy the navy of the United States. A motorboat trip up the rapids of Snake River is another interesting contribution to this reel. Boats equipped with high powered motors battle and are tossed about in the swirling waters. "Testing the Trend of Your Mind," another article by Hugo Munsterberg, is included in the issue, along with the "Better Babies" department.

One of the most disastrous fires in theaters recently was the destruction of Robt. H. Nickerson's house at Butler, Oklahoma. The house, with all contents, including 15 reels of film, was totally destroyed, as well as an adjoining building. Edward A. Thomas, the lecturer, who has been touring Oklahoma with "Satan," reported the fire to Dallas exchangemen, and said that not only was there no insurance carried, but the booth was nothing more than a frame-box-like affair, and with no fire-proofing whatever. The conflagration started when the kid operator put two reels of film on a rectifier.

Depinet, manager of the Consolidated's office in Dallas, has returned from a trip to Atlanta, where he conferred with General Manager William Oldknow regarding the two big features their company has recently acquired from the Universal, "The Dumb Girl of Portici" and "Where Are My Children?"

The Alliance Film Company of Texas, J. W. Hill, Jr., manager, has secured the "Charlie - Fatty - Maybelle" comedy cartoon subjects for Texas and Oklahoma; and will have one new release each week. Mr. Hill is adding a scenic subject to the comedy cartoons, making the film a full thousand feet. Bookings are rapidly coming in on the contract basis, Mr. Hill has informed us.

H. Thomas, operating the Airdome Theater at Orange, Texas, made a flying trip to Dallas June 8, to arrange some bookings, among which was the Essanay-Chaplin "Police." It seems that a Dallas friend of Mr. Thomas wrote him that "Police" was a great picture, and that he had better get it. He did.

PICTURES WHICH CHALLENGE NATURE'S FIERCEST FORCES

SNOW-BOUND Washington!—country of blizzards and blockades!—mercury touching bottom!—small community!—country patronage! What more difficult test of their drawing powers could moving pictures have? Yet witness the report of Big Four's showing in the town of Sequim.

> "Last night's film enthusiastically received by large-sized crowd. V-L-S-E features deserve all credit for bringing out people with weather conditions at their worst. Terrific cold, snow and wind. All irrigation systems frozen and country folk beside themselves as to how to water stock, yet came long distances to see your picture."—J. E. Musgrave, Mgr. Olympic Theatre, Sequim, Wash.

And then to parallel this achievement in Northwestern Minnesota, land of bitter gales and biting cold, with the thermometer ten below zero:

Gentlemen:

Enjoyed fine business last Sunday in spite of the extremely bad weather. In the evening the thermometer registered 10 below zero and a stiff northwest gale whirled the fine snow that had fallen during the day into a raging blizzard.

In spite of this, however, four young ladies and their escort, all good picture judges, made the drive in a bob-sleigh from Glenville (eight miles south) to Albert Lea, just to see our show. When they reached the theater, they were too cold to remove their own wraps, but after seeing the picture, they said it was worth all the discomfort to which they had been subjected, and started on the home trip, vowing they would be willing to do the same thing over again for so enjoyable an evening.

I consider this the greatest compliment ever indirectly paid a picture in my house, and cannot refrain from passing it along to you.

Yours very truly,

Valleau

Instances of the drawing power of V-L-S-E releases in every clime and under all conditions, might be multiplied tiresomely. In Dayton, Wash., for instance the American Theatre reports that "with the mercury two below zero, doors opened at 7:00 o'clock. At 7:30 'S. R. O.' Admission twenty-five cents. Box office records broken at 8:40." Suffice it here, however, to suggest that if you seek attractions of proved profit-making value, you would do well to consult the nearest V-L-S-E exchange.

We are always ready to help you help yourself.

V-L-S-E, Inc.

Gentlemen:

I have been in the motion picture business in St. Louis eight years. I opened with the V-L-S-E service in the latter part of July--the first features shown at my house at advanced prices.

I have been using the service from the V-L-S-E regularly each week since, and find it satisfactory to myself and to my patrons--in fact after carefully reviewing all the features on the market at the present time, I consider the V-L-S-E ahead of the best of them.

The advanced prices which V-L-S-E bring, being very profitable, I am now considering a regular two a week V-L-S-E program--in this way using V-L-S-E's entire output.

It is also always a pleasure to me to be instrumental in securing new accounts for the V-L-S-E.

Very truly yours.

Gentlemen:

I take great pleasure in expressing my appreciation in regard to your wonderful pictures. I have used a number of them, and can frankly say that they are unquestionably the most popular pictures I show my patrons.

I am glad to say that V-L-S-E features have increased my business and show a big profit on the days that I have used them.

I am always glad at any time to give my assistance in helping to place the Big Four at the top.

We consider your productions in a class by themselves and feel that we cannot do business without them.

Yours very truly,

Triangle Releases for Week of March 26

Can you imagine what happens when an orphan asylum takes fire? Can you imagine the poor, little drudge of the place—the little Cinderella whom everybody cuffed and kicked, as the heroine of that fire?

And then Love came—the young artist who lived near-by, and after that a tragedy. Poor Ann fired a pistol—but you should see the picture and learn how close to the Grim Destroyer circumstantial evidence can bring an innocent person. It is a great picture—tears, comedy, tragedy, romance, and happiness at last. A real Triangle Play.

Mae Marsh in Hoodoo Ann

Would you vote to hang a person on circumstantial evidence? There's the question in "Hoodoo Ann." A woman said five words, and came close to death when her husband disappeared.

The Play is really the tale of a modern Cinderella, and in it Mae Marsh gets a chance to do the things that have made her loved by theatre goers all over the land. A TRIANGLE Play of the "best" quality.

Motion pictures that appeal to the public and that the public will pay real money to see are the kind of pictures that you want to be running in your theater. The two advertisements above which were prepared as a part of a regular service for TRIANGLE exhibitors show just why the TRIANGLE PLAYS released this week will appeal to your patrons—just why it will be of financial advantage for you to run them. These advertisements are merely illustrations of one of the basic ideas back of the TRIANGLE FILM CORPORATION—that each picture must contain some vital point that will strike the heart of the public and make people feel that they simply cannot afford to miss the next TRIANGLE PLAY.

Essanay Photoplays Strike Universal Chord

Kipling's idea of paradise is a place where one can "draw the thing as he sees it." In every heart there is an innate love of truth to things as they are.
Essanay spares no pains to draw the things as it sees them and as they are. That is the keynote of Essanay realism. That is why Essanay plays strike a universal chord.
